She had in her hand what can only be described as a rag. A woeegone look had fallen over her face when the two men left her standing with a look which was crossed now and then by one of impatience, which burned up and went out of her sallow face again, leaving the stolid weariness to come back. Of what use was it for her to be angry who only existed in the world upon sufferance?

Presently the pawnbroker came bustling back to the shop to fetch something, takes in her wretched odious with a keen eye, and roughly asks her business. She drew him her rag, calling it a shawl. It is perfectly worthless, and he is out of temper. He flings it back to her with an oath, and returns to his more important customer.

The tall figure shakes as if blows had come down upon it, the light of eagerness fades out of the eyes, the habit mechanically fold up the neglected garment. This is no new scene that she is passing through—an unexpected trial that has come upon her; it is one of the daily routine of her life. Harsh words, repulsion, are as familiar to her as the taste of bread and milk to a child who has never suffered hunger. She accepts the award of her existence with the meekness of habitual dejection, but behind it there is something stirring which is not habitual—something which makes the room seem to rise up again, which awakens persistence out of the passiveness of despair. She turns again from the shop-board, from which she had set her face, and takes her stand by the counter once more. She will wait to have another word with the pawnbroker.

Now the rout of this girl's purpose was holy, and yet her next act was the drop of evil which overflowed the cup of her misery, and turned trouble into sin.

She was so weary that the earth seemed to drag her failing limbs toward it. Her eyes were fixed on the opposite wall, looking at a slimy picture presented to them by dying man, struggling with his death, alone in darkness. She heard not the shouts and curses in the street outside, nor the bargaining of the two in the inner room, nor, struggling with the "Drink! drink!" She heard the horrible, greedy cry, "Whisky!" gurgling in a dying throat. Her whole frame started forward, her clothing pulled with one another. She gazed all around the shop. No one near her, no one minding her; and the cost still lying on the counter.

For one moment she was raised to the dignity of resisting temptation. Only one moment; need was the habit of her too strong, misery too deep. The coat was snatched, and the girl vanished.

The two men returned only about a minute too late, and rushed into the street crying, "Stop thief!" The cry was echoed and tossed from lip to lip in the dirty lanes and alleys. Drunken men reeled out of taverns and caught it, wretched children yelled it along the gutter. It clamored in the hunted creature's ears as she strained her weak limbs along the quays, never doubting that pursuit was coming to let the pursuers go by. "It is the last time, the last time!" she muttered. So it was—the last sin of many; but to go unpunished.

The cry had long ceased, and the chase had been abandoned, when the dark figure crept in at a miserable alley-way, and up a dirty, creaky flight of stairs. She had no cost in her hands now, but some money, and a small bottle. She looked from right to left with fierce eyes, and then entered a wretched room where the dawn was stealing wanly through a broken skylight in the roof. The walls were perfectly bare; there was no sign of food, furniture, or clothing. The girl looked eagerly toward a corner where the figure of a man lay stretched upon straw. She went forward, listening and gazing intently, and dropped on her knees beside the figure.

"Here it is," she said, in a voice of fright that matched her face; "here is the whisky. I could not get it any sooner."

There was no answer by sound or movement.

"Father!" she shrieked, with a wild sob. She lifted an awful-looking hand from the straw, and dropped it again. The figure on the pallet was a corpse. The cries that had rung through the room when she left it were still forever.

She drew a covering over the body, looked round the bare walls of the den, and sat down on the floor with a passive despair in her white face. Her foot touched the bottle of spirits. She snatched it up and half emptied it at a draught, stretched herself on the straw at the feet of the corpse, and soon fell into a state of unconsciousness that answered with her for peace.

This is the history of Molly's crime. It is quite the basis for the progress of this story to go back any further into her past. It is not easy to get at the true antecedents of such characters as Molly's. We have told you that Molly Carliel was a charwoman; another, that she was a ballad-singer; another, that she was a drover's daughter; and then she was a thief. Each account would have been true, for she had been all of these things in turns. She had been deserted, motherless childhood until now, her nineteenth year. She had been illtreated and made a slave of by a brutal step-father and the man whose last desire she had sinned to strive to satisfy. A worn-out, battered creature, who had never had any youth, who had never been taught, who had been driven on all her life by the instincts and necessities of the present moment.

It was only six o'clock, but the June sun was shining hotly down into the filthy alleys, glistening on the mud made by the night's rain, and blinding and burning on the broken window-panes crusted with dirt and stuffed with rags; and the Rooney boys were already, and had been since half-past five, astir with the excitement of a wandering mountebanks, who lodged at present in the room under that in which Molly Carliel and her father had passed the night. This den was a singular contrast to the one above it; not that there was a whit more comfort to be found in it, but that, while the one above it was full of the silence of death, the other was overflowing with all kinds of litter, and echoing with the quarrelsome shouting of a family. Mrs. Rooney, one of a coarse breakfast lay about a dirty bench at one side of the room, and heaps of frippery rags mingled with the still grayer ones of the floor, filled in all directions on the floor. The Rooney mother, a stout, broad-faced, vixenish-looking woman, was engaged in pasting dashes of red and yellow over a very thin white muslin short frock—part of the costume usually worn by Miss Matilda Rooney when dancing the sailor's hornpipe. Her husband, the father, who, when he was not in a passion, had a general air of humorous rowdiness, was adorned by nature with a squint, and by art with a cocked nose, which, at last was fiery in color. He was now occupying himself (with one arm in one sleeve of a rugged coat) by knocking the heads off a number of live knuckles on the heads of his two sons, who were unwillingly practising somersaults in one corner, and responding to the usual correction by loud growls of remonstrance. Miss Matilda Rooney, a dwarf of sixteen years who looked about ten, was busied in twisting her own hair into curl-papers, in order for the adornment of her own elf-locks of rusty red and the enhancement of the charms of the professional costume, which she inherited in full perfection. As she worked she beguiled her task by stray words of impudence flung at her brothers, by snatches of airs and by shakings of her fist at a squalling baby who was lying kicking on his back, neglected, on the floor.

The Rooney family was about to divide itself and go upon two separate pedestrian excursions into different parts of the country, to perform in village barns and inhabitants of road-side cottages with the display of its wonderful accomplishments. The Rooney sons were going to Kilkenny, and carried their tights and spangles; the Rooney father, mother, daughter, and baby were going to dance, scrape, and jingle their way westward with pipe, fiddle, and tambourine.

The Rooney family was making so much noise with its preparations for departure that it took no repeated three outside, and no one in the room heard it. At last the door was driven open and a white face appeared.

"Molly!" cried the Rooney mother; and there was a general hush, so scaring for the moment was the white face at the door.

"Arrah, thin, it's you that looks fresh and rosy after yer mornin' walk!" cried the Rooney father, with a look of fear in his eyes.

"Father's dead!" said Molly, her dark, hopeless eyes wandering way from the people in the room up the blank wall in a vacant search for sympathy.

"Dead!" came from all in a chorus; and then from one:

"Best his sow!"

From another:

"He'll give ye no more black eyes."

And again:

"Ye'll be breakin' yer heart after him!"

"He's made a lucky flittin'!" said Tim Rooney, the father, "bad cess to him! Ye'll screen out for nixt to-morrow. Have ye any money?"

"I have money," said Molly, unclosing her hand and showing the coin.

"Where did ye get it?" cried Mother Rooney, eying it greedily. "Ah, ye jail-bird! Ye've been a-thavin' again! Ye've been a-pickin' and shovel some o' these days, my darlin'. Why don't ye take after poor honest folks like us, and get yer livin' dacent, by divil ye?"

"I want to do it," cried Molly, imploringly, "but they won't let me. None of them will let me. The days keep coming round, and I never get a chance to do it. Oh, if you would take me out of the town with you, Mrs. Rooney, I'll give you this money, and I'll thramp the country like the best! Couldn't I carry the baby for ye, Mrs. Rooney?" cried Molly, wringing her hands.

Mother Rooney told her to get out of that for a slut, and sent her away to bury her father; but before daylight next morning the Rooney family had decided that Molly would be a useful addition to the tramping expedition. The neglected baby that kicked on the floor had grown since the last excursion, and Mother Rooney had found difficulty even then in managing both it and her fiddle. Molly could sing ballads and carry the baby. So, the pauper's funeral being over, Molly was bidden to enter on her new profession of tramp.

She locked up the door and surrendered the key to the landlord. The girl's leaden heart was a little less leaden when she had done this. In that room she had starved, sinned, mourned, and despaired. She fetched the neglected baby out of the Rooney Bedlam below, and set it with it in high glee on the top of the rickety staircase. It would be hard to analyze the chaos of poor Molly's brain. It doubtless threw over a heavy retrospective grave on behind those black eyes wide open in the darkness, listening to a "death-watch" ticking at her father's feet. Molly's wanderings must have given glimpses of religion—just enough to let her know that her life was all wrong, and that there was a better life to be led somewhere, but never by her. There was expectation, too, in those wideopen eyes, but it was very vague and dull. That a change, an escape was at hand was Molly's chief idea. She would get away out of the filthy streets and lanes, to which she was not dainty enough to object on account of their filthiness, but because within their boundaries every man's hand was against her. To what manner of region she was going she had not the least care. She had never been out of the town in her life, and the open country was a sealed book to her. Probably she had not even the curiosity of some lively she should not have to steal—perhaps not even to beg, where there would be so many more trouble-tongued to do it. Hard usage had made her so much used to any change must be for the better. She got a crust of bread from the Rooneys that night, and leave to watch herself with them in the morning.

By dawn they were off on the tramp, Molly carrying the baby, her pocket stuffed with dirty ballads, Mother Rooney bearing the fiddle, Miss Rooney with his pipes and some baggage; Matilda with her tambourine, and her dancing-dress covered with a shawl, the property of the brought in the pond and dabbled on the young lady's heels as she went along. The drizzling rain kept on, and for the first day or three days Molly was very wretched. The country was sheeted in mist, and cottagers kept their doors shut. The towns they passed through were uninterested in the Rooneys. A magistrate sent show on wheels and a German band were traveling the same route, arriving in every place of note just in time to secure the whole attention and to leave hardly a stray gape of curiosity for the miserable Rooneys. So they left the route they had intended to follow, and struck out on the bog and mountain country.

Tramp, tramp, tramp! Through the drizzling summer days, and into the drizzling autumn nights, four weary, dreary figures plodding on, and never the sign of a dwelling in sight since the last friendly cabin had been left miles behind. Hitherto they had always found a lodging in the shelter of some town, but to-night there was nothing for it but to camp under the shadow of an ruined chapel and make their beds among the stones and grass.

All were soon fast asleep; but at midnight the last of the rain fell, the mists mustered in long troops, and fled away over the hills. The moon rose, sanctioning the scene, such as city eyes and eyes never see; mountains that had been curtained out with rain-clouds lifted their gloomy heads against the horizon, and the weary Rooney shoulders turned to the plains to catch the silver benediction of the hour. Streams struggling here and there through hollows, with their own burden of waters, flung up glances of delight to the sky, as they had now light to go on their stumbling way. A plover in his nest lifted his head, shook his wing, stirred among the rushes, gave a cry of welcome, and was at rest again.

The cry awakened Molly, who was sleeping with her head against the opening of a broken arch, and her face to the moonlight. She had been dreaming of a tavern-row, full of lights, of gay singer, hawking, curses, and jurs. She opened her eyes to the white purity of the moon, her ears to the dreamy echo of the cry, and her soul to its first knowledge of peace. She laid the sleeping child out of her arms upon a corner of his mother's gown, covered him with the folding of a mantle, stole out from the shadow of the walls, and stood dazzled and bewildered in the mellow glory of the night. The hand of God was as new to her as was he to as if she had been led to the spot blindfold. What strange place was this where heaven bent toward her like a mother, and left the very air scented full of kindness, and the earth looked soothed, as if cruelty and wickedness had been charmed away from it for evermore? She had seen for many a time, and looking with a ghastly glance of disgust on dismal scenes to which she, Molly, had belonged. She had seen the moon in the heavens by a tenement, and out from the shadow of the walls, and stood dazzled and bewildered in the mellow glory of the night. The hand of God was as new to her as was he to as if she had been led to the spot blindfold. What strange place was this where heaven bent toward her like a mother, and left the very air scented full of kindness, and the earth looked soothed, as if cruelty and wickedness had been charmed away from it for evermore? She had seen for many a time, and looking with a ghastly glance of disgust on dismal scenes to which she, Molly, had belonged. She had never before seen the moon

I settled yon ruffian in a way that'll make him think twice before he lifts his hand to strike a woman again. Here, hold this to yer mouth, authore, it'll keep the blood away," and he gave her a fine snowwhite napkeenee (head-kerchief), which he had bought at the fair as a present for his mother.

"Now I tell you what it is, my girl," said he, "you must have the bad company ran yit. Yer not o' their sort, it's plain to see, an' you ought to get quit o' them."

"Not of their sort." Molly exalted above any body! Above those whose honesty she had emulated! Oh, if the drover were to appear now and denounce her this friend. She looked fearfully over her shoulder, but there was no cause for fear. Peace and security were all around her.

"I'll be glad to be any thing you bid me," said Molly, out of her heart, "for no man ever spoke so kind to me before. But I wouldn't know what to do, nor where to go, an' besides, I'm sure they'll kill the baby among them if I left it with them. It's not to bether o' them blows this good bit. Whisht! whisht! wee darlint!"

"Yer heart's in the right place," said Haverty, admiringly. "Yer ought to look to yerself, though. Ye could do rightly. The countherty's a good place to make a shift in, not like the town. Can ye sew?"

"No."

"Can ye read?"

"No."

"Well, ye could work in the fields like many a heartsome lass, an' people would be fightin' for law to give ye a lodgin' for a stave o' one o' them darlint songs of yours. Ye know 'em? There'll be a watchmakin', to-morrow night, over at Widow Conneely's in the bog. Lave this clan, an' make a start o' it for yerself at wanst. I'll be linkin' out for ye, an' I'll put in a good word for ye, I'll tell ye the songs that'll stale their hearts. Yell come?"

If he had asked Molly to make an effort to walk across the sea to America she would have promised to try. She gave him her word she would be at the Widow Conneely's. He had been tramping pebbles down the well, emphasizing his words by an occasional splash; now he bade her good-night, and walked away across the moor, strong and sturdy in the moonlight with his black-thorn stick in his hand. And Molly, with the baby, crept away to the barn where they were to pass the night. There was not much sleep for Molly, however. All the time she lay there she was thinking and dreaming of the kind kindness of John Haverty, who had at once become the idol of her hungry heart, which had been so starved of love all its life. She thought if he would but give her a corner of his field to work in, and come and speak to her like that for a minute or two every day, she would reach the very summit of human happiness. By daylight she was up again walking about, having left the child wrapped in the straw by its mother's side. She wandered about in the crimson dawn, meeting in her own wild untutored way wonderful revelations of a new life, drinking in with the pure air exhilarating draughts of unfinished vitality which brought rushes of health into her languid veins.

She went down to a lonely river among the furze and bathed, let down her long, matted hair; she had not even a comb to comb it with. She washed the blood-stains from the white kerchief Haverty had given her, and folded it across her shoulders. Then she cried more passionately than she had ever cried for pain or hunger, because she could not. And then dirty ragged gown, having no other. She bethought her of the motherly woman whom they had left two miles behind them on the road; who had taken the trumps into her tidy cottage, and held the baby while Molly ate of her bounty. So curiously had trust in humanity been roused in her that she set off at once, running along the high-road to throw herself on the mercy of this person almost unknown, a mother hug that she could help her in her dilemma. The motherly woman was feeding her hens before her door, when Molly appeared to her coming along in the sunrise, with her half-dried hair hanging over her shoulders, her eyes lighted with an eager hope, and her face flushed bright with the new flush of health and vigor that possessed her.

"I don't know but I may be a fool," said the motherly woman, as she sorted through the pigments in her household chest, "but I took a likin' to ye at the first when I seen ye so down an' heartsome among them screechy, jangly, bold-faced crew. An' I like ye bether this mornin', for ye've got more o' the clane counthry look about ye, an' a deeper look in yer eyes, too. Go like that to-you, then, and take the lond o' this turkey red; your nappineen 'll cover the misfit o' the body. An' if ye don't turn out honest, it's God 'll settle accounts with you, an' not me."

"The turkey red" was an ample calico gown of that warm hue, and when Molly was arrayed in it, and the white kerchief on her shoulders, the motherly woman was so delighted with her appearance that she insisted on dressing her hair to make her complete.

"I can plat beautiful," said she, "an' I'll plat it up to the crown of yer head, the way I used to be in my own little girl's, before the Lord-took her from me, Heaven to be bed! But let that stan' till we get the rest on. My good man is away from home, an' there's nobody here but our two sels."

Thus treated, Molly's heart overflowed with delight. The motherly woman was preparing she might for a smooth pool outside, and surveyed the alteration in herself, coming back on tip-toe. The words, "an' a pretty face o' yer own we have!" were ready on through her head; but the idea they conveyed was too sudden and wildly original to be accepted at once as the truth. And yet, when the rest of the world was changing so fast, why should not she change too? When her head was covered with shining braids she was still more a wonder to herself. What had this hearty come from? Could more cold water, colored calico, and the motherly woman's simple theories, work such a miracle?

She staid all day at the tidy cottage, being afraid to go back to the Rooneys. After sundown she set out, asking her way to the Widow Conneely's. It was a long walk, and she arrived with her cheeks in a glow. John Haverty was making his pipe as she came up, and he did not know her.

"I've come," said she.

"Why," said he, "you're never the singin' girl that was with the thramps last night?"

"I am," said Molly, enchanted, but alarmed at his not knowing her. "You promised to tell me what to sing."

He beamed on her with his blue eyes, taking in her new appearance slowly, by a long degree.

"I'll tell ye," said he, putting his pipe in his pocket.

He took her in to the Widow Conneely. He placed her in a seat apart, a little brown stool, set up in a deep window-seat, with a strip of dark-green curtain by her shoulder, and the remains of the sunset barring the little window-pane with gold beyond her head. By accident, of course, that these things arranged themselves so as to make of her a pretty picture for the unconscious pleasing of unsatisfied eyes. But there she sat, entitled by respect by the deference that Haverty paid her.

The people had not gathered in for the dance; only a few of the nearest ones were there; the piper had not yet come. Haverty sat with one leg across the end of a table, talking to Molly, getting her to sing over verses of songs for him, and deciding which she was to sing for the company. Molly's eyes and cheeks grew brighter and brighter, and her voice richer and sweeter; and the dusk deepened the golden bars paled away behind the pane, and the red light from the turf fire drove the shadows into the corners of the room, and fell full across John Haverty's eyes, which were watching as only an Irishman's eyes can water at music.

"Ye made of the right stuff," said he, "or yer singin' tells lies on ye. A man might be happy that had you chirpin' like a cricket by his fireside, sweetness! Look at me, sometimes, an' they could ye like me. It's not long since we saw each other first, but I'm not a bad fellow if you can take the soft side of me, and I warrant a girl that could take the heart out o' my body before."

Enter the piper, followed by a troop of noisy young men and women.

If Molly's answer had been forthcoming it would have been lost in the storm of greetings that followed. Je it was no time for love and make-believe, and Haverty was dragged away by a band of companions. Now the piper began to play, and the dancing commenced. Molly was placed in a chair on one side of the fire, with some pipes, tobacco, and whisky; for that purpose did not appear. A Molly looked on at the dancers, all gayly with a pretty girl in a light print dress and blue ribbon, with smooth fair hair, and saucy eyes, and a coquettish air about her. People were looking at with interest and admiration. Both were young, good-looking, and capital dancers. They seemed quite to each other, and for the jig they were footing. The girl seemed fully aware of the admiration she excited, and coquetted with her partner.

"Then they're the handsome pair!" cried one near Molly.

"Ay, thruth!" said another; "it's a wonther the sold man isn't come to make up the match."

"Ould blood is thew; but it'll not take them long to the doin' when they do go at it. Sure, it's the rich enough to make the young people happy."

"What is it?" said Molly, touching her neighbor's elbow.

"Why it's John Haverty and Katty Nee that's to have their match made to-night. You don't know, bein' a stranger, but it's them talked to about. They'll be married at wanst, I believe, as soon as the bargain's made."

Molly stared at the dancers, and then at the speaker, and took it all in. This was his matchmaking—that was what he had called it—only he had not said that he was to get it. Almost she ran, tangled long age, and he had been laughing at the poor tramp. Molly's head fell back behind her little strip of curtain.

"I do think that strange girl's sick in the corner there," said some one by-and-by.

"No," said Molly, rousing the cold drops from her face with the corner of her nappkeen; "but it's very warm. Will you give me a drink?" Habit is second nature; and Molly's habit of politeness was strong.

Two men came in just then, who were received with warm welcome. One was a tall, fair, bold-haired old man, the uncle of John Haverty, the richest farmer in the country; the other was the priest, who had come to bless the bargain. The father of the pretty bride in prospect, Katty Nee. Ah, Molly! "The fox may run, but he's caught at last."

The men sat down at the table which had been prepared for them, and smoked their pipes, and laid their plans, and drank the lively dancers soon began between them, and the pipes were often taken out of their mouths, and the table was often thumped; and others took their place in dancing, and listened in awe. By this time the piper, who had been sipping out of a glass by his side, began to play some of the lively dance tunes, quicker in their utterance, then silent. The dancers were still, and there was an outcry for music: a general demand for Molly, the singing-girl, to lift up a jig from the corner. So Molly sang many a mad, merry jig and whirling reel, only now and again breaking down in a sad song. For then John Katty and Haverty danced wilder and faster, and the lookers-on laughed and applauded, and the priest and the old gentleman, and the people said Molly had a jewel of a voice. God bless her!

But at last John Haverty's uncle got up with an oath and dragged his nephew out of the dance and over to the table by the arm. The dancing stopped in a moment. Molly's tune fell from her lips; the young men smiled to each other and shrugged their shoulders; the girls dried their eyes wide, and plucked each other by the sleeve. Some jumped up and flung up their eyes to the calm rafters; the old men cocked their ears and shifted their feet on the floor, as they were used to do on Sundays when preparing to listen to the sermon. Every one expected that something important was going to be said regarding the business of the night.

"It's time ye stopped yer jiggin' floolery," said the old man, angrily, "an' took a thought o' yer own business. Here we've settled all—land, sheep, house, an' everything, an' there he's stuck fast in the black cattle, an' sorra an inch 'll he budge for me. Sit down there an' make yer own match, for divil a finger more I'll meddle in't."

"I want you to make no match for me," said the young man, sullenly, "for I tould ye that last week. I tould it to Darby Nee, too, but nothin' would do you an' him but yez have a match-makin' here tonight. It's my own affair, an' if ye've fought over it ye can settle it between ye. I've no hand in it. Katty Nee's a purty girl, an' a good dancer, an' many 'll envy me, but I tell ye that I never axed her to be my wife, an' I never will. She knows it with me as well as I know it myself. She has a sweet-heart here to-night, lookin' as sour as bottle milk because his farm isn't as big as mine, an' she'd rather have him than me, for all her white body and soul, wouldn't ye, Katty? An' for my share," said Haverty, looking back at the window, "seein' that this was to be a match-making), I fished a little business for myself, an' I think my match is made, at least, it only wants wan little bit o' a word to finish the bargain, and I'll be off, an' good-evenin'!" said he, stepping up to the window and drawing Molly into the light, "an' tell outforenent the people if you can't make it out yerself."

The people looked surprised, but not so much so as might be expected. Such sudden "matches" are more common among them than longer courtships.

Molly felt that it was like certain death to cross that floor and be claimed by Haverty. Yet, to save his life, she could not have resisted that hand drawing her on.

"A common thramp from Dublin!" stuttered the old uncle, furiously.

"A beggar, instead of my girl with her fortune!" shouted the father of the bride.

Molly, pale and cowering, clinging to Haverty's arm, lifted her eyes with the old fearful look that was common to them in Dublin, and the drover, fixing his fox-like eyes on her, recognized her in a moment.

"Oho!" he cried, "oho! A Dublin thramp, did ye say? Faix, an' we didn't know what fine company we were in! I think you an' me has met before this, young woman. A thief, neighbors! he went on, his voice rising with his anger as the remembrance of his wrong came fully back upon him. "Be very thief that robs the coat I was tellin' ye of, in the pawnbroker's shop in Dublin. Then I was to get back my coat, while ye have picked, master Haverty. Ducent girls isn't good enough for ye, so ye have one that'll do ye crift!"

Molly heard John Haverty's answer nor the murmurs of the people, for at the first word of accusation she shot through the crowd and disappeared from the door.

When the motherly woman got up next morning and began to bustle about her tidy cottage she found her "turkey red" hanging on a pin behind the kitchen door, and Molly's old ragged gown that had hung in its place gone. Trembling with agitation, she counted her half-dozen tea-spoons, and felt that her "stocking" was safe in its nook up the chimney. "Thank God!" said the motherly woman. "I knewed she was ducent; but she might ha' said good-by to a body, an' not come slippin' in an' out in the middle o' the night."

That was the last that was heard of Molly. John Haverty refused to believe what the drover asserted, and swore that he knew the people that it was a calumny. The Rooneys having passed on from the place there was no one to bear witness against Molly's character, and nothing to prove her guilty but her own sudden flight. Haverty had the river dragged, rode to the neighboring villages, and inquired at the turnpikes on the road-side, but not a trace of Molly was found.

Two years passed, and the fame of Molly's appearance and disappearance in the district were told as a romantic story, and Haverty was pointed to as the young man who had been so "quarely crossed in love." Nevertheless, his farm was thriving, and his uncle, who had long since forgiven him for falling in love with the tramp who had so considerately taken herself off, did not despair of making a capital match for him yet, though Katty Nee was married.

Meantime the earth had not swallowed up Molly. She had rushed to the river first, but when she stood on the brink of the water she saw the arm raised above her head she fe- " after all death was worse than any thing that... happened to her yet. She wandered for days and nights, hungry and sick suffering, through deserted paths in the hills, till she made her way at last to the dwelling of a herd who lived at the other side the base of the tallest mountain that looked on the valley where so many strange haps had befallen her in so little a space of time. Here she arrived oppressively and was hired as a servant, and here she remained.

Molly worked well and learned many things; her employers were friendly and found her work. They were perched up so high on the mountain that they seemed to live beside the sun; the air was bracing and sweet, and the active life they led so healthful, that Molly grew strong in body and cheerful in mind, and could romp with her master's children and play at the ball with her singing, for the children's delight. By winter-time she had spun herself a peasant's dress of crimson flannel, with knitted blue worsted stockings for her feet.

The third year had begun, when on an autumn day John Haverty walked the hills with his black-thorn in hand, seeking this herd, who had charge of many cattle, wanting to put a flock under his care. Coming to a sunny rock very high in the blue air he met Molly face to face, coming along the narrow path with a bundle of purple heath on her shoulder. Molly herself, but bright, sunburnt, and buxom; hardly a trace of the old Molly left to know her by.

"Molly!" cried Haverty.

"Yes," said Molly.

He caught her hand in delight.

"No," said Molly, drawing it away, and with a proud lip. "Ye mustn't shake hands with a thief."

"Look here!" said John. "I never believed you guilty; I never believed you guilty suffer?"

"It was no lie, though," said Molly, hanging her head. "I was thrue."

"Whisht!" interrupted he, said Haverty. "An' what if ye did? Is it for the stalin' o' a rag o' a coat you'd make such a murther, an' you hungry, or—or somethin', I'll be bound?" he added, hesitatingly, with a pathetic look of appeal to her for a justification of herself.

"I was hungry," sobbed Molly, "an' my father was dyin' an' callin' for what I hadn't to give him. I never was taught any bether; but I've saved up the price of the coat out of wages I have earned—an' you'll give it to him, plase, when ye see him again. An' when ye tell to my wife about me don't call me Molly the thief, nor Molly the thrump, but just a friend o' years that ye were kind to when she was in throuble."

"I have no wife," said Haverty, "an' I'll never have wan but you."

John Haverty had his will, for they were married the next morning on their way home to the mountain-house in a nest of trees where Haverty lived with his mother. Darby, the drover, was paid to hold his tongue, and no one else dared believe a word against Haverty's wife. And Haverty's wife and the motherly woman are bosom friends.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

It is spoonful of yeast will raise fifty cents' worth of flour, how much will it take to raise funds enough to buy smoked herring?

PRINTERS' COMMANDMENTS.

Thou (especially the ladies) shalt love the printer, for he lovely you much.

Thou shalt subscribe to his paper, for he reciteth thee the latest news, of which you remain in ignorance.

It's a business man, thou shalt advertise, that thus thy goods may enable thee not only to pay for thy paper, but to make a little over.

Thou shalt not visit him regardless of his office rules, that he may not swear over you.

Thou shalt not read the manuscript in the heads of the compositors, for he will not hold their blameless.

Thou shalt not read the news before it is printed, for it is not fair to rise in thine own.

Thou shalt not at my time send abusive or threatening letter to the editor, nor corridde him more than five times a year.

Thou shalt not write communications on both sides of the paper, for the editor needeth the other side to light his cigar upon.

An Irishman remarked to his companion, on observing a lady pass, "Pat, did you ever see so thin a woman in all your life?" replied the other, "Faith, sir, when she is, I own a woman as thin as two of her put together, I have."

NINE HOURS AT THE SEA-SIDE

By Day.

Four of smoking, two of drinking,
Three of loafing—none of thinking.

By Night.

Two of sleeping, four of scratching,
Three of searching—none of catching.

JEREMY OF SCRIVELSBY.—We have heard that there has been difficulty in securing a Methodist minister to arrange a Scottish Valhalla. Scotch theology stops the way. Could not something be done by getting the eminent Scotchman as sole in the Temple of Fame?

KEEPING HER WORD.—A young lady having promised her gallant that she would never marry a certain fellow "on the face of the earth," repaired with him, after the ceremony, to the Mammoth Cave, in Kentucky, and was married underground.

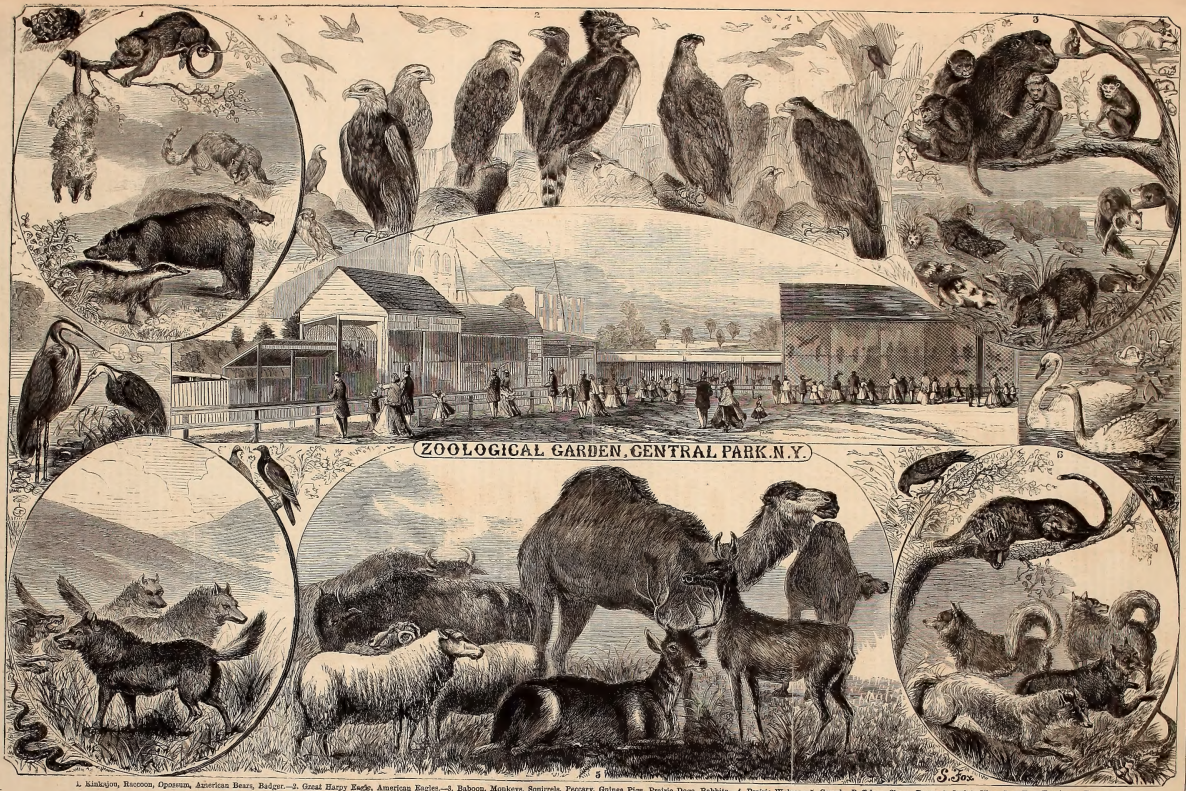
"Black Stockings of all colors," were lately advertised in a country newspaper.

A TAX NO ONE LIKES.—Attacks on one's purse.

Put the strongest-minded woman in a bonnet shop and it will instantly turn her head.

"You a dentist, Bob? I did not know you were in the profession." "Yes," said Bob, "I follow an easy business but setting teeth—in beef, potatoes, bread, and butter."

How like is the picture, isn't it?" asked the hostess; What life! what expression! what spirit!" It seems hard to believe," said the spouse, "that it is a mere piece of paint." "That want is its principal merit."



"I've buried my best friend," as the undertaker said when he interred the patch-work quilt.

"Of what use are forms?" exclaimed a pertinent legislator to Dr. Franklin, "you can not deny that they are of some use." "Certainly, my friend, and so are barrels, but nevertheless, they have their uses," quietly replied the doctor.

If any one wishes to know
The best way to worry a foe,
Don't go to inquisitive Sir Johns:
Don't call him opprobrious names;
Don't pull the hair out by roots;
Don't twit him with dyeing his hair;
Don't call him "old" by 2-ds' maze;
Don't threaten his limbs or his life;
Don't touch on his daughter or wife;
Don't tell him to "look in the glass;"
Don't call him a fool or an ass;
Don't tell him he rides very ill;
Don't run him with that "little bill;"
Don't snub him, or step him, or kick him;
Don't ask him, or ride him, or lick him;
There's a crueler trick to employ—
Give a donkey to a boy.

SOMETHING EXTRAORDINARY.—The following story is told of a gentleman well known in sporting circles. Being most desirous of purchasing a horse, and not a bit particular how he obtained it, take any thing, he rode up to an outlying, fox-shaved house and fast of. Both horse and rider returned home in perfect safety.

A cooper who was in need of hoop-poles beset a man to furnish him with some. "What kind o' 'em?" questioned the man. "Any where about so 'em?" questioned the man. "Any where about so if you can't do better." The cooper supposed he inquire of the seller where he got them. "Indeed, sir," was the reply, "I get them in the woods." "Where did you steal 'em?" "Oh, up in your woods," returned the man, jogging his pocket.

THE INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS COLLEGE ASSOCIATION.

WE present in this issue the portraits of the members of BRYANT, STRATTON, & CO.'s International Business College Convention, recently assembled in Convention at Cleveland, Ohio. This association of Colleges, as will be seen in the engraving, embraces nearly all the leading cities in the United States and Canada. The purpose of the Association is to combine the best talent in the country in perfecting and putting in practice a system of business education which shall be commensurate with the public demands. The enterprise was inaugurated by MESSRS. BRYANT & STRATTON, in the city of Chicago, in 1853, and has met with success altogether unprecedented. In fact, through the individual institutions, and the admirable text-books which these gentlemen have published, the system and spirit of a purely business education have been so clearly defined as those of law, medical, or theological schools; and it is becoming almost as necessary that a young man, in fitting himself for business, should graduate at one of these Colleges, as that a contestant for professional honors and success should take a preliminary course in an institution specially devoted to the studies incidental to such professions.

The great interest which at present this subject is creating in the public mind renders this representation of the leading enterprise eminently proper.

LIFE ON THE PLAINS.

THE threatening aspect of affairs on our western frontiers leads us to illustrate on page 644 some features incident to a trip across the Plains. In regard to the selection we shall let the artist speak in his own words:

"Our party of eight (including three artists) had quite an interesting trip over the Plains. Two of our artists I have sketched; it is entitled 'Storm on the Plains.' A hurricane took down our tents and blew away heavy loaded wagons, on the 30th of the 9th June, near Cottonwood, Nebraska. Fortunately no serious damage resulted to any one, though some of the train were badly frightened. Some days that just as he was crawling out of the tent his oxen were saluted by a piercing wail and a terrific cry of 'Oh, have you seen my baby?' He looked back and saw the tent down with his wife under it, turned his head, and lo! over went the wagon with the boy down under it; and here was a woman before him wringing her hands and screaming for her baby. Les jeunes gens are natural-born duffing fault-finders, have enlivened the camp by their presence, and have made us humorously, tired and, much disappointed with appearances to-day. Though you have published one or two street scenes in Denver I send the one herewith, which gives a good view of the mountains beyond. It is a different view from any hitherto published, and I think from a better point.

"Fort Wise, Colorado, is noted as the ranche where a brave man and wife named GODFREY held over two hundred Indians at bay for two days during the height of the war—killing many and wounding others, and finally driving them off.

"The tide of emigration and enterprise is setting hither and in astonishing rate, yet it is not to be wondered at when one sees the immense wealth of this region. Denver, a city of seven thousand inhabitants, is well built, and is the commercial centre of a mining region where already over twenty millions of capital are invested in quartz mills and the like. It already needs the eyes of a paper to discern that as the prospective terminus of the Eastern branch of the grandest national highway of the world—the railroad to the Pacific—and as the great outfitting place for trains for Montana, Idaho, and Utah, its growth must be rapid and its destiny that of a great city.

"MESSRS. BAYARD TAYLOR, WM. H. BEARD, WHITTREDGE, and Major-General POPE, are travelling this way before. I have only met BEARD, but expect to meet him and MR. TAYLOR in the South Park, whither I am now journeying.

"By accident I met FRED KNEVELDT, Esq., Melter and Refiner, United States Branch Mint, at Denver. I was shown through all the departments of that establishment, and send a sketch of the Assay Room."

THE RACES AT JEROME PARK.

THE AMERICANS have at last got a Derby of their own. A similar course under the auspices of "The American Jockey Club" has been organized at Fordham, Westchester County, New York, which has been laid out and finished in a complete and judicious manner, both as to the track, the stands, and the stables. The aim of the American Jockey Club is not simply to render horse-racing permanent at Jerome Park, but to dignify it, and insure the improvement of horses and the education of the public taste as to horse-racing generally. At the head of this laudable enterprise are gentlemen of the highest social position—such men as LEONARD JEROME, LEONARD W. JEROME (from whom the Park is named), W. BUTLER DUNCAN, J. P. PURDY, and W. R. TRAVERS. Horse-racing is inevitable, and we are glad that this attempt has been made to give it dignity and to remove from it many of its degrading associations. An important feature in Jerome Park is the arrangement which has been made for the presence of ladies, and which secures these from all intrusion as effectually as if they were at a matinée in their own drawing-rooms.

The establishment at Jerome Park will inaugurate a new era not only in horse-racing but also in horse-breeding.

"From the most reliable statistics," says JOHN B. HAVENS, Secretary of the American Jockey Club, "we may set it down in round numbers that there are now, in the different States, four millions five hundred thousand horses—including, of course, thorough-breds. Now some of these command a high price. I know that $20,000 was once offered to my much-loved, valued, honored friend, COLONEL HAMPTON, for Monarch, and refused. Prism cost a great deal more than this to import him. Eureka, the invincible Kentucky, the noblest son of his noble sire, from the high reputation he has won for himself as the big fin distinguished career on the turf, could command any price his fortunate owner thought proper to value him at. But $7000 is frequently given for colts and fillies of promise, in their three-year-o. l form; but putting all the horses down at the low estimate of $75 per head, even at this low rate of $75 per head, would make the prodigious amount of their value $337,000,000, or more than three times the whole cotton and woolen manufacturing capital of the United States.

"May we not contend with reason, then, that the breeding of fine horses, and the institution that seems immediately promising to do so, The Turf, is a most important one to the prosperity of the whole country, and ought to be encouraged and patronized very universally by all classes and conditions of men?"

MR. IRVING gives the following description of the Park:

"This race-track is located on the old Bathgate Farm, near Fordham, Westchester County, State of New York, on the road leading from Kingsbridge, and comprises some 230 acres.

"The land is of somewhat peculiar formation: the valley through which the Croton Aqueduct is conducted to the city of New York runs through the centre of the farm, and is bounded on the sides by hills some fifty feet in height, with a bluff or spur jutting out in about the centre, on which bluff the old homestead was situated.

"This formation made it necessary to cut a track of somewhat novel shape, with a straight stretch and two curves skirting the foot of the hills, and by placing the grand stand on the centre curve, the whole course is brought under immediate view, to the track in the line of the bluff is easily ascended by steps cut from the home stretch.

"The course is about a quarter or a mile from the main road, and the main entrance to the course is on the new avenue now building from the Harlem River to the Central Bridge over the Harlem River, and extending on the same line to the city of New York.

"The grand stand is on the east side of the course, and is 250 feet in length, by 40 feet in depth, and contains or galleries of seats, and will accommodate 8000 persons. There are also in the centre two sections in the centre one of which is exclusively for the members of the Club and their friends, and the other section are for the public.

"The land facing the track presents an open colonnade, two stories high, supported by ornamental iron columns, surmounted by a balcony, and extending on the centre, and each end presenting a very airy and attractive appearance.

"The galleries are fitted up with comfortable seats, and all of which a perfect view of the course and surrounding grounds is obtained.

"Immediately in the rear of the grand, on the bluff above mentioned, are the Club grounds, on which are the club-house and other buildings. The club-house consists of the members of the Club, including an observatory for the use of ladies.

"The stands for judges, time-keepers, starters, and for the accommodation of the reporters of the press, are those of the press, are in keeping with the style of the other buildings.

"At the north of and adjoining the grand stand is an open stand with a colonnade in front, for the exhibition of seventy horses, which are built in detached groups; each group being separated by a wall of privet 9 feet each, and surrounded by sheds ten feet in width—the kitchens for the accommodation of the grooms and others—adjoining the stables is a hall suite of exercising tanks.

Jerome Park was inaugurated by the celebration of its first horse-races on the 20th of September. Several Grand and Maiden Stakes were run or entered, and there was a large and enthusiastic concourse of spectators. The inauguration race was won by Kentucky, owned by J. Hunting, against Fleetwing, Onward, and Idlewild. It was a four-mile heat, and was run by Kentucky in 7.35.

The opening day was not all but the remaining races had to be postponed, on account of the rain which set in the next day, until the following week.

BOATS ON THE BAYOU LAFOURCHE.

ON engraving shows the manner in which boats are drawn by the wild Acadian boatmen. Those with sails set are progressing in the other direction. To see these men laboring along in the noonday heat of the sun, hauling their boats, is sufficient proof that white men can work in the South as well as negroes. Besides these Acadian boatmen of the bayous I saw other white men working in the part of Louisiana; these were making sugar on their own plantations, and told me they stood it very well. The unacclimated suffer from fever—most probably grow sick, from the continual heat and dampness of the atmosphere; but it is certain that the whites born here can work in the fields if they choose.

ZOOLOGICAL COLLECTION IN CENTRAL PARK.

THE collection of animals at the New York Central Park, of which we give an illustration on page 652, has been for years steadily increasing until it now numbers nearly 800 specimens. Of these 200 are birds. There are eight specimens of the monkey, of which two are chacma baboons. The collection includes two American bears, two remarkably fine prairie wolves, two silver-gray foxes, quite a number of squirrels, white rats and white mice, an American porcupine, a Polish badger, two rabbits, Guinea pigs, elk and deer, sheep of the finest breed, and a few buffaloes. Among the birds are eagles, hawks, and many pelicans, a few flamingoes, storkcocks, pigeons, larks, parrots, and wild ducks. Besides these there are of the reptile class twenty-three specimens, including alligators and several varieties of the tortoise.

These animals have been presented to the Park Commissioners by private individuals for the most part, but some of the swans were presented by European cities. Thus the Senate of the city of Hamburg presented to the Park a pair of swans which had on another tea white swans. Twenty-four swans were donated by the "Worshipful Company of Vintners" of London, and twenty-six more by the "Worshipful Company of Dyers" of the same city.

This collection, already one of great interest, is but the nucleus of what will in time become the Great Zoological Garden of America. Our illustration, drawn by STANLEY FOX, includes specimens of all the most interesting varieties of this zoological collection as it now exists.

A MAN WITH A LARGE FAMILY.

THE Old Woman who lived in a Shoe is the traditional representative of the parent afflicted with a large family. The Old Woman might have had seventy children, yet, as she had none, certainly she had as many "she didn't know what to do." There is a man in Bristol, however, who beats the Old Woman out of sight with respect to the number of his family. How many has he, then? the reader will ask. Well, to reply with the same precision with which answers a fond old mamma of a fashionable infant, he has twenty-four children. Twenty-four children! Euclid, once described a rout in a ship's side as "about as large as a bit of string." It may be said that George Muller of Bristol has more than a million children. Place them in a line, with a couple of yards between each of them, and then count up what space will be covered by one thousand one hundred and fifty children—that being the number for which George Muller has to provide daily. It is considered a large family when fifteen sit down to table; but eleven hundred and fifty! That is something like a family. What a fortune the man must have to fill so many mouths! It is a respectable colony that has to be dealt with! Eleven hundred and fifty dinners for three hundred and sixty-five days a year; ditto breakfasts and teas; eleven hundred and fifty children to clothe and to educate! Then they are children which are more fit subjects than ordinary dwellings. Beds for eleven hundred and fifty; school-rooms for eleven hundred and fifty play-grounds for eleven hundred and fifty; nurseries for a large portion of the eleven hundred and fifty; play-grounds for those who are old enough to dance on the new fashion of swing on the roundabout, and toys for the little ones. Then there is an army of nurses, and teachers, and servants, to pay the money for. What a fortune that man must have!" The surmise is entirely erroneous. George Muller is a poor man. He has nothing but what he chose to give him, and the rule of his life is never to ask any body for any thing, and never to publish the name of any help who gives to him. What! A poor man keep eleven hundred and fifty children in these handsome dwellings, feed them, clothe them, and educate them? Yes! For eighty-six years! Ay, year; and yet it is not preposterous, when the matter is explained. Although it may have something of the wonderful and even of the miraculous in it.

George Muller whose name will probably hereafter be identified with the history of the age, as Robert Raikes is identified with Sunday-schools, is a Prussian by birth, having been born at Kroppenstadt, near Halberstadt, in Prussia. His father was a collector of excise for the Prussian Government. In 1829 Mr. Muller came to England, with the intention of becoming a minister in connection with the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. This connection, however, never took place, and he became the minister of a small congregation of "Brethren" at Teignmouth. In 1834 he went to Bristol, and with Henry Craik, the eminent Hebrew scholar, became a minister among the Brethren there. These co-workers stipulated that they should have no fixed salary—a practice which Mr. Muller had seen at Teignmouth; and from that day to this Mr. Muller has never had any salary, although he has preached regularly in Bristol for over thirty years. A man who has no means, who declines to accept a salary, and who also makes it a fixed rule of life never to ask any body for any thing, is not a promising candidate. Mr. Muller, having adopted this course, had nothing to depend upon but what people who knew his habits chose to give him. No person would send him a present of a hat; another would send him a suit of clothes; and it happened at times that these presents gifted to Mr. Muller came exactly when they were wanted, and Mr. Muller occasionally was dressed in the reverse of what is called "the extreme of fashion." He was also very cheerful; and shortly before 1836, notwithstanding the fact that many a time he had not sixpence in the world, he conceived the idea that it was his duty to do something in the way of providing for poor orphans who had lost both father and mother in death. Accordingly, on the 5th of April, 1836, he hired the house he was then living in at No. 6 Wilson Street, Bristol, for thirty orphans, who were to be supported in the same way as himself—that is, by the bounty of donors, who under no circumstances were asked for any thing, and whose names, whether they gave much or little, were never published. Viewed as an ordinary attempt to provide for orphans, there was an extraordinary experiment. What followed is a perfect romance of faith and benevolence. Often, after Mr. Muller had filled the orphan-house, perhaps, he was reduced to the last extremity to provide for them. Sometimes he had to sell furniture to supply them with food. He had made a rule never to go into debt, and to pay for every thing as it was bought; and many a time at the close of the day he had no money for orphans to-morrow. Still the orphans never went without either food or without ample clothing. The struggles were extraordinary; and the number of the orphans extreme occasionally; but hour were frequently met is one of the most singular stories that ever was written. Mr. Muller was an enthusiast in the work he had undertaken; and believing that all his needs were supplied in answer to prayer he went on increasing his accommodation for orphans. According to all ordinary calculations he had gone too far with his practical philanthropy; but to there never came a time when orphans applied for by him to took them in, and then his house got too small to hold them. He was almost overwhelmed with pecuniary difficulties, but instead of being dismayed he took another house. The two houses became too small for his ever-increasing family, and he took a third house, and then a fourth. Into these four houses his family of orphans increased to one hundred and eighteen; and as the number continued to increase Mr. Muller decided to build a large house, in which he could place all the orphans together. He selected a site at Ashley Down, about two miles from Bristol, and the land and building cost over fifteen thousand pounds. Still the money needed for any month's supply began to know the work he was engaged in, for they could see the orphans and the magnificent house which had been built for them.

The New Orphan House at Ashley Down was intended for three hundred and thirty orphans, into the four houses in Wilson Street, which, however, this vast establishment soon became too small. Then Mr. Muller built a second house for four hundred more orphans; but after both these fine Welsh orphans were still brought from all parts of the country to Mr. Muller's doors; and seeing that his accommodation was still too small, he erected a third house to hold four hundred and fifty more orphans. These three houses are now full. The expenses in connection with them last year—independent of the cost of building and furnishing—was over twelve thousand pounds, this being the current annual expenditure. Mr. Muller adheres to his old plan: nobody is asked for any help, and all this money comes up annually. A very large number list of subscribers, as in connection with other institutions. Since Mr. Muller commenced the orphanage work he has received for the orphans the extraordinary sum of £233,485, 11s. 1½d. He publishes strictly-kept accounts; but whether a donor gives a single sum or thousands in one name is given. It is no uncommon thing to see in these reports gifts of £1000, £2000, £3000, and upward, until the only indication of the personality of the donors are a couple of initial letters.

In the reception of the orphans there is no seclusion distinguishing feature, and whether favor or partiality the orphans are received in the order in which application is made for them. No interest is required to get them admitted; the only limit is the accommodation. Some time ago Mr. Muller found that his three large houses, built for eleven hundred and fifty orphans, were full, and he has commenced the erection of a fourth, which is to be followed by a fifth. When these new houses are completed there will be accommodation for two thousand orphans.

The institution has already become more than national. It has been in all parts of the world, as we may see by the list of contributions received during the last year. These contributions include donations from all parts of England and Ireland, from the East Indies, from Australia, from Natal, from Demerara, from New Zealand, the United States, Canada, the Cape of Good Hope, and many other places. The donations vary from a few coppers saved by an errand-boy to a thousand pounds. Sometimes they send jewelry to be sold for the benefit of the orphans, others send various articles of clothing, and others send money. Thousands upon thousands of pounds in cash and notes have been dropped anonymously into Mr. Muller's letter-box. The donors who reside in Bristol have before them the work; and the New Orphan Houses being open to the public on certain days in the week, they are visited by persons from all parts of the country.

The three houses now in operation contain, as already stated, eleven hundred and fifty orphans. Each of the houses is built on the very best principles to insure the health of the inmates. The various rooms are heated by steam, and the ventilation being excellent, the mortality among the orphan children is very low. The girls are trained for servants, and remain in the institution till they are fourteen or fifteen years of age; the boys remain till they are fourteen, when they are sent out as apprentices to such trades as they may select. As an interesting sight to see so many orphans well cared for; but when it is known how they are provided for—entirely by voluntary gifts—the character of the institution to give any thing—Mr. Muller and his large family give a complete answer to the cynics who assume that charity is a matter with or other mixed up with the world's charity.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

CAN we find any but political news to present to the readers of this "Gossip?" The journals of the day are overflowing with matter pertaining to the "Political Campaign," and quite a willing process is necessary to obtain items which are not connected with the "Constitutional Amendment," "My Policy," "Action of Congress," "Objections to Amendment," "Amendment and Reply," "Supporters of Constitutional Amendment," and topics of similar import. The speech of SENATOR SUMNER on the Reconstruction, and the announcement that Mr. Whate-his-name is not a Candidate, are just now facts of vital importance to—those concerned. We do not undervalue the political topics of our column; yet this is not because we fancy our readers—a majority of whom are not interested in the political issue of the great questions of the day. What concerns our country concerns us all; and we do not believe there exists in our land, even among the most fashionable and careless fair ones, who would say, with a certain—

"Who's in or out, who moves the grand machine, Nor aims my curiosity nor spleen."

Secrets of State no more I wish to know
Than secret nonsense of the beau monde.

To the contrary, the great political questions which are constantly agitating our country as a whole, are ecclesiastical questions in all classes, are personalities, each one employing freedom of thought and speech. Yet, although no one is amenable to another in regard to opinion, there is a higher law which should govern all; and no one has a right to be on the wrong side in moral questions—and many of our political questions are moral ones.

We can not forbear quoting from some expressive lines, written by a lady, whose views, in so far as therein exhibited, are worthy to be adopted:

"When a patriot fails must he fall in the battle,
Where the cannon's loud roar is his only death-rattle?

There's a washer where none but the morally brave stand; nobly and firmly their country to save.
On the war of opinion, where few can be found.
On the fountain of principle, guarding the ground,
With valiant eyes ever watching the foes,
Who are growling about them and aiming their blows.

At the recent Convention of Sailors and Soldiers, held at Pittsburg, many thousand warriors, heroes of many fights, from the highest officer down to the drummer-boy, responded to what they regarded as another call of their country, lit their peaceful homes, and met together with flag, and banner, and other insignia of battle—although the battle in prospect was only one of opinion. Many a hero, maimed in his country's cause, enthusiastically proved at this convention that, even though minus arm or leg, he had lost none of his keen interest in his country's weal.

The war on thieves, commenced by the city author ities about a couple of months ago, still continues with unabated vigor. Although many have become frightened, have left the city, enough remain to render watching a profitable, especially as some of the more fashionable thieves, who have been receiving booty at various watering-places and other summer resorts, have now returned to their ordinary field of operations.

This is a specially interesting year to all who are in any way connected with American Agriculture. Throughout the country an enthusiastic benevolence has been awakened in the Methodist denomination to mark this Centennial year by extensive thank-offerings to important objects outside their usual charities. The Centenary Fund, which is hereby designed for educational purposes, has been increased from time to time in a most liberal spirit. At the recent Conference in Lockport, Rev. Matthew Hickey, best as the Cooper Institute in this city, one of the most successful and generous ever known in the annals of Methodism was taken up. It amounted to $613,490.

The making of paper collars is a very flourishing and important branch of business. It is said that there is at the present time about $10,000,000 invested in the manufacture of paper collars and cuffs, and from 3000 to 4000 persons are finding profitable employment in this business. Unfortunately, a quarrel has arisen among them, and there is a prospect that the strife will absorb a good share of the profits. The quarrel hinges upon patents. The validity of certain patents will be contested by the opposing parties, and it is quite likely the courts of the land will have to devote most of their spare time to the matter for some years to come.

REVELATIONS EXPOUNDED.—The Times announces that

"On Monday, October 8, there will be a partial eclipse of the sun, which will be visible in New England and in that part of the State of New York which is northeast of a line drawn on a map from the city of Rochester to the Light-house on Fire Island, Long Island."

What sense is to be eclipsed is not stated, but we presume it is to be John-son; as we believe an eclipse of that luminary commenced in New England not long ago, and has been making itself perceptible in the Times office lately. If otherwise understood the intelligence given would be truly distressing, as the Times proceeds to say:

"This eclipse will be the last of the sun visible in the United States until the magnificent one of August 7, 1869."

Or are we to understand that old Sol himself is to be taken in for repairs, and that we are to be "under a cloud" for three years, when we shall receive a "renovated" sun, vanquished Ye. No, it is obvious that a political prediction is intended, for the Times continues:

"when the shadow of the moon will pass over and produce a total eclipse in part of seven States."

What total eclipse is intended by the phrase "a total eclipse in part," we can not say; but the seven States eclipsed are evidently seven States which will reject the Congressional Amendment, and which will be "totally eclipsed, in part," from the Union, by the Forty-first Congress.

The Rev. Dr. Francis L. Hawks, whose death recently occurred in this city, made many valuable contributions to literature during his life of nearly threescore years and ten. Several legal and historical works were prepared by him; and under the nom de plume of "Uncle Philip," he, at various times, amused through the Harpers a number of volumes of juvenile works.

Madame Ristori lately appeared in a very pleasant private character. Having learned of the peculiar misfortunes and destitute circumstances of the Italian family in Elm Street, whose case has attracted so much attention recently, she paid them a visit of condolence and sympathy last week, and after giving them something for temporary relief, Madame Ristori told the mother that she should place for their benefit $1000 in the hands of some party, who would invest it for their best interest. The visit of the noted actress was soon noised about the locality, and an immense crowd gathered about the premises, giving the lady a hearty salutation as she drove away from the scene.

A letter from Lucerne, in the Cologne Gazette, says: "Rarely has so wet a month of August been witnessed in Switzerland. In the Bernese Oberland the smallest stream has become a torrent from the heavy rain. The Rhigi and Mount Pilate offer magnificent scenery such as are not mentioned in any guide-book, and the tops of these mountains are covered with snow as in the middle of winter." Abundance of rain and cold weather seem to have prevailed every where. A letter from Malta has just come to hand, from which we give an extract indicating the state of the atmosphere in that section of the country:

"I arrived here Friday night. It was very cold then, and it has been growingly more and more intensely frigid ever since. The only redeeming feature about the weather is, that (as we say in January) it has been 'warm enough to-day,' and which it has continued to do vigorously ever since I came, with only one or two short cold nips just to take breath, as it were. As the weather this morning, I have not had the courage to go and examine. From the pattering on the pavilion the window, I should judge, however, that it might be 'wet, by-and-by, and be cloudy.'

"Saturday the exercises consisted principally in my taking a severe cold (first appearance in any character for a year). This little investment I doubled at the Old South Church next morning. A fine 'c slight cold.' E. mentioned this morning that she had a 'slight cold;' and from a pretty wide range of observation, during my limited visit here, coupled with considerable research and inquiry, I incline to the opinion that a person isn't well in the latitude unless he or she has a 'slight cold.' The system seems to require it here; it is a normal condition of health. And if a person should wake up some morning and find the symptoms this indispensable attachment he should at once consult the nearest regular physician. Beware of his kind, however, are very rare in this section."

Letters from Cornell Grove, Kansas, state that recently a tremendous shower of grasshoppers visited that place, completely filling the air as high as the court-tree, and looking like a driving snow-storm. In a few moments the ground, trees, house, and every thing green was completely covered. In less than two hours the leaves of trees, bushes, corn, and every thing green was devoured. This is about as bad as one of the plagues of Egypt in olden times.

A Mr. Green died recently in Georgia aged 103 years, 6 months, and 3 days. She had cut three sets of teeth, the last being small, and like a squirrel's. Up to six years ago she had worked two or three days with the greatest ease. About eight years ago her eyesight failed her when she had her set of teeth, about two years ago, it improved very much. Her eldest son died in Louisiana a few months ago, at the age of 81 or 82 years.

Cockroaches are a terrible nuisance in the city. All sorts of poisons and powders are used for their extermination, but, generally, in vain, as they certainly encrease. An English paper gives the following "effectual and refreshing" remedy for them: and though we can not recommend it as being a concerned method, it certainly has the claim to originality:

A gentleman in Bristol whose kitchen used to be highly overrun by cockroaches, procured a hedgehog and had it put down for the night, allowing it a snug corner near the hearth for a lodging, as the creature is fond of heat. In a few nights his kitchen was quite rid of the insects. He had the curiosity to watch its proceedings. When the house was quiet, and the fire was covered with the insects, the hedgehog would issue from its lurking place, and, moving slowly over the kitchen grate, and—(may though the animal cockroaches with agility of a cat) pointed toes (as pigs are by one tit it had hunted the mortal career of all to sight. Then it went HOME and quietly commenced to eat them up at its leisure. Although a very timid animal, it would venture out in the most populous of any one who sat still and did not disturb it.

The following graphic description of a case of assault, recently brought before the Court of Special Sessions, occurs in one of the daily newspapers. We commend it to the notice of any of the legal profession who are about issuing Law Reports:

It seems that Mrs. C. had a little dog in her lap, when Mrs. B. came and kicked the dog; and when Mrs. C. expostulated with Mrs. B. Mrs. B. threatened to kick Mrs. C., as well as the little lit. dog. Accordingly, Mrs. B. did pitch into Mrs. C. and the little D., and Mrs. C. brought Mrs. B. into Court. The little D., not having been subpœnaed, was not present. Judgment suspended.

The COLTON DENTAL ASSOCIATION, 19 Cooper Institute originated and has ever since stood ready to extract teeth without pain, and they certainly do it.

"The ladies of our household indorse it as unrivaled."—BENNETT'S Cocoaine for the Hair, and Flavoring Extracts for Cooking purposes.—Home Journal.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

[From Rev. J. W. Poland's Autobiography.]

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was organized. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a distressing cough. I was led to use White Pine, previously thought that a preparation having for its base the essence of the oil of white pine might be compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of the White Pine Compound, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine I had been planning, and gave it to the afflicted one. The result was accordingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was relieved, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. So much for this. I was soon after called to visit a lady who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and which soon became settled with blood. She soon found relief, and was cured. She took about ten ounces of it and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled."—Scientific American.

The Great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, consumption, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for dislocated joints, from the most ordinary sprain to the gravest, and for pleas and scurvy it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicines generally.

The Elliptic Sewing Machine Co.'s
HIGHEST PREMIUM
Lock Stitch Sewing Machines,
No. 343 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
After a severe and impartial test, received
ALL THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS
AT THE NEW YORK STATE FAIR OF 1866,
FOR THE
"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,"
"BEST DOUBLE-THREAD MACHINE,"
AND FOR THE
"BEST SAMPLES OF MACHINE WORK,"
As can be seen by the following comprehensive and conclusive report of the Committee of practical and experienced mechanical experts appointed by the State Board to investigate into the merits of the different Sewing Machines:
"We, the Committee on Sewing Machines, after a careful and thorough investigation into the respective merits of the various machines submitted for examination, find the Elliptic Lock Stitch Sewing Machine to be superior to all others in the following points, viz.:
"Simplicity and thoroughness of mechanical construction;
"Ease of operation and management;
"Noiselessness and rapidity of movement;
"Beauty, strength, and elasticity of stitch;
"Variety and perfection of attachments and range of work;
"Compactness and beauty of model and finish;
"Adaption to material of any class or thickness by any adjustable Feed Bar; and in the
"Unequaled precision with which it executes the lock stitch by means of the Elliptic Hook, and we therefore award it the FIRST PREMIUM as the
"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.
"And for the above reasons the FIRST PREMIUM as the "BEST DOUBLE THREAD SEWING MACHINE.
"C. E. FETTER,
"HOCTOR MOFFATT,
"Committee."
Signed,
The above report fully accords with the almost unanimous opinion of the best impartial Judges and Sewing Machine experts, as well as of all others who have used this unrivaled machine, which is incomparably the most simple in construction; the most efficient in operation; the most easy, rapid, and noiseless of movement; the most economical and durable in use; and the most complete in the variety and perfection of its attachments for every kind of work, and therefore infinitely the most perfect Family Sewing Machine; for which purpose its superiority is pre-eminent and unquestionable.
Machines (which are warranted for two years) forwarded to any part of the world, with printed instructions (which will enable any one to operate them without the slightest difficulty) for use, on receipt of the price in current funds or by draft. Circulars may be sent, payment to be collected on delivery, on receipt of satisfactory assurance that it will then be made; and all orders from a distance will be as faithfully filled as if a personal visit and selection had been made.
Liberal arrangements with parties of energy, good standing, and capital, who may wish to engage in the sale of these machines, as agents, in such territory as yet remains unoccupied; for further information in regard to which, and for private circular, address

THE NEW ORLEANS REPORT.

THE Report of the military board of inquiry into the New Orleans riot confirms the opinion which every intelligent reader had formed from the facts published at the time. It was a preconcerted massacre of white and colored Union men by late rebel soldiers, with the assistance of the mob and the police, under the general direction of Mayor MONROE, who, while an unpardoned rebel, was elected to his office, and was pardoned by President JOHNSON expressly that he might assume it. The facts of the case are appalling. It is another of the tragical lessons which the people of this country can not safely disregard if they expect to secure public order and the authority of law. It shows us the imperative necessity of acting according to the facts, and not upon any general theory, however generous or plausible. The country must look the truth squarely in the face, and the truth is that the party which elected MONROE, and which planned and executed the fiendish slaughter in New Orleans, is the party with which the President and the Democratic party are allied, and which is again seeking the control of the Government. The success of the Democratic party would be the success of Mayor MONROE and the New Orleans conspirators, whoever would not see a man like MONROE the chief magistrate of any city will not vote so as to put into power the party which pollutes and defends his crimes.

Moreover, there is no reason to suppose that the bitterness and ferocity of feeling which is proved by this massacre to exist in one city is confined to that city. The riot at Memphis, if less elaborately organized, sprang from precisely the same spirit. The incredibly fierce tone of a large part of the newspapers in the late insurgent States, the private correspondence from that quarter of thousands at the North, universal experience and human nature itself, warn us that the worst of passions have survived actual hostilities; and that Generals GRANT, THOMAS, and SHERIDAN spoke merely the truth when they said that a military force must for a long time be maintained in that part of the country. Individual expressions of acquiescence are of little avail in the presence of the overwhelming evidence of the general hostility sentiment of the whole section. Any known Union man is, by the very nature of the case, a more competent witness of the actual condition of the South than any Northern late rebel. When an Alabama judge, like Mr H. D. CLAYTON, lately a rebel general, in exhorting his fellow-citizens to their duty, tell them that they ought not to "sit down night and day cursing and gnawing their chains," but to conform to law, it is very evident that the spirit of the exhortation will hardly lead to a very hearty and zealous conformity. When the bench can express its acquiescence in no more satisfactory terms, the "bar" at the neighboring grocery will be very likely to do what it can to avenge its "chains;" and when Union men declare that they live in constant peril their testimony is confirmed by the tone of such an "acquiescing" judge.

Does it surprise any one who reads the Report of which we are speaking, and who reflects upon the state of society which it reveals, that the delegates to the Loyal Southern Convention at Philadelphia spoke and speak as they did? GOVERNOR PARSON, Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, and other late rebel leaders, who were sustained by the sympathy of their section during the war, and enjoyed the honors of the rebellion without the least apprehension of suffering after its overthrow either from the Government or from their neighbors, talk in very smooth and dainty phrase of acquiescence and forgetfulness and conciliation. But the men whom the rebels during the war hated and hunted, and whom after the war they still hate and persecute, may, it seems to us, be allowed a little rhetorical warmth in the expression of their feelings. They declare that in their judgment, if we would radically and rapidly establish order in the disturbed section, we must make the rebel chiefs ineligible to office and enfranchise all our friends of whatever color. That is the revolutionary and anarchical doctrine with which they are charged. The Report of the New Orleans Commission makes it seem simply common-sense.

It can not be doubted that the New Orleans massacre has done more than the abstract argument of a year to impress the country with the conviction that it was not wisely hope for peace at the South so long as inequality of guarantees of personal and political liberty endure. That is the question which will now be steadily agitated until it is settled. The temper of the people at present inclines them to leave its solution to the necessary operation of the Constitutional Amendment. But the refusal of that measure will indicate a spirit with which the people will take the heroic method. The signs of this resolution are too plain to be avoided. The prompt adoption or refusal of the Amendment by the unrepresented States, after the elections show that it is the present essential condition of restoration, will serve as a test of the actual situation of those States. Their persistent refusal will show that the quality of their acquiescence has been misapprehended, and in the light of this knowledge the next step will be taken. If they adopt it, as we believe they will, the whole difficulty will be made more simple, and we shall be inclined to anticipate a speedy end of the disorders of every question. But, as we remarked last week, Congress has not tied its own hands, and there is no power which can tie them. We may be very sure that the new Congress will fully represent the sentiment of the country, and that its action will be truly the popular will.

The Report of the Commission leaves the tragical part of the President in the New Orleans massacre unchanged. It does not, however, alter or weaken the conviction that he had already taken sides against the Convention, and was therefore unable to act wisely or humanely. Nothing is sadder than to observe, in his as in all passing events, his utter inability to comprehend the situation, or to give even a logical appearance to his own acts. Yet it is unfortunate that the path of duty has been made so plain to the country. If the President had been a shrewd or reticent man, had he attempted the demilitarization of the Union party with greater skill; had he protected the plainest rights of American citizens by defending the debates of the Convention at New Orleans, he might have been secure for the popular mind than it now is that the total defeat of the party and the policy with which he is allied is essential to the national welfare.

SHORT CROPS.

As usual at this season there is an active amount of croaking about the crops. The rain has injured the wheat, and owing to cold weather in August the corn crop has not ripened. As for cotton, that is a total failure. In some places the mischief is due to rain, in others to insects, in others to want of labor, in others to want of seed. The cause in the cause may have been the result is the same; the crop is far below general expectation. Some say 1,250,000 bales will be made; others not more than 1,000,000. Altogether the prospect is blue.

This is what the newspapers tell us; and parties in the trade aver that their statements are correct.

Yet we have not the smallest hesitation in stating that, to the best of our knowledge and belief, there is not one atom of truth in all the stories of short crops.

It is quite likely that in some localities the cold weather of August and the rains of September may have injured the cereal crops. But if they injured the harvest in one meridian, they benefited it in another, and so the total damage is nothing. The Ohio country is so large, and the land under cultivation so various, that it is hardly possible for the whole to be simultaneously affected by rain, or frost, or drought. The year in which it would injure the wheat in Kentucky might help it in Minnesota; heat that would be fatal in Indiana would be just the thing in Wisconsin; rains that would be deplorable in Iowa would be very welcome in Southern Ohio. We have never had a full crop in this country, and probably never shall have one. But if we ever have, the price of food will fall even lower than it ruled when corn went a-begging in Illinois and ten cents a bushel. Remember that on the prairies used it for fuel. Every year the crop fails in some localities owing to drought, or rain, or heat, or frost. The glory of the New Mightied region is that it has short and long crops; the newspapers re-echo the cry, and forth it goes to the world. How is it with foore fortunate localities, when there is no shortcoming? They rarely hold their peace. They know that a prevailing belief in a short crop will insure them higher prices for their grain, and they are shrewd enough to know that in their region the harvest is a full average. Very often the cry of "short crop" is so loud and apparently general that a speculation in produce is started. Then, unfortunately, do the people of the prosperous regions forbear to let their good fortune be known. They are mute as fishes when the hard times country has been taught by the newspapers that a famine is impending, and the speculators have put prices up to a point which renders it profitable to import American wheat from Liverpool, these wary farmers have generally a fair supply to send to market—so much, in fact, as not unfrequently to break the speculation.

As to the cotton crop, we have no doubt but the original estimates of from two to two and a half millions of bales will be realized. Last year the soundest authorities refused to believe that the crop could amount to a million bales; yet over two millions came to market. At present the popular estimate, as we said, is 1,000,000 @ 1,250,000 bales. It is probably quite true, as alleged, that unfavorable weather has injured the crop in some localities. But the region in which cotton is grown, extending from the Atlantic sea-board to the American desert, and from the border of Mexico to the Ohio and the Arkansas, is a pretty extensive country. There is room in that region for crop-failures in many counties without necessarily involving a falling off in the aggregate crop. We remember that even in 1864, when the crop exceeded 5,000,000 bales, there were localities which produced nothing. It must be remembered that, under the food crop, it is the interest of all parties concerned to spread the belief that the cotton crop is short. A short crop means high prices. If Alabama can persuade the world that Mississippi will produce no cotton this year, she will get 30 per cent. more for her yield. Every story of unfavorable weather, of difficulty about labor, thrills the New York and Liverpool cotton markets, and puts money in the pocket of those who own cotton. The prevailing rumors of short crop must be read by the light of these facts.

For the rest, namely, the use which is being made of the cry of short crops in the gold market, quite a number of new considerations come into play. Gold has risen from 145 to 150, not so much on the belief in a short cotton and corn crop as upon the scarcity of gold at the financial centres, upon the now general habit of importers to "hedge" against a decline in goods by short sales of gold. The custom among importers now is to sell at least half as much gold "short" as they have on hand. This, it is considered, places them in a conservative position. If gold falls, they make on their gold what they lose on their goods. If it rises, their goods rise in proportion. But meanwhile they are at the mercy of the operators of the Gold-Room, who, calculating to a fraction how much gold is short, and how much these importers require, can "corner" the market, and compel the shorts to pay them from ½ to 1 per cent. a day for the use of the deficiency. This would not be surprising if the speculators, using the manifest advantages of their position, should run up the premium four or five per cent. higher than it is now. It would be a mistake to ascribe the advance to a confirmation of the prevailing theory of short crops.

CIVIC REFORM IN NEW YORK.

IT is a fatal objection to Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, Democratic candidate for Governor of New York, that he is not wanting, that he is the candidate of the Ring which has made the name of New York city government a stench in the national nostrils. The vast corruption of the municipality is proverbial, and the Citizens' Association estimates that there are sixty thousand voters in the city who have an interest in maintaining it. Its estimate is correct: nothing but a total revolution of public sentiment can save the city. Things will go from bad to worse until the city will be practically governed by the State. This is, of course, a purely abnormal condition. It is in conflict with the fundamental idea of popular government. But it may not be very much indeed, you must sit in a very dark room and do as well as you can. When the city taxes consume all moderate incomes the citizens will gladly see the State come to their relief.

At this moment the efficient departments in the city are under State control. The Police, the Fire Department, and the Parks, are managed by the State. Mayor HOFFMAN, in some fine phrases about the intelligence and energy of the city, protests. The Ring protests. The Democracy of widows and orphans protest. The sharks and leeches, the thieves and bullies protest. But so long as the people of the city prefer that the municipal offices are the head-quarters of plunder, and that however honest a man the Mayor may be, he is the political associate of those who ravage the property of the people, he will not protect against the shield which the State offers for their protection.

The Citizens' Association professes to aim at a reform of these abuses, and it includes names of the highest respectability in its executive council and honorary council. But so long as the present unanimity exists in the city countenances we have little hope of a successful assault upon the present system of plunder. The Democratic majority in this city represents the worst elements of the population, and the agents of such a majority will generally represent its spirit. If the better class among the Democrats can emancipate themselves from the party tyranny for the purpose of civic reform there would be a fair prospect of improvement. But the party discipline has thus far proved too strong, and there are no special reasons why it should be relaxed. Even when a man of fair reputation, like Mr. HOFFMAN, is nominated for Governor it is simply an act of party drill. It is intended to hold the very votes which might rebel at a known corruptionist, with the purpose of securing the continued control of the Ring. Those who were persuaded of the patriotism of the Democratic party by its conduct during the war will perhaps believe in the honesty of municipal administration under Democratic rule; but we think no others will share their opinion.

The present palliative of the total local misgovernment of the city is Legislative interference; the ultimate remedy is the extinction of the Democratic party, which, however, will live longest at this point, because the conditions of its existence, ignorance and vice, are here most abundant.

LOUIS NAPOLEON UPON THE EUROPEAN SITUATION.

THERE is a lull in exciting news from Europe, which is not disturbed by the circular of LOUIS NAPOLEON. Indeed, there is less curiosity now than formerly to know his opinions. The events of the summer have revealed Prussia as so united and powerful a kingdom that France has somewhat lost her conspicuous importance; and they have taught Europe and the world that as France is not the only great and united power, so LOUIS NAPOLEON is not the only shrewd and successful statesman of the times. He has certainly gained no prestige by his conduct during the last year. At its close LOUIS NAPOLEON finds the treaties of 1815, which he detests, at an end indeed, but not overthrown by him, nor overthrown in such a manner as to leave him master of the situation. It was, therefore, with a consciousness that he had a little lost consideration, and that there were those who actually believed him to have been snubbed by BISMARCK, that the Emperor dismissed his minister of foreign affairs, summoned a new one to the post, and before he arrived issued a manifesto as a kind of official account current to show his estimate of the actual state of affairs.

In this circular there is nothing which is very new or very instructive. We are told that the treaties are gone, that Prussia has become the head of Germany, that Italy is a unit, that now perfect freedom of commercial action rules the European powers, that France is satisfied and ought immediately to complete her military organization. All that is simply to say that there has been a new deal. But that the new game will be nobody can tell, and France will therefore be prepared for all kinds of emergencies.

This manifest is full of that vague rhetoric which is peculiar to the documents of French diplomacy. Commonplaces are stated with impressive solemnity, and platitudes with imposing air of significance. "France" is constantly mentioned as an ideal existence of the most sensitive conscience and the loftiest pride. Its objects are simply human purposes. Its methods are touchingly honorable and moral. She "must always strive for moral and political aggrandizement by employing her influence for the great interests of civilization." To talk in this way is exquisitely ludicrous, because nobody is deceived and nobody supposes that any body is. As we have said, we know and she knew that we knew that she knew," says the delightful author of "Cranford." It is precisely so with LOUIS NAPOLEON. While he withdraws from Mexico he treats mankind to these fine phrases; and mankind is supposed not to be seeing what he is doing because it is so busily believing what he is saying. But both he and mankind know perfectly well that, if he were meaning to fight to-morrow, LOUIS NAPOLEON would hold the same language.

From the Emperor's "advanced point of view" the horizon of Europe seems to be clear of "menacing eventualities." Peace has been secured without appeal to revolutionary passions, and such a peace must be durable. The moral of all this is that the war has ended without bringing France to the Rhine, and that she is to go fighting if at all, by myself. But of this nothing is directly said. That LOUIS NAPOLEON expected by remaining quiet during the war to push France to the Rhine can not be doubted. That, in common with the rest of Europe, he had no conception of the power and energy of Prussia the event shows. He is, therefore, exactly where he was before the war, with the general sense of his superior sagacity somewhat disturbed, and the general conviction of BISMARCK'S cleverness absolutely confirmed.

DANA'S WHEATON.

THE subject of international law is one of universal interest; not merely, or even mainly, to the men of science since the great majority of lawyers never come professionally in contact with it, but to all who study public affairs, and desire to be in harmony with the noble sense of justice and moral right which is the foundation of international law. Mr. WHEATON'S treatise on this great subject holds long been a standard authority, as the fact of its having now reached its eighth edition would alone go far to prove. Not attempting to exhaust this comprehensive theme, which has occupied many volumes of this size, Mr. WHEATON was satisfied to give a more comprehensive view of the elementary principles of his subject than could be found elsewhere in the English language.

The preparation of the last two editions of this valuable work was committed to a gentleman of some ability and great industry, who, however, labored under three serious defects—namely, prolixity, inaccurate acquaintance with the subject, and violent partisanship, which, moreover, was all in favor of a policy which his country has irrevocably condemned. The political tone of the last edition of "Wheaton" makes the book as obsolete as if it were three hundred years old instead of three. It is virtually made such a special plea for the rebellion that the State Department, which had been in the habit of supplying copies to its diplomatic agents, refused to take any more, and the sale of the work was absolutely stopped.

It is a matter of gratification to every statesman, jurist, or student of public affairs, who cordially accepts the true national policy of America, that this favorite volume has been at length rescued from the blight under which it had fallen, and that the preparation of the new edition has been intrusted to one of so ripe a scholarship, so truly judicial a mind, and so loyal a heart as RICHARD HENRY DANA. He is the worthy successor of MR. WHEATON and of MR. EVERETT in the chair of International Law at Cambridge; and his personal character is so spotless that the attempt of MR. WILLIAM BEACH LAWRENCE, the late editor of WHEATON, to sully it with a charge of the meanest and most stupid plagiarism, is merely contemptible. It is like accusing him of picking pockets. It is impossible to be gravely angry, for the utter absurdity of the charge. Since, however, MR. LAWRENCE seriously undertakes to specify instances, and alleges that MR. DANA appropriates his translated matter, we may mention that the most careful examination of the whole of MR. DANA'S annotated matter reveals a translation of the same passage by both editors in two instances only, and in each there is an entire difference of language. This is an illustration of the force of MR. LAWRENCE'S charge of literary fraud upon MR. DANA. But the whole question is exhaustively discussed in a note in the North American Review for October, to which we refer the reader.

Certain points of method are especially admirable in MR. DANA'S edition. In the first place, he has done well to discard MR. LAWRENCE'S theory. In the next, he has secured substantial service by numbering the sections of the work continuously throughout. Again, his conciseness, which is at first sight rather startling, when compared with the overflowing margins and appendices of the previous editor, commends itself to the judgment, upon reflection, as in keeping with the general character of the book, which professes only to give the elements of international law.

But MR. DANA'S labors have higher merits than these. His style is exceedingly terse and clear. He makes no disguise of his sympathy with liberty and humanity, while every where maintaining a judicial impartiality in declaring the law. So in dealing with the controversies between his own country and foreign governments he cautiously avoids indulging so far in sympathy with his own side as to overleap margins and appendices of the previous editor, commends itself to the judgment, upon reflection, as in keeping with the general character of the book, which professes only to give the elements of international law.

But MR. DANA'S labors have higher merits than these. His style is exceedingly terse and clear. He makes no disguise of his sympathy with liberty and humanity, while every where maintaining a judicial impartiality in declaring the law. So in dealing with the controversies between his own country and foreign governments he cautiously avoids indulging so far in sympathy with his own side as to overleap his statements to be biased or his judgment to be perverted. For these reasons his notes will be likely to command the same universal respect which has been paid to the original text.

Many of MR. DANA'S notes will be found very interesting and instructive to general readers. We should mention particularly the notes on the Monroe Doctrine, on Naturalization, on the Impressment of Seamen, on the Slave Trade, on Privateering, on Neutrality laws, on the dispute between the British and American Governments concerning the course of the former during the war, and on Blockades. It is very satisfactory to be able to find such precise, lucid, and impartial statements of the facts and decisions in affairs of such importance.

We could wish that MR. DANA had carried his revision of MR. WHEATON'S work still further, and conformed the mode of citation to the established usage of law-books. No lawyer is accustomed to cite a case as "Dodson, i. 181. The Success." MR. WHEATON, like some other eminent law-writers, was careless of these matters of detail; but so valuable a treatise should be made as perfect as possible.

A work like DANA'S Wheaton is a national benefit, for it is a work in which subjects of vast national importance are treated with a due sense of their gravity; with a candor which seeks the truth above all things; in a practical spirit which aims at substantial usefulness, and not merely at the demonstration of a theory; and finally, with a clearness and elegance which can not fail to charm the taste and reach the understanding of every intelligent reader. May the new book come into as wide use and shall be thus scientific without being uncouthly technical!

A NEW SANITARY COMMISSION.

IT is clear that the enfranchisement of all the people of the Southern States upon equal terms, by whatever authority, can not be very long delayed; and the education of those people is, therefore, a matter of national interest and importance. It is desirable in every way that there shall not be a vast population held in ignorance, whose votes shall be cast under the control of unpatriotic men whose interest might lead them to perpetuate that ignorance. And although education naturally follows the ballot there are social and political conditions under which obstructions will be thrown in its way. Thus, however rosy a view may be taken of the situation in the South, no wise man will spare any proper effort to diffuse education among the Freedmen as widely as possible. Indeed, from the moment the operations of the war opened the way there has been and now remains the most zealous and intelligent and persistent movements to arm the emancipated people with the alphabet.

This has been exclusively a voluntary movement. The Freedmen's Bureau is not charged with any interests of education. It can only incidentally help the work by defending the workers. The story of those workers, indeed, would be one of the most heroic chapters in our history. The earnestness, tenacity, wisdom, and moral intrepidity with which tenderly nurtured women and men have fought the frontier fight with ignorance and hatred, are but very vaguely known to the country. They have died quietly and unknown at their posts, many of them, as truly martyrs of the great cause as the most famous and beloved soldier who fell in the field, and over whose grave a grateful country builds an enduring monument. And the battle is instant. It is fought to-day, and all it asks of the country is a very moderate support. It is a fight, too, in which every labor tells, and tells immediately. Education is the natural security of emancipation. When the freedman can read, he is upon an absolute equality with his fellow-citizens, and has acquired a self-respect which is extremely incompatible with every kind of slavery.

Indeed, we waste words in urging the importance of popular education at the South. But as the supplies of this work in the Southern States are failing, more, as we believe, from ignorance of the field than from any other reason than from any other reason, we commend to the most serious attention of our readers the following extract from the recent appeal of the American Freedmen's Union Commission, the office of which is at No. 76 John Street, New York:

"There are 800,000 colored children in the South needing education and eager for the advantages of common schools; and to this nearly 600,000 whites who can neither read nor write must be added. Nearly 1,400,000 that are capable of being made an immense blessing to the country, religiously, socially, politically, and pecuniarily. Of this number only 14,046 have been in our schools the past year. Of these, 9,503 pupils and 230 teachers have been sent, where 25,000 are needed. Only 1466 teachers and 90,773 pupils have been established by all the various societies. The present rate of encampments will deplete our treasury to the last cent, and we must soon abandon many of the localities where our treasury is empty, and that they can not be reached unless contributions come in more rapidly."

This is a mental and moral sanitary commission, which is the worthy successor of that other which during the war cared so effectively and nobly for the physical condition of the soldier. Now as then there are hundreds and thousands of devoted men and women in every State who are anxious to know how and where to serve the country. Let them send in their local circles organize a system of monthly subscription, which can be very readily done, and communicate with the office of the Commission. The character of the gentlemen who manage it is the sufficient security of the intelligence and economy with which all the funds will be employed. There are millions who would gladly give a dollar a month, if no more, for the purpose if the opportunity were brought to them. Will not our country readers and friends consider?

PLAIN SPEAKING.

THE HON. ISAAC N. ARNOLD, an old and warm personal friend of President LINCOLN, in resigning his post as Member of the 39th Congress, speaks very plainly to President JOHNSON:

"You have betrayed the great Union party which elected ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and which, as an incident of his election, placed you in the office of Vice-President. You have deserted its principles, and are today in open cordial communion with the men who made the overthrow of the Republic, of those who for four long years made war upon our flag, and who perpetrated the long catalogue of crimes by the murder which paced you in the Executive chair.

"You are to-day persecuting and denouncing as traitors the life-long friends of ABRAHAM LINCOLN; because upon whom his great arm leaned for support in the hour of supreme peril for the Union; you are denouncing and threatening the assassins of Mr. LINCOLN for no offense but fidelity to the principles and party which you have abandoned.

"You have chosen as your friends and counselors from the lately rebellious States, not the persecuted, abused, faithful, brave Union men, whose wrongs and hardships are yet stained with the blood of loyal men. In the whole history of our country no more sublime and at a great extent with those whose sympathies were ever with rebels and traitors."

A MERE FALSEHOOD.

"A LIE well struck to" is sometimes supposed to be much more serviceable than the truth. So the party which opposed the war, which nominates Peace Democrats or Copperheads for Governors, and whose sole political capital is hostility to equal rights, has been very zealously vociferating that Congress, in a law equalizing soldiers' bounties, had discriminated in favor of the colored troops, giving the latter three hundred dollars additional bounty, and the white troops but one hundred.

Of course this is a mere falsehood. There is not even a pretext for it in the law in which the word white or black is not mentioned. But the assertion illustrates the spirit of the "Conservative" campaign, which is merely an appeal to popular prejudice and ignorance. But the elections show that it is a popular intelligence and principle which at present govern the country.

VENTILATION.

LOOK at an automatic sitting-belfry on open window, regardless of the cold, though it be winter, with his chest heaving laboriously and his countenance expressive of exquisite anguish. What is the matter? Is he in pain? No. What, then, is the distress? It is simply from want of a due supply of fresh air. The spasm in his lungs not only prevents the free admission of air from without, but the free egress of that which is within, so that the air which in the lungs is a mixture of foul and good air. When so many died in the famous Black Hole at Calcutta, it was because the pure air was so shut out that they could not even get so much as the asthmatic does.

Here we have palpable results, and they startle us; and yet we may be suffering from day to day, in a small a way as to be imperceptible, the evil results of a deficiency of air, which may so accumulate as to impair the health and even perhaps ultimately destroy life. It is only a few that occasionally lose their lives suddenly from want of air, but a comparatively slight but continuous deficiency of the supply is constantly destroying vast multitudes by a slow process.

A good supply of fresh air is an imperative necessity. Such a supply it is easy to get when we are out of doors; but we do not get it when we are indoors unless we make such provision for it—or in other words, unless we take measures to secure a sufficient supply. A proper supply of pure air in our habitations and places of public meeting is something, at least in our weather. That is the chief difficulty we have to meet. Too much fuel is required with defective than with proper ventilation. A small room, closely shut up, is warmed at less expense from a large room with suitable inlets for fresh air and outlets for foul.

The necessity for freeness in ventilation may be seen if we look to the amount of fresh air required for consumption. Each person requires a gallon every minute, that is fourteen hundred and forty gallons each hour, or about a ton in all twenty-four hours. It is easy to see this in small and closely-shut-up apartments, and large gatherings of people in public buildings, as they are ordinarily conducted, are incompatible with any such supply as this.

That you may see clearly what the necessity for ventilation is, you must feel the lungs actually do with the air which they receive.

Pure air is composed of three gases, in certain proportions—oxygen, nitrogen, and carbonic acid. It is by oxygen that life is supported—and it has also acquired a positively bad character by the increase of the carbonic acid. Much increase of this renders the air palpably poisonous. If, therefore, there be great lack of ventilation, as there often is in small rooms in dwellings or in crowded public assemblies, injury will be done to the health by the diminution of vigor from the less of oxygen and by the direct poisonous influence of the added carbonic acid. And if the exposure to these deleterious influences be frequent there will inevitably be an accumulation of evil, as seen in a broken-down system, in positive disease, and at length in death.

Observe what provision is made in nature for the constant purification of the air, and how it is often more or less defeated by the arrangements of man. As oxygen is taken up in the lungs of all animals, and carbonic acid gas is sent forth from them, breathing is continually deteriorating the air. But this is remedied by a counter operation. Every leaf that grows is just the opposite in effect of what lungs do—it takes in carbonic acid and emits oxygen—so that there is an exchanging going on between the animal and the leaf. In this way the proportion of the ingredients of the air is every where maintained, so that if the chemist examine the air taken from various quarters of the earth he always finds precisely the same proportions. But this is true only of air that is free, and not of that which is shut up from the free access of man's contamination. Wherever there is breathing going on, if ventilation be not properly attended to, there is a want of the due proportion of oxygen, and the deterioration is increased by fires and lights, for they, like lungs, use up oxygen and return carbonic acid to the air.

There is still another important provision for the purification of the air. The three ingredients of the air are not of the same specific gravity. The carbonic acid gas is decidedly heavier than the oxygen and nitrogen. Consequently, as there is a tendency to below them, as water lies below oil. Now if this tendency were not obviated in some way the carbonic acid, generated from the lungs and from various decompositions, would accumulate all over the surface of the earth, pushing up the oxygen and nitrogen before it, and thereby destroy life and destroy life and put out fires every where. But this tendency is obviated by another—the tendency of gases to diffuse themselves. It is just as the heavier water does not remain below the lighter alcohol poured upon it, but mixes with it. Agitation promotes this mingling, and therefore in ventilation the communication of motion to the air is an important measure, and should be accomplished so far as it can be done without inconvenience.

There are other deleterious gases besides carbonic acid produced in crowded ways, indoors and without, that are carried off by this same mingling and diluting process, but of these we will not speak, the most important is that of perspiration.

What now is the inference from all this? Plainly that we ought to make it quite as sure that our lungs shall have a suitable supply of good air as that our stomachs shall have a suitable supply of good food. Oxygen, indeed, is food as really as what is put into the stomach, for it enters into the composition of the blood, and through this of the structures of the body. And besides, the carbonic acid gas which is discharged from the lungs is so much refuse, and should not, therefore, be introduced again, but should be carried off by the means which you see are provided so beautifully and carefully by the Creator.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

LOSS OF THE "EVENING STAR."

OUR dispatches from Savannah, Georgia, bring intelligence of a most appalling disaster, attended with the total loss of life. The steamer Evening Star, of the New York Mail Steamship Company, which sailed from this port on Saturday, 6th ult., bound for New Orleans, with about 200 passengers and a crew of 30 men, foundered off Tybee (date not mentioned), and nearly all on board perished.

RESIGNATION OF RICHARD H. DANA, JUN., UNITED STATES DISTRICT-ATTORNEY.

THE following is a copy of HON. RICHARD H. DANA, JUN.'s, letter resigning his office as United States District-Attorney:

OFFICE OF U. S. DISTRICT-ATTORNEY,
BOSTON, Oct. 15, 1866.

"SIR,—Returning from an absence in Europe, briefly allowed me by the Government of my native State, I gladly embrace the opportunity to understand that the President expects of those who hold offices of responsibility the support and advancement by them of his policy expressed, and co-operation in the efforts he is now engaged on for the restoration of American peace as to which he is in accordance with Congress.

"My express wishes and those of a highly appropriate to consider these subjects with sentiments of friendship to the President and cordial confidence and contingencies attendant, and I have endeavored to act upon them. I shall myself continue to express, and to ask for, co-operation, and respectfully request your acceptance of my resignation in the hands of the President.

"I am desirous, however unimportant my opinions may be, that the reasons for which I am led by reasons satisfactory to myself, may not be misunderstood as an approval of a practice of removing the course of all civil offices, whether their nature or tenure permits, on considerations the opinions of the President on all points, at his discretion.

"I shall, of course, continue to discharge the duties of my post until I learn that a successor has been appointed. Permit me to express, in return, my acknowledgments of the consideration with which I have been treated by all Departments of the Government during my tenure of office; and I hope it is not out of place to add my grateful thanks to those uniform friendly kindness I have received from yourself personally.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, RICHARD H. DANA, JUN.

"HON. WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State."

DAVIS'S TRIAL POSTPONED.

JEFF DAVIS'S trial has again been postponed, as no term of the United States Circuit Court is to be held for six months at Richmond. The term is now closed, and the invalidates the adjournment to October. It is probable that the case will be tried at the February term. Subsequently she wrote another work entitled "Ida Beaumont."

The following circular letter from Major-General ROSECRANS, President of the Board of Visitors of the Academy, has been issued:

WEST POINT, N. Y., Oct. 8, 1866.

CIRCULAR LETTER.—The officers of the Army of the Tennessee wish to commemorate the services of the Army of the Tennessee," to be held at Cincinnati, on the 19th and 20th of November next, and I write to ask you to be present.

Major-General Manning F. Force, Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, at Cincinnati, to that effect, that the Committee may have some definite idea of the number that will probably be present.

JOHN A. RAWLINS, President of the Society.

MAJOR-GENERAL ROSECRANS is appointed by the Eighth Congressional District of New York, in place of HON. G. P. FISHER.

Of the 163 towns in Connecticut, about 140 held their elections for town officers on Monday, the 8th inst., and returns are large enough to indicate the success of the Union party, but the Republicans have carried Meriden, Seymour, Windsor Locks, Southington, and Bristol, and probably Stratford, Canaan, and the most of the larger towns. Hartford and the three towns give a Republican majority of 1,000. Connecticut gives a Republican majority of 5,000. The Legislature is Republican by a large majority on joint ballot. The Democrats have elected Grinnell, Chapin, and Hubbard to Congress, and probably the fourth. In New Haven many of the towns has been strictly a vote. Of 11 towns 48 have gone Republican, and 25 Democratic.

REAR-ADMIRAL FRANCIS H. GREGORY, U.S.N., died on board the Navy-Yard Home, Brooklyn, on the 14th inst., after illness, in the 77th year of his age.

THE Mexican Government has given one million of dollars to the building of small tenement houses for the poor in the city of Mexico. The Senate has sent a bill, suited to the means of those in receipt of but small incomes, to the Chamber of Deputies, making provision for rent, etc., to the extension of the undertaking. The Senate of the State of Nuevo Leon has sent a like municipal authorities for a grant of land, merely stipulating that the plan, management of the matter, the appointment of trustees, and one or two minor points should be vested in the municipal councils. Hitherto the request and has not been granted, but in case of a refusal Mr. Nelson will try the Legislature. He intends to carry out his noble purpose at the same, only of course the number of houses will be smaller at first, as part of the sum, which would otherwise be entirely devoted to the construction of the houses, will then have to be used for the purchase of land.

THE well-known horse-dancer, Professor J. S. Rarey, died very suddenly at No. 166 St. Clair Street, on Thursday afternoon, October 4.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE ocean telegraph brings intelligence that the insurrection in Candia is spreading rapidly, and that the Government of Turkey contemplates suspending diplomatic relations with Greece, on account of the sympathy extended by that country to the insurgent Cretans.

THE treaty of peace between Austria and Italy gives the Venetian territory to Italy. Austria retains the Venetian debt. Italy has accepted this arrangement cheerfully as a compromise.

THE MULBERRY-TREE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

When the long hot days are nearly gone,
And the fields lie misty in autumn dawn,
With spider-webs hung from blade to blade,
Heavy with dews the dark hours made—
Till the lazy sun rises late from his bed,
Large and solemn and round and red,
And changes them into diamonds rare,
Like Love—which makes commonest things all fair;
Then is the time—the golden prime—
Of the patient mulberry-tree.

O the mulberry-tree is of trees the queen!
Bare when the other trees are green;
But as June creeps onward, while none perceives,
Slowly she clothes herself with leaves;
Hides her fruit under them, hard to find,
And, being a tree of steadfast mind,
Makes no show of blossom or berry,
Loves not an idle bird to make merry
Under her boughs, her dark rough boughs,
The prudent mulberry-tree.

But by-and-by, when the flowers grow few,
And the summer fruits dwindle, poor to view,
Out she comes in her matron grace,
With the purple myriads of her race,
Full of plenty from root to crown,
Showering plenty her feet adown;
While far overhead, hang gorgeously,
Large luscious berries of sanguine dye;

For the best grows highest, always highest,
Upon the mulberry-tree.

And so she lives through her fruitful season—
Fairest tree that blows summer breeze on!
Till the breeze sharpens to fierce wind cold,
And the sun's warm beams wax pale and old;
Sudden hour-frosts the white lawn cover,
And the day of her beauty and strength is over.
Her blighted berries strew all the grass,
Or wither greenly aloft. We pass
Like faithless friends, when her summer ends;
Not a glance for the mulberry-tree!

Yet there she stands in the autumn sun,
Her fruits all gathered, her duty done:
And lets the wind rave through her emptied boughs
Like a mother left lone in a childless house:
Till some still night, 'neath the frosty skies,
She drops her green clothing off and dies;
Answering the call that nature sends,
And ending her life as a good life ends:
Ripe without haste—dying, green to the last,
The grand old mulberry-tree.

THE SCHOOLMASTER M.D.

In the State of New York ('tis a long time ago)
A great operation occurred:
I am speaking the truth, and I'd have you to know
That I am quite willing to swear that it's so,
Or affirm, if you dare doubt my word.

'Twas at Greenwich the school-house I'm speaking of stood—
A battered old shanty, I vow:
Though 'tis twenty years since, it is standing there yet,
On an island not round; if you go there I'll bet
You will find it's the same even now.

And in it, most likely, a hard set of boys,
All ready for any high game;
All ripe for a frolic and fond of a noise;
And of girls, too, quite willing to share in each joys:
In youth you and I were the same.

But just at the time I am writing of new
The building was cheerless and lone;

FIRST HORSE-MEAT MARKET OPENED IN PARIS.—[SEE PAGE 669.]

The windows were broken; and only a cow
Seen grazing beneath the old willow-tree bough,
And a mangy dog gnawing a bone.

And the reason no Busby would take it in hand
Was because of the tales which were told:
How Jack's finger was cut, and Joe rolled in the sand
By the widow's son Dick, and the Hollingshead band
Were licked by Tom Raynor the bold.

Then duly next morn came the mothers to pray
That the teacher would cowhide them well;
Or if Dick and Tom Raynor were not sent away
They wouldn't send Johnny nor Joe nary day,
And take away Kitty and Bell.

Poor teacher! Each day he was bothered and pained
To settle the wars of the eve,
Till, tired and weary, he fairly complained
"No morial could stand it," and further proclaimed
"That he had determined to leave."

'Twas long ere another was willing to try
The place thus vexated and torn,
Till a grave learned Doctor, who that way passed by
And heard of the trouble, without if or why,
Declared he would work a reform.

Being duly installed in the schoolmaster's seat,
The day passed without any rub;
But a friend sent next morning a note short and sweet,
To hint that a stick was no weapon discreet,
As his boy had been struck with a club.

'Twas read: and the boy was called forth pretty gruff,
And asked to exhibit his wound.
So, snivling and wiping his nose on his cuff,
Georgy Williams his trowser pulled up with a snuff,
And held out a leg which was sound.

"Is it here?" said the teacher: "why, this is a bore."
"Oh no, Sir, 'tis here on the shin."
"Tis a very grave case," said the Dominie stern;
"It might have been fatal." Though, reader, you learn
It scarcely discolored the skin.

"Why, Georgy, my son, did you walk to the school?
I declare it was rash so to do.
But as you are here you must sit on this stool,
And hold up your leg like a parallel rule
To the map which hangs over your view."

Then taking him gently with tenderest care,
In a loving and fatherly manner,
He called for a cushion, and then for a chair,
And seating poor Georgy he placed his leg there,
And bandaged it with his bandana.

On further inquiry the Dominie found
The name of the other young sinner
Who struck the foul blow: and in justice was bound
To call for his aid, when the play spell came round,
To bring Georgy Williams his dinner.

And to make him all day like a lackey to stand,
Or a priest doing penance for sins;
To hold Georgy's state, and to place in his hand
Every book he required. While Georgy, right grand,
Sat in state, like a monarch on pins.

GRANDMOTHER'S STORY.—"THEN YOU DO BELIEVE IN GHOSTS!"

With his leg for a sceptre, stretched out on a chair,
He sat through the ne'er-ending day:
While Harry, the villain, did wait on him there,
And with rueful compunction his sorrow did share,
For neither could go out to play.

And when studies were o'er, lest the lame little lad
Should be to his sister a drag on,
The Dominie said, "She must speak to her dad
To gear up his horse, as the walking was bad,
And send down for George the light wagon.

Next morning the patient all rosy appeared,
Declaring his trouble was o'er;
And when his preceptor's inquiry was heard, I
"How's your leg, George Williams?" he stoutly averred
"It was better than ever before."

And in the prescription such virtue was found
(If you use it I don't care a peg)
That no child ever threatened, while playing around,
To tell of a hurt got on Greenwich school ground,
But was met by the cry, "How's your leg?"

GRANDMOTHER'S STORY.

"GRANNY, do you believe in ghosts?"

"What has put that into your head, child?"

"Because to-day is the third of May, and Esther Lovell says she would not for worlds go near the old Hall to-night, for strange sights are to be seen there after nightfall."

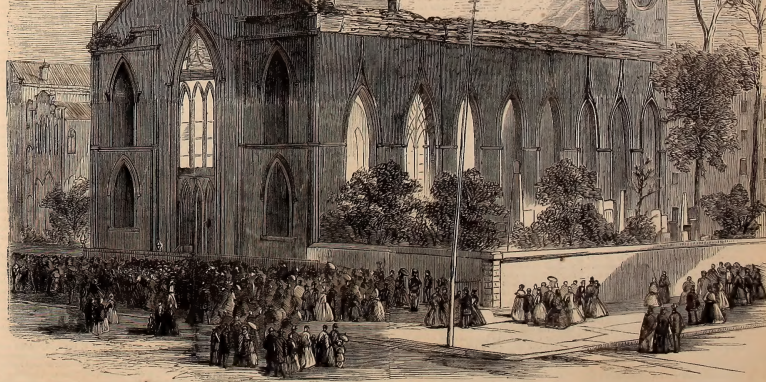
"Esther Lovell's a goose," replied the old woman, somewhat testily. "The worst that could be seen would be a sweet lady weeping and wringing her hands; and what harm would that do any one, I should like to know?"

"Then you do believe in ghosts?" said the child, timidly, drawing nearer to her grandmother, and throwing her arm round her neck. "I ran so fast by the Hall, and never once looked round, and I'm so glad I'm going to sleep here, for I never should have dared to go home again if it were dark."

"You're a silly child, Meg; it's only wicked people that need fear ghosts, if there are such things. Mind you, I'll not say whether there are or not, for it's not for such as me to judge. One hears strange stories sometimes. But all you've got to do, Meg, is to be a good girl, and then you'll have no cause to fear ghosts or goblins, or any thing else."

"But I'm not always good, granny," returned Meg, despondingly; "and I've been particularly naughty the last day or two; so it's a comfort I'm going to stay here all night. But I did so hope, granny, that you would not believe in ghosts."

"I've never said I did, child, and I've never said I didn't, it's just one of those things that I've no belief about either one way or another; and I take that to be the best way of settling a doubtful point."



Meg looked as though she did not quite understand the force of her grandmother's logic, or at any rate as though no consolation were to be derived therefrom, but the subject being too deep for her childish meditations her thoughts reverted to what had been the primary cause of her question.

"Why is the third of May a worse day for ghosts than any other day, granny?"

"It isn't that I know of," returned the old woman.

"Then why should Esther Lovell be more afraid of passing the Hall to-night than any other night in the year?"

"That's because of the old story. I should not mind telling it to you. Dear, dear, what a many years it is since! and it seems just to have come to me as fresh as when it all happened. Sit down to your tea, child, and after tea we'll settle down cosily, and have it all over. It'll be like calling up an old friend that's been dead and buried many a long year to have a chat with one."

Meg did not by any means consider this a "consummation devoutly to be wished;" the idea was not a pleasant one, and she would rather her grandmother had not mentioned it, for there were three chairs in the neat little kitchen, and who knew who or what the occupier of the third might be? Meg gave a little shudder.

"You're not cold, child, surely?" said her grandmother, pouring out another cup of tea.

"No, grandmother," answered Meg, her hand trembling as she stretched it out for the cup.

"Then you're frightened," said the old woman, looking at her. "I wish Esther Lovell and her nonsense were far away. I shan't be able to tell you my story, child. It's not well to fill young heads with fears."

"Nay, granny, you must tell it me now. I won't sleep if you don't; besides, I shall think it more horrible than it really is, and I shall go fancying all sorts of things."

"There's something in that," said the old woman, brightening up, for she had felt a little disappointed at the thought of not being able to indulge in old reminiscences, "and that would be a pity. So make haste and finish your tea, and then we'll clear away the tea-things and have a cozy evening together."

The tea-things were cleared away quickly enough, and Meg took a little stool and sat down close to her grandmother's feet. She would not look at either of the chairs, for she could not divest herself of a queer nervous feeling with regard to them. So she gazed into the fire that burned brightly in the grate, for it was a chill evening, though it was May.

"I've noticed," began the old woman, "that there's never been a third of May without some part of the day feeling chill. However warm it may have been beforehand, or may be the day afterwards, there's never been a third of May for the last sixty years that I've not been all the better for a bit of fire.

"It's the anniversary of a day that sends a chill to all those who remember it, or were in any way connected with it, and it comes to me somewhat the same. I suppose it's getting to be one of the last that it will come to, for I'm nearing on toward eighty, Meg, and what I am going to tell you happened while I was a girl sixteen or seventeen years old.

"One of the earliest things I can recollect is the old Hall being put into complete repair; for seventy or eighty years ago it was much in the same condition that it is now, and no one would take it for three or four in ill story banging to it, and it was said that some who held it in possession ever came to any good.

"Well, as I said, it was put into repair. There were carpenters and bricklayers and masons at work, and in a short time the old place looked as it had known the best. The fine old gardens, too, with their terrace-walks and stone steps and fountains, were all put in order, and a pretty place it was altogether, though perhaps there was still a gloomy air about it; but that only made it the grander.

"The master of it was not the least to be haunted by any thing, and when he was told of the evil stories and the ghosts, as in duty bound, he curled his lip contemptuously, and made some mocking remark that no one at the time cared to repeat.

"He was a tall, dark man, nigh fifty, I should say, with a commanding, resolute, and a proud, stern look on his face, and his hair was black as a raven. He wore a pointed beard and a short mustache, but he used to have a close shave.

"He came from foreign parts, and he brought a mint of money with him; there seemed to be no end of it, and he had no company to keep, and fine horses and the hounds, and every thing belonging to him.

"My aunt was housekeeper at the Hall, and now and then I used to go up to see her; and sometimes, if it was very early in the morning, she would let me look through, but rarely more, when the house maids were dusting and sweeping them. Very splendid they were; and at first I could see nothing distinctly, they seemed to be such a confusion of silk and satin, and gilded furniture and pictures, and vases, and looking-glasses mirrors, and flowers, and tapestry, and I can not tell you what; but by degrees I came to separate them, and to know each room and what it contained; for one day, when I, for as easy to get accustomed to fine things, when one sees them constantly, as to poor ones, and so it was with me.

"The room I liked best of all was my lady's boudoir, as they called it. It was at the end of one of the corridors, and had windows opening into a wide balcony that was always filled with the choicest plants. The walls were hung with blue silk, and the silken curtains were bordered with gold fringe. It was just such a room as one might expect to see in a fairy palace, did I was never tired of looking at the beautiful things heaped together there.

"One day I had obtained permission to go into this room with my lady's maid, and was so much absorbed in looking at a picture that had just been hung up, that I did not perceive that she had gone away, imagining that I was following her; and so I was left alone.

"It was a picture of a child, a beautiful boy, with blue eyes, that had no look of the proud, stern master of the house in them—the Squire, as we country folks used to call him.

"I was still gazing at it, when I heard a voice say:

"'Who are you, my little girl?'

"I had never heard such a voice before: the words were not spoken as we English people would speak them, and the tone was so sweet that I scarcely thought a human being had spoken to me.

"I turned, and there stood a lady in a loose white dress, that seemed to float round her. She was very pale and fragile-looking, and her hair was like a pale gold.

"For a moment I thought she might be an angel, and then it suddenly flashed upon me that it must be my lady herself. So I dropped a low courtesy, and said:

"'I am Mrs. Bridget's niece, my lady.'

"'So you are admiring my room,' said my lady; 'tell me what in it pleases you best?'

"Her eyes involuntarily sought the picture, and I pointed to it.

"A flush of pain passed over my lady's countenance.

"'Yes,' she said; 'you are right, little girl—there is nothing to compare with it. My child! Sweet, sweet child!' and she put her hands over her eyes.

"At that moment who should come along the corridor but the Squire. My lady seemed all trembling-like, but she could not go any whiter than she was. The moment he caught sight of the picture, he tore it from its passion, and began to swear at my lady.

"'How long has that been up here?' he asked.

"'Only since yesterday,' said my lady; 'Geronimo has just finished it for me.'

"At that moment a youth, who bore a wonderful likeness to my lady, advanced.

"'Is this the way you repay my favors?' demanded the Squire, fiercely. 'I thought that we were rid of that child when we laid him deep under the sod at Padua, and now he's risen again to be a curse to me. As if I could help whether he lived or died.'

"The youth looked in amazement at the speaker, and then some sort of recollection came to strike him, for he started back as if he had seen some dreadful sight, and then he gazed steadily at the Squire and the Squire gazed at him, and then I thought I saw a slight quiver on his under-lip.

"'What do you mean?' said he.

"The youth seemed somewhat better to reply, when my lady, who had been intently watching the two, stepped forward and signed to the youth to go. For I too crept away, and was sent down to Mrs. Bridget; I had been too frightened to stir before.

"When I got back to Mrs. Bridget she first gave me a good scolding for having been in my lady's boudoir, and then made me give her an exact account of what had taken place; and then, my lady's maid coming in, she had to tell it over to her women put their heads together, and I could see they thought deeper of it than I could understand. But there were no more strange stories about respecting the Squire.

"I must tell you that my lady was an Italian, and Geronimo, the youth I had seen, was her brother.

"He and my lady were living together in Italy in very slender circumstances, when the Squire was struck with her beauty as she was playing with her child; for she had been married very young, and had been left a widow with one child. She became his wife, and because I had been looking at.

"The Squire fell in love with her at once, and at length she consented to marry him, on condition that Geronimo should be ported from her until he grew to man's estate, and could make his way alone in the world.

"So the Squire gave his promise, and they were married, and all went well for a time; but soon he became jealous of the love of the mother for her child, and could scarcely bear it in his sight. You see he was very fond of his wife, and wished to be first with her in every thing.

"Well, after a while the boy suddenly sickened, he lingered for many weeks, and then he died.

"But my lady was no consolation for all that. Indeed, a shadow seemed to spring up out of the child's death; and at last the Squire thought if he could get away from the place where he had buried his child, and live a country life, keeping open house, that the gay company would drive sad thoughts from my lady's mind. So he had the company ever did that, child? There she was, dressed in her brocades that stood of themselves, and her pearls and diamonds flashing, more like a beautiful spirit than any thing earthly. And the Squire was proud enough of her, as well he might be, and yet he was not happy in his mind, and was half mad if she ever spoke of her dead child.

"And so things went on until the day that I was my lady's boudoir.

"After then my lady began to droop more than ever. She had not the heart to don any of her fine dresses to be seen among the company. She sat, seldom left her own room, and she clung more closely to Geronimo than she had ever done before. Yet, strange to say, she would not hear of him's return to Italy; for she said she knew that she was dying, and what would he do in a strange land without her? But he would not leave her.

"One day—it was early in May, and the weather had been unusually warm—Geronimo went down to the river to bathe.

"He did not return; and some one passing by and seeing his clothes lying on the bank and him nowhere about, gave the alarm, and there was a long search his body was found. When the poor corpse was brought to the Hall, my lady, who had been in a state of frightful despair, came to meet it.

"Every one was surprised to see how calm she was, and how quiet. She went back the street they had flung over him and kissed his cold lips; then she bade them get ready the state-bedroom, and there the boy was laid out, and my lady sat by beside and watched until the day of the funeral, but she never spoke.

"When the day came she took a last look at him before the coffin-lid was fastened down; then she told her maid she was going to have a long sleep, and she went to her own room, where she took to her bed and gradually faded and faded.

"The days went by slowly enough now, for it was very still and quiet in the old Hall. The Squire sat moodily in the great dining-room and scarce a soul dared to say any thing to him. Now and then he went to look at my lady, who never so much as opened her eyes when he came into the room—whether it was that she was too far gone to speak, or whether from some other cause, none knew. But she spoke to no one now, and the doctor said the end was not far off.

"It was just one o'clock on the morning of the third of May—it wanted a few minutes to high-water, and then the tide would turn, and we all know that at tide-turning many a soul that has been waiting is called away.

"Well, as I said, it was just one o'clock, and all the household were abed excepting the Squire, who was still sitting over his sack-posset, and the old nurse who was sitting by my lady's bedside.

"Suddenly a low cry was heard, and it pierced through the house and woke many of the sleepers; but only one or two had courage to rise up and see what it was, and among these was my Aunt Bridget.

"As she opened the door that led on to the grand gallery she saw a white figure gliding down the great staircase, with its eyes staring in wild horror, clinging its hands, and muttering piteously. If it had not been that she was lying on her death-bed my aunt would have said that it was my lady herself; but she had heard the spirits of departing people visiting those they desired to see at the last moment, and so great was her fear at the sight that she fainted away, as did the maid who had accompanied her; but a little fat-page, who had more courage and more curiosity, followed the figure and saw it enter the Squire's room.

"The Squire, he said, started up, and the figure, slowly raising its hand and pointing one finger at him, said, 'Murderer!' And the Squire fell back in his chair and hid his face in his hands. The little foot-page saw no more, for, overcome with fear, he ducked to his room and buried himself beneath the bed-clothes.

"When my aunt came to herself, being a woman of some nerve, despite the sudden terror that came over her, she determined to go to my lady's room, and there she found my lady, as she expected, dead to this world at last. She said, 'The nurse was asleep, so of course did not know how long she had been dead; but my aunt knew that she must have died just at the moment, and that would be just at the time the white figure glided down the staircase.'

"Do you think that my lady's ghost, granny?" said Meg.

"How should I know? I only tell the tale as it was told to me, and it's not for me to tell of use to settle about such things.

"I don't either believe or disbelieve in ghosts, and that's the best way of doing. We never come across them, and I hope never to see one; but still I'll not say but what others have."

"I'm sure I hope I shan't," said Meg; "I should die with fright."

"My aunt didn't," replied the old woman, "and I see no cause that you should. Not that I think you'll ever see one.

"And what became of the Squire?" asked Meg.

"After my lady's death he never felt comfortable at the Hall, so all was put on the market and the house was shut up, and he went abroad, and I heard he wandered from place to place until he died. It seemed as if he could find no rest.

"Do you think, granny," said Meg, lowering her voice, "that he had any thing to do with the child's death or with Geronimo's?"

"Many thought so," returned the old woman; "still nothing could be made of it. But one thing was always heard of in connection: my lady thought so, and that was the cause of the piteous moaning of the figure that my aunt saw glide down the old staircase."

GREEN'S SISTER.

As Mr. Romer was preparing to leave his office Green rushed in with a linen duster and other marks of travel upon him.

"My dear fellow," said Green, "there is the most unfortunate affair in the world. My sister, who applied for a situation as governess, and has been dancing attendance for three or four weeks at Mr. Custers's, in Nineteenth Street, decided to go back to Peekskill to-day. Now, I was ordered to catch the next train for Washington—time for nothing more than to seize my duster and bag and run; you know the rest of our firm. Just as I came down the steps on the run our messenger hands me this," flourishing an official-looking envelope "directed to my sister and read it while I ing, and, by George! if it is not Addy's situation! I must catch the train. Somebody must head off Addy, who is probably at the depot by-now, or her situation will be snapped up. I thought of you, and, says I, Romer is my man; and now, my dear fellow, will you step down on your way up and leave this note for Addy—number 2067 Nineteenth Street, you know—will do as much for you some time."

And Green shot out again, leaving the envelope on Mr. Romer's table.

It was but little. The day in question was the first anniversary of Mr. Romer's wedding-day, and he was under heavy bonds to Mrs. Romer to dine with her and her brother Jack punctually at six. From the first all things worked together for his confusion. The unexpected visitor detained him till it only lacked a quarter of six. Then he hesitated between cars and stage-route, and decided for the former, because the stage must stick fast in Broadway jams till the driver swears them out again; also the tram-way brought him nearer to 2067 Nineteenth Street. Then he determined himself that he would stop only to ring the bell and hand in Green's official envelope. Half-way up town the car stopped with a horse down. Mr. Romer looked out and saw a car directly in front of them, another beyond that, and was told that, still further in advance, a car had run off the track. Mr. Romer sprang from the car and started up town on a quick trot, remembering as he ran that Mrs. Romer, as a phrenologist once assured her, "lacked self-esteem and overvalued the attractions of the rest of her sex," or, as I should brutally put it, was jealous; consequently he had been cautioned never to make Mrs. Romer wait for Green's sister. He rang the bell of number 2067 sharply, and thrust the envelope into the hand of the frouzy maid, saying, "Miss Addy Green."

"She sin't here," said the frouzy maid. "She's just gone to the depôt."

What depôt? and, good Heavens! what would Mrs. Romer say? The frouzy maid called shrilly to unknown people in the basement, and getting no answer, mounted the stairs sluggishly to find Mrs. Custers. All this occupied time, precious time! also Mrs. Custers did something to her cap before appearing, and was a slow, precise person, not to be hurried in things of dress. Mrs. Romer's train was had just left the house, and he would have time to see her at the Hudson River depôt before the train started."

Romer confounded Green, and started once more in search of his sister. He could not in conscience throw the sister little girl's chance over; but what in there be a row with Mrs. Romer! Fortunately the Twenty-third Street line makes good time, and a stage drew in sight as he reached Broadway. Romer hailed it; the driver shook his head and drove obstinately on; he hailed again; the driver passed him with calm contempt. The stage was crowded, and men were hanging on the step. Mr. Romer walked down Broadway. Some cars appeared with the next upward-bound stage. In the third he secured a corner. On the next block they stopped to take in a lady and child—a slow process because of the shortness of the child's legs; three doors further and they stopped to let a lady out. On the corner five or six people lay in wait for them. That stage was never full; that driver shook his head at nobody. When Mr. Romer reached the depôt the train stood ready on the track, cars coupled, and engine snorting in the usual ill-conditioned way. Mr. Romer had seen Miss Green and remembered that she was tall, slim, and she wore a little curl just over a small pink ear, and that she had fine blue eyes; also, that she dressed elderly in dark silk. At the third car from the ground a young lady in black and with a curl over her ear; but on being addressed, "Sir," she answered, frigidly; and it was not Miss Green. He dashed on and. Two ladies blocked the passage, looking about for seats. Trying to edge past them he became conscious of a peculiar oscillation under his feet. The train was in motion. "Good Heavens!" cried Mr. Romer, dodging frantically about the two obstructive females, "do let me pass, Madam!"

"Very sorry, Sir," returned the younger lady; "but see my bundles!"

She carried a two feet square, a traveling-bag, a paper parcel as large as a baby, a basket, and a shawl. Mr. Romer ran back to the other door. Should he jump? Jack Romer jumped, fell between a car and a platform, and died in three hours. Mr. Romer hesitated. Should he jump? Then or never. The speed of the train increased every instant. He saw the conductor.

"Where is the first stopping-place?"

"Peckskill. But the run express to Peekskill."

Mr Romer decided to jump, but now there was no longer a choice. The iron horse, warmed up to his work, dashed into the open country at speed, and the long line of cars skimming after him groaned and swayed dizzily from side to side. Mr. Romer sank down seemingly into a express to Peekskill, and Mrs. Romer waiting for him at Delmonico's. It might almost as well have been express to Kamtschatka.

"Why, Mr. Romer!" said a voice beside him. "I thought it was you as you passed, though I have only seen you once before."

The lady by whom Mr. Romer had seated himself was Green's sister.

Mr. Romer has been accused of flirting with Miss Green. But what is flirting, and how ought the model husband to look when a pretty girl is smiling on his pale face, and bewailing her artless little confidences? All this glee and chatter was in reality because of the official envelope. She had been getting home discourses, and liked it, and she was innocently grateful to Mr. Romer, who, out of pure good-nature, had lost his anniversary dinner, and was there carried off to Peekskill. Mrs. Romer is the object of her husband's affections; but, unless she is a pair of blinders also, how could she be conscious of the fact that Miss Green's sister was a pretty girl—a charming girl—one of those women that are delightful even to the details of their kind? Ignorance of a certain sort is happiness? I take sides with Mr. Romer, and I declare that the man who could sit cold and smileless by the side of a pretty girl, and take his perch at once by St. Simeon Stylites or by Miss Riggs.

I shoot Miss Riggs into the most lately-used private vehicle, because I have not used lately that, according to the rules of art, I must not describe what my hero did not see. Mr. Romer did not see Miss Riggs. She sat, wrapped in a veil, in the corner of a seat in line with hers; but Mr. Romer was busy in looking at the bright side of his position. Green was—Green's sister. Green's sister dressed in black, and black became her. In these days it would be presumptuous to decide whether she was or was not handsome. Her hair, but it is rippled and waved under her hat in a lovely way; and there was Mrs. Romer, and, then, unglossed hand resting on the sill of the car window; it was as pretty as the little foot, of which Mr. Romer caught a glimpse from time to time. In fact, a gradual resignation possessed that gentleman. It was certainly a thousand pities, and he quaked to think that Mrs. Romer would never be satisfied somehow; but he had devised a little plan in which, to be perfectly frank, no mention would be made of Green's sister. Mrs. Romer would, then, have to forswear a squall, concluded that he should be able to weather it.

Miss Green was less at her ease. After overhauling a very thin porte-monnaie with great privacy, she grew silent and thoughtful, and finally—

"It is very disagreeable," she said, blushing distressfully, "but I suppose I must ask you, as David forgot to send me more money, and I must take the return train; and if you could—I mean if you would—"

Mr. Romer did not suffer her to finish her sentrance. No man likes to see a young creature, with fine blue eyes and a lovely complexion, blushing and embarrassed before him on a money question; but in assuring her of the pleasure he should find by serving her, involuntarily Mr. Romer laid his hand on the pocket in which he carried his purse, and a tingle of dismay went up from his finger-ends to his brain. That pocket had ordinarily a fat feel. It was now flat. He explored it again.

"Have you lost any thing?" asked Miss Green.

"Oh no, nothing; that is, it is of no consequence," muttered Romer, making frantic dives into other pockets, and as his hand came hopelessly down in the bottom of each pocket, rapidly culminating in a nervous agony. He excused himself to Green's sister, and retiring to another car commenced the search anew, turning every pocket and observed the slit in his coat, made by some confounded pickpocket, but no wallet. Here was richness! Here was a predicament! Green's sister had no money. He had no money. Did he know any man in Peekskill? No, he knew no man in Peekskill. Green's sister would be hungry. He was hungry. How should he procure a dinner, and tickets for their returns? He thought of his watch, and looking down saw the guard dangling loosely from his button-hole. The pickpocket had relieved him of that also. As a last hope he went through the train, hoping to find some man who knew him, but strangers only stared at him from every seat. He had confounded Green. He now confounded his sister. I admit that he was a booby, but look at the position! How could a man do in Peekskill with Green's sister on his hands and no money. He went back to his seat, perfectly limp. Something would be done or said on reaching Peekskill, but what that something should be he did not even try to think.

"Mr. Romer," said Miss Green, who meanwhile had been consulting with herself, "while you were absent I have been arranging a programme."

"Oh!" stammered Mr. Romer, and, to himself, "I wonder how much it will cost?"

"As we are to return so soon, it will hardly be worth while to carry my trunks about to hotels, in an expensive way," pursued Miss Green, smiling; "and so, if you please, Mr. Romer, you will take them in charge of the baggage-master, or some such person; and then I have been examining my timetable, and if we return to-night, it will be only by an hour after reaching Peekskill. We shall get into New York late in the evening, and I confess I am tired and hungry already; and if you will go again, Mr. Romer, I should very much prefer to go direct to my cousin's house. My cousin is Mrs. Drake, and the place is so near that we can walk there from the depôt, and she will be charmed if you will stay at her house, Mr. Romer, when she hears how kind and thoughtful you have been for me."

"And then," said Romer to himself, and cutting a mental caper, "if there is a Mrs. Drake there will be a Mr. Drake, and he will understand that I am not a swindler, and I can borrow ten dollars of him!" and he thinks that three minutes before he had privately sworn at this blessed little girl, and wished her at—Ispahan. He could have fallen down on his knees before her if the arrangement of the car seats and the manners and customs of the American people would have permitted, and he came out from his gloomy look like the sun from behind a cloud. He would telegraph to his wife, and he saw his way clear now to that little plan in which no mention would be made of Miss Green; but before leaving him let us look for an instant at the Riggs view of the case. Miss Riggs saw Mr. Romer seated for some person in the car, and as he was recognized by a pretty girl, evidently on the look-out, Mr. Romer's manner was devoted, and Mr. Romer was completely absorbed in the companion so that he did not see her, Miss Riggs. They left the train at Peekskill; neither had bagged that Miss Riggs could see, but walked away in an easy, at-home manner. Miss Riggs considered it her duty, as a neighbor and a member of the same church with Mrs. Romer, to follow them. They were not to a hotel, but to a private house, where they were welcomed in a way that showed they were old friends, and Miss Riggs came away, bowed down by the dreadful inferences that she drew from these suspicious facts.

Meanwhile Mrs. Romer waited at Delmonico's, with brother Jack, expecting her husband calmly, till six o'clock, the appointed hour. After that her little world was often in requisition, and she watched the door till her neck ached and her eyes were tired. Jack proposed to order dinner, but Mrs. Romer indignantly refused. Twenty-five minutes of seven—twenty minutes. "I am sure something has happened," sighed Mrs. Romer. "Nonsense!" said Jack, and ordered dinner. Seven o'clock! Mrs. Romer could not eat a mouthful, but sat with her eyes on the door. Quarter past seven. "I know something has happened!" cried Mrs. Romer, her eyes brimming.

"Romer's head clerk boards in the next street. If you say so I will go there," said Jack, vaguely, uneasy himself, to tell the truth. Mrs. Romer waited, her eyes set on the watch. Jack returned presently, looking quite sober.

"George tells me that he left the office before six o'clock."

Mrs. Romer grew ghastly.

"Come, don't faint! Let us go home. He may be there, you know; taken ill, or something," said Jack, hurrying her out. At the door they met Dolton, whose office adjoined that of the missing man.

"Seen any thing of Romer?" asked Jack, in passing.

"Romer: No! Yes, I have too. I met him a while ago in Nineteenth Street, somewhere about six o'clock, I think."

"Do you know where in Nineteenth Street?" put in Mrs. Romer, reviving suddenly, and growing very red.

"At Mrs. Custers's. I know the house; for I visit there," answered Dillon, eying her curiously. Number 260. He was coming down the steps. I did not speak to him; he seemed in such a hurry." The brother and sister looked at each other.

"Do you know any body in Nineteenth Street?" asked Mrs. Romer of Jack. "I shall go there myself," looking fierce.

"Better go home first," insinuated Jack. "He may be there, as I said."

"Mrs. Romer and Jack went home. No; Mr. Romer had not come.

"I knew it!" cried Mrs. Romer. "He thought I was safely out of the way. He is there in Nineteenth Street."

Dillon saw him coming away," urged Jack.

"Then some one will be there who will know where he has gone," said Mrs. Romer, dropping Jack's arm, and walking the floor. She believed in her heart that Jack was trying to screen him; that Mr. Dillon had fibbed; that all the men were in a conspiracy against her. Mr. Romer was at number 260? that moment, and she would have carried its door by assault if the footman had not withstood her. She would have done, I do not know what dreadful thing she would have done to Mrs. Custers, if that lady, in virtue of the massive sympathy existing between women, had not intuitively comprehended the case.

"A gentleman was here, Madam," said Mrs. Custers. "A gentleman about twenty-eight, I should say. Light mustache—rather a handsome man. Asked for Mrs. Romer."

Here Mrs. Romer faced about on Jack, who quailed before her, as if he had asked for Miss Green.

"She had just started for Peekskill, and he seemed disappointed," pursued Mrs. Custers. "It is my belief that he started on after her. He had time, as I told him, to catch the train."

Mrs. Romer clutched her brother's arm.

"Come, Jack, let us go. Did I tell you the anniversary of his wedding-day? Think of it! Come, I say!"

"Where?" asked Jack, looking obstinate. "There is no use in going to Peekskill, unless we can find a further clew. You are overexcited. Do you know this Miss Green? Don't jump at conclusions."

"I have seen her," returned Mrs. Romer. "One of your round-hat and waterfall girls. Do you know where Peekskill is? She was going in Peekskill, Mrs. Custers?"

"I don't, ma'am," said the Custers; "and, from what I have seen, I should say the less any one knew of her the better."

"You see," urged Jack, "we had better go home;" and home they went again. Mrs. Romer threw herself on a lounge. Jack lighted a cigar, and waited to know what to do next. One cab or bedtime the house was startled by a furious ring. Two telegrams for Mrs. Romer. Mrs. Romer tried to read, but her hand shook, and her head failed her. "He is dead!" she said, chokingly. "Read it, Jack. "Stuff!" quoth Jack, and read out:

"Mr. Romer is at Peekskill, and is very ready. Should you like to know where, will meet you at depôt, and show you. Excuse this liberty, but feel sure but it looks suspicious. ELIZA ROSE."

Mrs. Romer sprang to her feet.

"There! I knew it! The fiend! Jack! there! there! You see now, don't you? you see, don't you? you see, Jack—" beginning to sob.

"What is this?" said Jack, taking up the other telegram.

"DEAR JULIA,—Have been called away suddenly on important business. Home soon. Will explain.

HENRY ROMER."

"Important business indeed! the hypocrite! the wretch! That is the way you men treat women. I think he will explain! Home soon! He may see me in Peekskill, but he will not explain to me." Mrs. Romer had done with tears now, and walked about excitedly. Jack took both her hands, and looked down at her with genuine sympathy.

"Poor little sis! The first train leaves at six, or thereabout; and you had better go to bed now and get a start thing you will be fit for to-morrow."

But Mrs. Romer scorned the idea of sleep. She was too busy thinking what she should say to Mr. Romer, and how she should look. She went over over the various lines of conduct all that night and all the way to Peekskill, sitting quiet and silent to Jack's relief. At the depôt Miss Rose was waiting, to whom Jack had telegraphed at Mrs. Romer's orders, though sorely against his inclination. "My poor friend," cried Miss Rigss, pathetically, "I will take you there at once," meaning Mrs. Drake's house; and on the way she favored Mrs. Romer with her view of the story that we know. Jack they dropped. There was an evident lurking unbelief in that young gentleman, spite of facts, distasteful to both ladies. As for us, we would have it Mrs. Drake came in person to the door.

"Is Miss Green here," asked Mrs. Romer, "or," with an effort, "Mr. Romer?"

Mrs. Drake looked astonished.

"Miss Green and Mr. Romer went down in the first train this morning."

"Down? You mean to New York?"

"Yes."

"And they spent last night here? Mr. Romer spent the night here? You dare to tell me that?" reading in Mrs. Drake's eyes assent.

"Come, come," said Jack, hastily interfering with his usual formula. "We had better go home. God Heavens, Julia! would you quarrel in the street?" and he fairly dragged Mrs. Romer away, leaving Mrs. Drake stupefied with astonishment. So Jack, Mrs. Romer, and Miss Riggs came back to New York. Mr. Romer and Miss Green were already in New York, and had driven to Mrs. Custers's house. The lady herself came to the door.

"Take them trunks back," was her first salutation. "They don't come in here. We have none but ladies here."

Miss Green came up to explain.

"They are mine, Mrs. Custers. Don't you know me? I—"

"They don't come in here. I know all I care to know of you," returned Mrs. Custers, grimly.

Mr. Romer interposed.

"No mistake at all," said the lady, sharply; "and you can take yourself off. I have heard enough about you both since you left."

The trunks were replaced, and they drove to the boarding-place of Mr. Green. He had not returned, and there was not a room vacant, not to mention the fact that it was a gentleman's boarding-house. Then Mr. Romer took a frantic resolve. He would take her home till she could find a boarding-place; and for Mrs. Romer, she must bear reason. Why this desire were wrong so hard on each other? Why because Mrs. Romer was perpetually jealous should he leave this poor, friendless, pretty, plucky little girl, who would not cry, though her lip trembled, in the streets, with two monstrous, unmanageable trunks, a stranger to New York and its ways? Was not he, Romer, master in his own house? I think if he had met Mrs. Romer then he might have conquered her; but instead, on entering he found an unexpected silence and emptiness, and was struck dumb by the first words of the servant.

"Mrs. Romer, sir? She has gone off, Sir, with Mr. Jack. I think she said, Sir, she was going to Peekskill."

Gone to Peekskill! Mr. Romer stood thinking. Miss Green explained to him that having found a resting-place for her trunks, she would go and search for a boarding-place; that she knew many of the streets, and had a map of New York, etc. Mr. Romer scarcely heard her. What on earth took Julia and Jack to Peekskill? He sat and smoked and pondered on the question, though it was long past business hours. As he smoked a carriage drove furiously to the door, from which descended Jack, his wife, and Miss Riggs. Mr. Romer's wonder increased. What was Miss Riggs doing there? He hastened to meet them.

"Come in, Miss Riggs," said his wife, brushing past her husband without looking at him. Mr. Romer turned to Miss Riggs. She recoiled on Jack, who shook his head and looked doubtful.

"What the devil is this?" and Romer, with rising wrath. At the same moment, "What is this?" demanded Mrs. Romer, coming in view of Miss Green's trunks, that had been left at her request in the hall.

"Those," said Mr. Romer, coloring and going forward, "why, those are—Miss Green's trunks."

I do not attempt to describe the scene that followed. You will get the nearest parallel by throwing a hand-grenade into a powder-magazine. Mrs. Romer went to bed in hysterics. Miss Riggs went home in like condition. Mr. Romer took Jack into the library, told him the whole story, and begged him to take the poor little fire-brand, Green's sister, who might be expected back at any moment, in charge. Jack came out splendidly: met Miss Green at the door, gave her lunch, excused the host and hostess, escorted her to her boarding-place, filled the whole thing straight through, in fact, so that the poor child never suspected what mischief she had made. When Green returned from Washington Mr. Romer called on Mr. Green. Mr. Green in his turn called on Jack, and both gentlemen waited on Mrs. Romer. Letters were sent to Peekskill, explanations made and received, and then the party went in force to explain to Mrs. Custers. Mrs. Romer confessed that she was too rash, and she has cut Miss Riggs; but she still insists that Miss Green is a forward, designing girl, and lectures Jack, who is never on her side, but still preserves Mr. Romer's mendacious telegram, and flourishes it at times in a way to seriously annoy that worthy gentleman.

DAUGHTERS TO SELL.

Daughters to sell! A LOT OF 'EM NOW.
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!
They cost more money than I can tell;
Their education has been first-rate;
What wealthy young nobleman wants a mate?
They sing like nightingales; play as well—
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!

Here's my fine daughters, my daughters all!
Germans, and French they know,
Dance like Sylphides for grace and ease—
Dresses as your purse, whatever pleases.
Here's a nice wife for a rich young swell!
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!

Beautiful daughters, dark and fair!
Look at them well, ere you make inquiries.
Hop! you that in lordly mansions dwell,
Daughters to sell! Daughters to sell!

Buy my dear daughters! Who wants a bride,
That can give her a carriage and horses to ride,
Stand an open door for his friends to pass,
And no end of acres of civilized

Deer new furniture, jewels, and plate,
All sorts of servants upon her to wait!
Visits to Paris, Vienna, and Rome,
In short, all she's been brought up to at home.
Here are girls for your money—but you must be shrill.
My daughters to sell! My daughters to sell!

THE GREAT TEE-DOG.—Calcraft.

A few weeks after a late marriage the husband had some peculiar thoughts when putting on his last clean shirt, as to the ungenuineness of a wedding. His thereupon rose earlier than usual one morning and kindled a fire. When hanging up the kettle he made a noise on purpose to arouse his sory wife. She instantly popped over the bedstead, and then exclaimed:

"My dear, what are you doing?"

He deliberately responded: "I've put on my last clean shirt, and I'm going to cook for myself."

"Very well," replied Mrs. Easy, "you had better wash out the kettle."

A lady fixed the following letters in the bottom of a floor-barrel and asked her husband to read them if he could: O-H-I-O.

"My wife's so very bad," cried Will,
"I fear she se'er will hold it;
She keeps her feet"—"Mine's worse," quoth Phil,
"The jade has just now sold it."

DESCENT OF THE FEMALE SEX.—The Emperor of Austria, to judge from recent events, must belong to the descendants of Miss Nancy.

"And you have been married, Patrick, three times?" "Yes, indeed, Sir." "And what do you say of the last?" "Why, you see, the last?" "Well, Mary O'Brine, that I married the first time was a good woman, and God be merciful to her sowl, she's gone to the Lord long before me. Then I got married to Bridget Flanagan, and a bad woman she was, and she got to the Lord, and the devil took her. Then, faix that I was, I got married to Miss Peggy Fitzgerald, and a sweet, very bad—so bad that neither the Lord nor the devil would have her, so I'm left with her still."

WIFE'S COMMANDMENTS.

1. Thou shalt have no other wife but me.—2. Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, or likeness of a servant-girl to bow down to her and serve her.—3. Thou shalt not take the name of thy wife in vain.—4. Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy.—5. Honor thy wife's father and mother.—6. Thou shalt not fret.—7. Thou shalt not commit fault with the servant.—8. Thou shalt not chew tobacco.—9. Thou shalt not be behind the door with the servant girl, nor in the room either.—10. Thou shalt not covet the tavern-keeper's rum, nor his brandy, nor his wine, nor any thing that is behind the bar of the ramseller.—11. Thou shalt not visit the billiard-hall.—And the 12th commandment: Thou shalt not stay out later than nine o'clock at night.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.—Breakfast is ready.

TEACHING BY EXAMPLE.

"What is the 'Poet's License,' say?"
Asked one simpleton of another.
"Now give me an example, pray,
That what I see I may discover."
Quick as a flash he plants a kiss
Sillikerd-full—which kisses always fail.
"Nay, Sir! what liberty is this?"
"The Poet's Licenses that is all!"

CONSIDERATE.—We once knew a city man who never got up till twelve at noon, because, he said, it was only fair, he day broke in the morning, that he should give the evening its position before beginning business with it.

"If you want to buy a sewing-machine," said an old lady, entering a shop. "Do you wish a machine with a feller?" inquired the shopman. "Sakes, no! don't want any of your fellers about me."

Why are your lips often at variance?—Because words are frequently passing between them.

Why is a pair of skates like an apple?—They have occasioned a lot of mash.

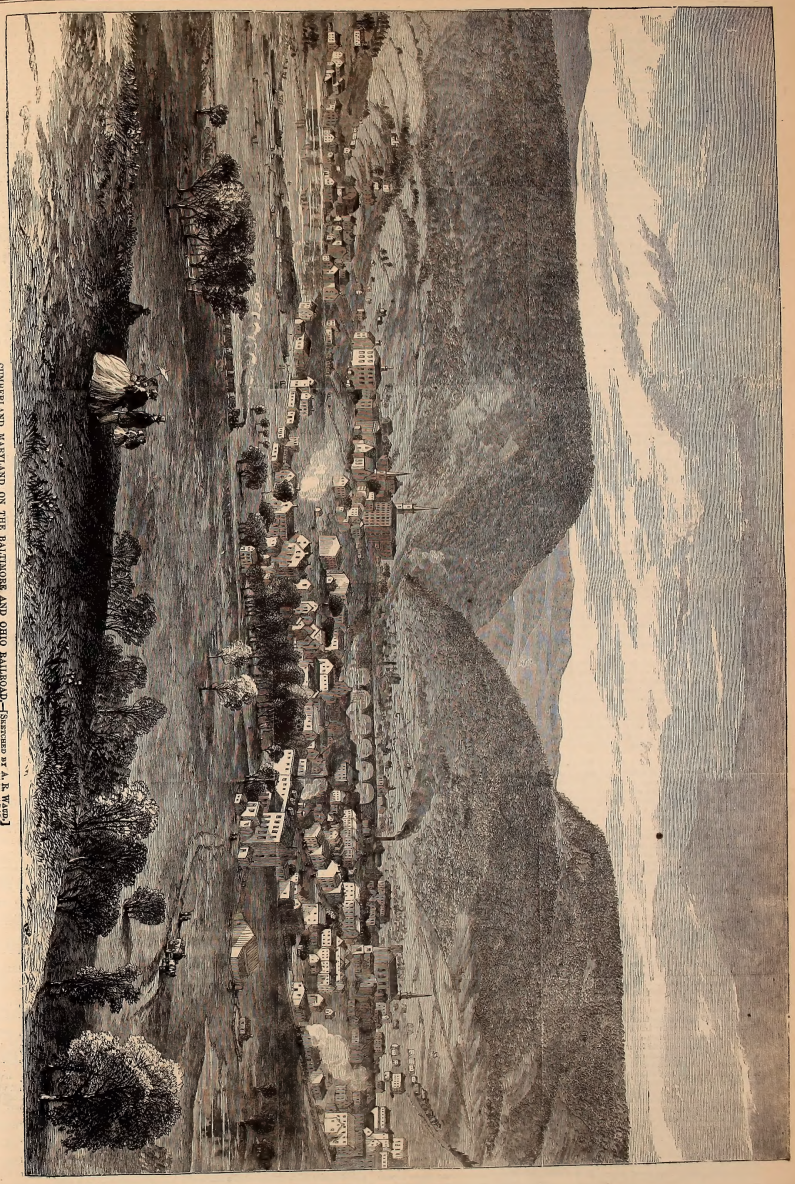
A dealer in musical instruments, in one of his advertisements, declares that his drums, among other articles which he has for sale, are "full in bass." Will he be kind enough to tell us what they are good for, then?

Never chew your words. Open the mouth and let the voice come out. A student once asked: "Can't you chew, forchilds, gracilds, gracilds, quercilds dwell with that man who's a stranger to rectitchude?"

Of six hundred and twelve young ladies who fainted last year, more than half of them fell in the arms of gentlemen. Only three had the misfortune to fall on the floor.

A SENSATION STORY.

BY A VEGETARIAN.



He had done the deed! But little did he guess that the eye of an individual potato in the next field was upon him. The potato pursued the dreadful story into the ear of the turnip, who told the secret to his potato, and though I am bound to add that the corn was out after that betraying confidence, the wind, and the cucumber was in a most distressed frame of mind in consequence. The culprit was overtaken by justice and several scarlet-runners, and taken before a justice of the peas. The case was investigated to the very roots, and the potato was, of course, principal witness for the prosecution.

Wouldst know, O reader, the wretched man's guilt? He had shed the blood of a turnip while expecting it would ever turn up in evidence against him. He was would ever turn up in evidence against him. He was executed, of course, the mode of execution decapitation, in order to sever the carrot-ed artery.

No man can avoid his own company, so he had best make it as good as possible.

THE THREE SUITORS.

"I'll woo her in a golden shower!"
The rich Parpureus cried;
When suitors bring a mighty dower
They may not be denied;
My castle, by a silver lake,
Shall lure her to my side;
My all-prevailing wealth shall break
This haughty beauty's pride.
He came!—his love to Ella told;
She spurn'd his name and scorn'd his gold.

Honorius, polite and wise,
Essayed her heart to move
Deep-read, his lore each passion tries,
And masters all—save Love!
He spake of Glory—her bright eye
Flashed the full meed of Fame;
Each tale of woe and misery
An answering tear might claim.
"Hah! ah!" thought he, "the mail is mine!"
She heard, but bade him hope resign.

Sir Edmund listened to her fame,
And donn'd his armor bright;
He laugh'd to scorn Don Cupid's name,
And dared him to the fight.
Ah! boastless vaunt! Behold him now!
Low at her feet he lies;
His Milan coat of burnish'd steel
Pierced through by Ella's eyes!
She pitying—loosed her captive's band,
And gave the conquer'd knight her hand.

GHOSTS' GARMENTS.

"I CALCULATE from a slight but smart glance at your physical peculiarities that you don't believe in ghosts, younger."

Now, besides being called "youngster"—a thing very irritating when you can catch hell of your mustache without disfiguring your upper lip—there is something very irritating to an Englishman in being addressed thus summarily and personally by an entire stranger. We, the sole occupants of a first-class carriage on the North-Western Railway, had only just emerged from the first bridge after leaving Euston Square Station. I, with a dignity which would convince most people of my majority, drew myself up to my full height (all 5 ft. 8½in., though not all on account of the shortness of my legs), and replied that I was glad that so short an acquaintance had been sufficient to assure me of my freedom from any such ridiculous superstition.

"Ha!" said the stranger, with a strong nasal twang, "I reckon how the land lies in it." "Ha!" I echoed. Then I reckon that the sooner you begin to believe the better, and if you've got such a thing as a cigar about you I'll commence your edification at once."

"Thank you," said I; "here is a cigar, but I prefer my present state of ignorance and incredulity."

"Very well rounded that for a youngster," retorted my tormentor. "Dr. Johnson didn't make his diamond so neatly, I see; but still, as you say, you don't believe in ghosts, your edification ain't the thing quite, neither."

By this time he had selected the biggest cigar from my case, had lighted it with a match which he struck on his trowsers, and had begun to smoke it, rolling it from one side of his mouth to the other, and regarding me with a cool impertinence which stifled me with indignation.

"What!" he continued, after a puff or two, "it's a rank Britisher, is this cigar; but it was the best you'd get, so I won't grumble. Now stick another in your own mouth and then I'll begin your education."

I had intended to smoke, and I was not to be stopped by any false notion of dignity; so I did as he requested, and resigned myself to my fate. No sooner had I done so than he exclaimed, "Now that's what I call comfort!" smacked his legs and his fingers, and evinced such a high state of untouch hilarity that I began to be afraid I was locked up with a lunatic.

"Ha!" he cried, snapping his fingers, "I'll make your hair stand on end, I will, spite of all your manure and sandstone; and your legs won't hurt by a little stretching neither. Air you ready?"

Hoping at last to draw off his attention from my personal appearance by inducing him to begin a story at once, I nodded, and he commenced:

"I'll tell you only a-thinkin' what I'm not a-thinkin' be. I've got one story as kills outright; but I want to cross to-night, and being found with a corpse might be inconvenient, so I'll let you off that one, and another as mostly brings on fits; but this carriage is narrow for fits. And I've another—well, you're a good-natured fellow, you air, and so I'll tell it you; it's only dangerous in heart disease.

"My heart is perfectly sound," I said, in as steady a voice as I could assume.

"Well, then! Here goes. About two months ago I was traveling by express from Dublin to Cork, meanin' to cross to my native land in a sudden bust of affection toward an old uncle o' mine who I loved was about to leave this world for a better, and I was a-moralizing on the shortness of life, and consoling myself with reflections on the advantageous arrangements of Providence, which don't allow rich uncles to take their fat springs with 'em, when I had the most extraordinary adventure with a fellow-shoot that I remember in all my experience.

"I was all alone in the compartment with my luggage, which consisted of a male portmanteau, a flymade trunk, and a bandbox, as I had promised my old woman to bring her some finery from Paris. The bandbox was none of your pasteboard flimsies, but a true Parisian, made of shingle, so I wrapped it up in my traveling rug. I put it under my head, and I went fast asleep. I'm a sound sleeper. Many a time have I gone to sleep when peggy-fishing, and slept all night in spite of the bull-frogs a-leaping and a-croaking all over me, but I never had such a restless nap in my life as in that compartment. First of all I had a tickling in my nose, as if a drunken centipede was a-trying to open his door with a tooth-pick. In the ensuing irritation I lifted my hand, when—which I went my traveling-rug. Still I didn't rouse up definite, but snored on. Presently the irritation increased, and I lifted my head again, when away went the bandbox all. I said to myself, 'Now they'll be satisfied, I hope' (for I knew it was ghosts fast enough, being used to 'em); 'and sure enough, whatever it was left me alone a while; only heard a noise in my sleep like a mouse in the fayrnale trunk. Presently, however, I was aware of pinchin' going on in various portions of myself. I am averse to pinchin', natural, and I twitched and twitched, determined to stand it out. But the pinchin' increased from the desultory to the vicious, I knew it wasn't any good, so I opened my eyes and sat up, and, lookin' round, he wasn't a finger-and-fagger of exceeding beauty dressed complete in my wife's garments! Parisian bonnet with valier ribbons, bright-green shawl, flounced petticoat, and crimp, blue slippers, and pink silk stockings, complete! And if I didn't stare, why this cigar's tobacco, that's all!"

He paused a moment, and looked at me with a most evil expression of enjoyment; I let his impertinence pass without the smallest remark, and he continued:

"Wa'al, I wasn't skeered a fig, but looked at her fixed, took out a pipe (I always have usual), and asked her if she objected to my lightin' up. 'Not a bit,' she answered, quite pleasant, and she smiled, opening her lips, through which I saw the back of the carriage."

"The back of the carriage?"

"Yes. Ghosts is hollow, and got no teeth, no bones, no hair, nothin' but flesh and skin, and only the very outside o' that: a sort of nothing without thinkin. If she hadn't been a ghost she'd have had her head, with the compartment light over it, would a looked like the globe of a gruffine lamp afore it's lit; but when the moon's behind you can't see through; it's only semi-transparent, like ground glass, and if it hadn't been one of those new-fangled hats, like a captain's biled shirt, with strings, I could only a seen the cushions at the back through a chance chink in the straw. As it was I saw three buttons and puffy cords, though—"

"Nonsense," I said. I was delighted when a question suggested itself which I thought would prove a gear to the story. "Nonsense! I don't see how ghosts are made of such slight material, how can you account for your friend's supporting the weight of the bonnet with her head, and the shawl with her arms, or with the gimp trimmings, and the rest of it?"

"Very clever for you, youngster. That was what had presented itself to me, and puzzled me a long time, as it has puzzled most incre'dlous writers on the subject, old and new. Ghosts of clothes, they've say, air ridiculous, and don't exist. Nothing but vapor bonnet, let alone crinoline. Such was the state of my feelin's on the subject when this lady made me a present of the knowledge I'm a-imparting. 'Here's a chance of settling the question,' says I to myself, 'as may never occur again. Here's a fayrnale ghost, as I know a ghost is, and I'll see what the buttons of the carriage through her bump o' phrenologreintiveness, and she's wearin' clothes, as I know—all real and fashionable from Paris.' I've said to the tune of five hundred dollars for 'em; and this here immaterial ghost is wearin' those material clothes as well as if she was a-livin' in the outer steel. Here's an opportunity,' said I, 'of asking a question—'"

"Now then, my friend," said I, "I am impatient to hear the answer." For there was a want of alacrity in his tone, and a falling off in his spirit, and he had taken to looking out of the window and studying the ceiling: all of which, I thought, betokened that either his invention or his memory was failing him.

"Wa'al," he replied, "there is one lesson I never have forgot, 'cause I had to write it seventy-seven times in one week for it, and that is, 'It was Patience is a Virtue, and the sooner you lay it to heart the better for your wife, if you ever have one;' which, looking consumptive, you won't, perhaps, so it don't matter much."

I again took no notice of his grunt and of derision.

"Wa'al, you're beginning to learn, I see," he went on, "a bit of knowledge. For consequence I said, I, 'would you oblige me and the live world in general by informin' me how it is you appear in clothes?' 'Oh!' she answered, quite astride the question,' she replied, turnin' green—which is ghost for blushin'; 'you wouldn't dare put the question to a live lady.' 'Ah!' said I, quite astride the fact, 'seem to think a spirit hasn't got any feelin's whatever. I've heard questions asked, when I've been forced to lay my head in my hands, that would have ashamed of ever havin' lived.' 'I'm sure I beg your pardon,' said I, feelin' very small lager indeed, 'but I meant no offence.' 'Wa'al, I should a said, how do you manage to bear the weight of 'em?' 'Why, do you think we haven't any strength?' she said; 'then how do you account for our standing?'

"Trow,' I answered, feeling I had met my match for the first time in my life; 'but that didn't occur to me.' 'Shall be pleased to show you,' said she, holding out a pretty a little gloved hand as it ever was my fortune to see. Now it's rather a ticklish strain in a man's character when a ghost asks him to shake hands, but I wasn't going to be afraid of a human soap-bubble, especially being fayrnale. So I shook hands with her, and got such a grip as I never had, except from Heenan. 'Now,' she said, a-holding out the pretty hand again, 'give a poke at that with your finger.' I giv' a poke, and the glove tumbled all of a heap on the floor, as if I'd knocked it off a pair of steps. There was nothing but little bare white semi-transparent fingers as were ever manufactured out of opal glass.

"Wa'al, I was skeered a little at that, though I might a known how it would be if I'd a reckoned; and I said, handing her the glove, which she put on all at once without unbuttonin'. 'Excuse my asking an impertinent question, but where on airth do you imitated noblegoes for your strength from?' 'Will,' she answered, with another smile, 'will and spirit.'

"Oh, indeed,' said I. 'And what might you mean by spirit?' 'Why, spirit is a kinder gas, which blows us out to shape, like balloons.' 'Oh, indeed,' says I; 'you're blown out like balloons, air you?' 'Yes,' she answered, 'and if you don't break our fins, which you can't when we don't wish, we are as strong as you felt just now.' 'Oh, indeed,' said I, now considerable quite pugnacious, 'and when I knocked that glove off just now did I break the fins?' 'I wonder guess you did,' she says; 'it's only just beyond.' 'Then, Madam,' said I, thinkin' I'd caught her tripping, for these ghosts most of 'em lie like everlastin', 'if you've blown out like balloons, how is it you didn't collapse right away? It wasn't will, was it?' 'No,' she answered, quite ready: 'I'd given that up; it's the nature of the gas to go right up.' 'How so?' said I, thinking it rather a fayrnale reason. 'Why,' she said, 'spirit and air is like to and water, and won't have you can stir 'em as hard as you like, but they won't mix.' 'Oh, indeed,' said I again, puzzlin' my head for another question. For mind you, youngster, whenever you meet with a ghost, ask ten questions, and never leave off. They're compelled to answer them out of politeness, and I will be glad to have you tell me what's a rule. But once let 'em out of harness and they always run to their own stones, like a horse to his stable, and there's no stopping 'em; and then, I guess a ghost's life togs 'em, they're all so long and dreffal melancholy. But she was politeness itself, was this young spirit. Seeing me a-scratchin' what to say next, she asked me with unusual delicacy whether I had any more questions to ask her, and just at that moment one second long sneeze burst with such impetuosity as knocked my pipe clean out of my mouth. 'Wa'al, as you ask me,' I said, 'I have just one or two or so.' 'You were speakin' of lying up in a tube. What did you mean by that? Were you sick?' 'No,' she said, 'I take it the word is unknown to me never sick. It was because I hadn't any clothes on. I was lying spread out most uncomfortable in the smoke-stack.' 'Would you kindly tell you was asleep and I could dress myself.' 'Why didn't you get into one of the cushions?' said I. 'There wasn't room,' she answered, 'for three persons on that bench are all sose, and I couldn't get into two without solution of continuity, which is dreadfully painful for a ghost, and—' 'Stop, stop, I entreat,' I cried, 'you are a friend of mine who did that, and the passengers took one of the cushions to play cards on, and then breakfasted off it, and I sat down on the rest, what with changing partners, and putting down the cushions the wrong way, and one thing and another, the half of them was where the other half should a had got to, and, as they both began searching one for the other at the same time, they were near a dozen this time.' 'Indeed!' said she, 'and then he busied himself three times in the eye before he found the join.' 'Wa'al, I said, I ready with another question this time, 'how comes equally ill-provided with clothing?' 'All,' she replied, 'except those that are buried in clothes, and they don't last long. Ghosts used to be buried in their winding-sheets, but it won't do now. A young ghost soon learns that. I had mine torn to rags the first night, and had to get into my present costume, the greatest indignity a ghost has to suffer. And even them that have dresses haven't the right sort. A friend of mine was buried in her wedding dress, but she got so stuffed about it, that she left it off after a week.' 'I suppose you can find clothes generally, can't you?' said I. 'Yes, if a lady has a very overparticular and not fancy,' she answered. 'You see, we only want them at night, not being visible by day, even to one another, but it's very awkward sometimes when we are obliged to put on the clothes you livin' bein's have just taken off, for if you want them in the hurry and flurry of dressing in a hurry, and creep into any refuge we can find, and that's the explanation of many of those stories of crockery falling and storm-doors blowing open like a bit of miscellaneous, but they are the worst sort. Now, I remember—' 'Excuse me,' said I, interrupting her, 'but what do you mean by fancy ghosts?' 'Them that don't care about going about decent,' said she, 'they are the sort that mostly fills your furniture. I've seen 'em lying as they as they are sale in the leg of a table, and they have no sense of decency whatever; they crowd together any how, and never put about themselves like a bit of miscellaneous. They have greatly increased of late, having got a new pleasure in duping the living; but they are never spoke to. I allus go about at night well dressed if I can, but allus dressed. Not but what I am put to straits sometimes, as the other night I was sleeping, on business, at an old castle on the Rhine, and there was no flymale wardrobe there whatever, I had to put on a table-cloth. All of good and decent es, and I had to fix myself up in them as best I could. I met the old baron as I was a goin' down stairs, and nearly frightened him into fits. I saw he sent an account of it to a paper, in which he swears he had a visit from his great-grandmother. I knew the old chap well, for my father had not shin' to do with the old gentleman at all.' 'Bless me!' I says, catching a clew. 'Do you have classes?' 'Yes,' she answered, quite serious, as she began shakin' her head from one side to the other like a pendulum turned the wrong way up. 'Ah,' she said, 'I have; but our bisness is pure, ishment. We have to go about all over the world, trackin' the history right away three, of all our sins. Some of our sins die out at once, but some little things we never think twice of at the time of committin' go rolling on like snow-balls forever. I've only got two left to work off on them as is a trade a child of mine still to get out of a scrape with his father, which has already led to two murders, a suicide, and frauds without number; I don't know when that will die, but it's not active at the present moment. The other, on which I'm traveling now, in consequence of the way I left my property, I left it to a distant relation, who was a spendthrift, and every penny he spent ill I have had to waste the effects of; but it's pretty well worn out, as a great deal of it has passed into charities, which relieves me. Indeed, the last evil deed done with money was by the housekeeper of that baron on the Rhine. The son of the man the property was left to in new dresses of great, the spoils of Paris, bought with part of his father's fortune. I must be in at his death, and then I think there'll be only eleven and sixpence-halfpenny left.' 'Are you off to now?' I asked her. 'To America,' she answered. 'But what brings you here in this carriage?' I thought you spirits had a quicker way of transit.' 'By day we fly through the air, being invisible, but not by night; and the man whose death I am to be in at will die in Liverpool. By night we are obliged to travel dressed, and so can only go by mortal conveyances.' 'But how even will you get to America?' I said. 'I will say that for her, that, except the gloves were a bit stretched, the clothes weren't damaged a bit. 'Why, youngster, this is my Station, and if you don't believe in ghosts by this time, it's my opinion you never will."

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

BY MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XXII.

SAM might well talk about the weeds! Oh, how they grew! The flowers might break beneath the harsh wind, or dry up in the sun's fierce rays, but nothing that grew in the garden knew when to cloud—cold or hot, wet or dry—no matter what the weather was, it suited the weeds. Which, to be sure, proved a little how they were of an extremely amiable disposition, and made the best of every thing; but Lily said if that were so, she thought it was very hard that the rose-trees, for what good did such amiability do one?

The weeds gave Lily a great deal of trouble. First of all, she had them out of the flower-bed in a nest of sorrel who could tell which was which? at least of such young gardeners. Then chickweed sacked to pick them out of the grass-plots and thistles had such beautiful white and green leaves; and other mischievous things dressed themselves with such very innocent appearances that before she knew it poor Lily's weedless garden showed sorrel and chickweed and mallows enough to supply three sheep. So Sam told her.

Lily fought the invaders bravely; hoeing up some, and grubbing up others, and uprooting the very obstinate ones with her little strong fingers. At first she tried only the hoe; and before long every weed had it head cut off, and the ground was raised smooth and level. Lily was delighted.

"I don't think the weeds matter much, after all," she said; "I've got rid of them already. Oh, aren't my poor plants glad!"

Glad to have a breathing spell," said her brother Sam; "but how long do you think it will take your weeds to grow up again?"

"Don't call 'em my weeds," said Lily—"how long? why they won't come at all: I've cut their heads off."

"And what do you think sorrel cares for that? It's a hydra—with a hundred heads."

"Well, I shall kill them," said Lily; "I never saw such stuff. The roots just run on and on, all over the ground, and there's a head every where. I'll cut 'em up again."

"Look here," said Sam, digging up a trowelful of earth—"here are my number of underground heads—little fat roots, pretty white knots, that start up with the first shower. You did not hoe deep enough."

"I guess I did, though," said Lily. "Why, I had my shoes just covered the whole time."

"Had your shoes covered! How did that come to pass, pray?"

"Why—so," said Lily, taking her hoe and walking backward, hoeing the earth toward her at every step.

"But that is not the way to hoe," said Sam: "you must walk forward instead of back, else you will cover your hoe-ing as you walk right over the cut, and cover them all up."

"Yes, that's just what I did, said Lily, "and it was very troublesome. I couldn't tell why I had been."

"Well, do the other way next time," said Sam; "this garden will want hoeing again in a few days; and then use your eyes as well as your hoe. There is a young mullein comfortably established at the root of your rose-tree."

"The mischievous thing!" said Lily. "Well, it shan't be comfortable very long." And she set her foot upon the dock and took hold of the mullein and pulled off a handful of leaves. "Dear, dear!" said Lily; "what shall I do now?"

"Why should I wait?"

"Because now you have nothing to take hold of, and it would be easier to dig. Come, let's go up and see what Clover is about."

"Oh, Clover is always weeding!" said Lily, as she followed Sam up the hill. "Her garden must be a great deal worse than mine."

On the contrary, there was not a weed in it.

"Always weeding!" Sam repeated, with a smile, as he stood by the neat little patch of ground where Clover was tenderly watering her seedlings; "always weeding—that is the great secret of never having any weeds."

"Well, I don't think she has many flowers either," said Lily. "Just see how many empty places—here—and here—and here. Two somethings in one place, and three somethings else in another place. There's hardly a whole patch of any thing."

"How is that, Clover?" said Sam, watching his sedate little sister, whose cheeks crimsoned in a moment. "I thought you had taken such pains with your flowers?"

"Yes, I have tried to take a great deal of pains with them," said Clover, looking very uncomfortable.

"Ah! you see pains won't do every thing," said Lily, triumphantly; "and I just planted my flowers—and dug—and my garden's quite full."

Sam whistled a little, thinking of the sorrel and mullens, of which also Lily's garden had been full.

"It looks to me," he said, gravely, bending down to examine the little garden—"it looks to me as if the hedge had been encroaching here and there."

"The hedges!" said Lily. "I don't see any hedges."

"I thought I saw signs of it," said Sam, passing on to another place and scanning that. Clover looked at him anxiously. Did he really know what had become of her flowers? But Sam's face was imperturbable.

"What do you mean?" said Lily. "You're as good as a puzzle-book any day."

"What do I mean?" said Sam. "I was only alluding to one of the properties of mignonette—one thing of which you can not be. So, of course, where the hedge creeps in the flowers must creep out."

"Well, I give it up," said Lily. "Why, Clover, I thought you had ever so many of these—what do you call 'em?—and such a only bed!"

"My balms?" said Clover. "Oh, I'm glad you spoke of them! I wanted to ask Sam something, and I forgot all about it. Sam, please do!" Clover stood aside the overhanging leaves of her three balsams, and showed a strange state of things. The ground was thick and very brown, lying in small hills and valleys; and right up from the highest hill stuck out a small brown paw, all furry and motionless.

"A cat!" cried Lily, darting forward.

"No, it's not a cat's paw," said Clover, "and I'm sure I don't know what it is; nor how it could get here among my balsams."

"It is a rabbit's paw," said Sam, looking close at it; "and what's more, the rabbit is here too."

"Oh, has he hid away there to eat up my poor flowers?" said Clover, remembering that squirrels had a taste for mignonette, and there was no telling what rabbits might like.

"Not he," said Sam, "he will never do any more mischief. He has died and hid himself from view."

"But who could have done it?" said Clover.

"Not Jack?"

"It must have been Mat," said her brother. "I saw him with a young rabbit in his mouth yesterday; but he does not like raw meat, you know, and so did not eat it."

"What's the use of hiding it away, then?" said Lily.

"Ah, that I can not tell. A dog generally seems to act upon the supposition that a famine may come some day; and in that case Mat probably thought he would save it."

"Funny old Mat!" said Clover, laughing. "But I wish he had buried his rabbit somewhere else! I don't want to touch it."

"Then I wouldn't touch it," said Sam. "The balsams will not be troubled, in fact they will rather like it!"

"Like it?"

"Why yes," said Sam; "they have not the least objection to a rabbit, and have great appetites."

"There's another puzzle!" said Lily, despairingly.

"Not a bit; I mean what I say. Your balsams are great feeders, and will send their little roots to get many a rich meal from the rabbit."

"I don't like that at all," said Clover, with a little disgust.

"It's what many plants will do, however," said Sam; "though not to be too delicate to relish quite such a hearty meal."

Plants ought not to eat at all," said Lily, "like do-do-nothing fairies."

"Do nothing!" exclaimed Sam; "is it nothing to fill the world with beauty and fragrance; nothing to purify all the air for us to breathe; to furnish our clothing, to provide our fuel, our lights, our food?"

"Dear me, how you run on!" said Lily. "I don't know any thing about that, Sam. What I say is, that they don't work—my flowers, I mean."

"Well, my dear, we are half as busy as they are shall have great hopes of your turning out a useful woman," said her brother.

"Great hopes, indeed, scornfully, "I should think you'd better begin 'em right away then."

"But, Sam," said Clover, "oh, won't you please tell us all about it? It sounds so interesting."

"Can't this afternoon," said Sam. "I promised Primrose that I would help her train her sweet-peas. She is the child all this time!"

"Oh, she's singing to her garden; didn't you hear her?" said Lily.

"Yes, and it's so funny. She does it every day, but she'll never let any body get near her."

"It is funny," said Clover; "only it's so pretty, too. I think she tells manmas about every one of her flowers, and says, I think manmas makes up little verses for them. And then Prim goes out and watches her flowers and sings the verses. But she'll never tell what they are."

"I'm bound to hear some of those verses," said Sam, beginning to move softly along by the fence.

"I shall creep up and listen."

"May we come too?" said Clover.

"If you'll not make the least noise."

So very softly and slowly, moving on tip-toe, and not venturing to speak a word, they crept up the hill and round the house, coming at last to a corner very near Prim's little garden; and a pretty sight it was. The flowers were beginning to bloom quite freely—a white rose on the little rose-bush, and a scarlet blossom or two on the geranium; with white tufts of alyssum, and green ones of mignonette. A splendid dahlia bloom held up its purple-colored cup, and the rich fragrance of the sweet-peas filled the air, while high above all mounted the ipomœa imperialis, whose blossoms were only to begin to show, but never turning her eyes from the beautiful vine; singing softly to herself, so that the silent listeners could but just catch the words:

"Climb, climb a little way,
Follow Jesse every day.
Holding fast his precious hand,
Mount at last where angels stand.
Little creeper, climb and climb,
He is strong enough for all.
In his tender love and care
Fresh, new blossoms shall bear.
All your beauty is from him;
Let him guide, let him trim:
Hide the sun, or bid it shine—
Still climb, little vine!"

And Prim stooped down for a sprig of mignonette and one of sweet alyssum, and carried them off into the house for "mamma."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FEW events—unless it be the annual May-day moving—occasion more commotion in city homes than to "break up" after remaining in the country. Every lady who takes a personal interest in the writer can well sympathize with what true lady does not?—meets with experiences at this era of hot life which, although by good chance may be agreeable, are far more likely to be vexatious. She may come back to the city and find her house in nice order, those to whom it was confided having failed to their trust. But in many cases it is very different.

Perchance the house has been closed during the summer, that is, the parlors opened for a day, while the cellar grating has been shut through (it must have been the latter part of the season, when cooks and burglars have thoroughly ransacked every nook and corner, and carried off every available article, not leaving even spice, and the kitchen in a state only to suit their leisure, with none to molest or make them afraid. And then the upper rooms, the nice chambers and sitting apartments, and feels inclined to fold her hands in despair. But perhaps servants were left in charge; and are general supposed to have made it quite a home like and comfortable. But on inspection the best rooms bear a strange aspect of disorder and dirt, and, surely, are worse than a dingy nor the furniture so marred; and the owner can not understand it until rumors come to her neighbors that the family have returned and callers were often lighted, and the "abode of revelry" sometimes the scene broke upon the midnight air. But leaving the trench broke upon the midnight air. But leaving the thoughtful lady's meditations meet with a stout denial that any but a few "cousins" have "once or twice of an evening" dropped in.

But it may be that a "careful family," with only "one or two children," were left to guard the house and furniture against the inroads of dust, moths, and dust. There must be somewhere a broader definition of "careful" than is current, for the good lady looks with dismay at the blackened walls, marred furniture, at the heaps of dust and rubbish and litter in corners and on floors, gathers up her shirts in disgust from the armies of cockroaches that revel in the basement, and finds that door-knobs, window-sashes and windows broken, and kitchen utensils, generally, battered and spoiled, and she nearly refrains from the last indignity of all. But what is to be done? The "careful" family have been "careful" to leave before the return to town, and, in the first hurry and scurry of hope, she gathers her willing maids about her, arms them with brooms, scrubbing brushes, and cloths, soap, and, in short, all the paraphernalia of cleaning, and top of the house she institutes a thorough cleaning, to which, for once, even the hour intended for meals is forgotten.

Then, one after another, the rooms emerge from the process, fresh and clean, and the old familiar homelike is re-established, and the family return.

It is a matter of deep interest to all, and one in which, as citizens of New York, we may feel a considerable pride, that we have such excellent facilities for free education. Not only do the public schools present unusual advantages for thorough education, but a few years since a system of evening schools was inaugurated for the benefit of those unable to attend day schools. These have accordingly been very successful, as the fact that last winter not less than 25,000 pupils attended, affords ample evidence of the necessity which these duties permitted. Recently the Board of Education have opened an Evening High School in the Grammar School Building in Fifteenth Street. The design of this institution is to afford young men facilities for obtaining a higher education than can be attained in the ordinary evening schools. Experienced instructors have been appointed, and one hour of exercise will be devoted to each of the subjects sent thoroughly successful, and to give to every student the means of pursuing that course of education best suited to render it useful for himself.

The question whether turtles suffer pain in the modes of confinement often employed by dealers, which appeared to be in doubt in our city not many months ago, has been fully referred to Professor Agassiz. Here is the gist of his answer:

"To say that turtles do not suffer when dragged from their natural haunts, tied that they may not bite to prevent it, upside down, etc., is simply absurd. It is true that they can bear a great deal of pain, and go without food or drink; but they suffer. That of turning deed very sensitive to some injuries. That of turning upside down and over is sufficient, for instance, to prevent their eyes from hatching. Their suffering may be lessened by kindness and correct, give movements to which the perforation of their fins gives rise. And yet to this proceeding dealers in turtles generally resort in order to tie them more closely and pack a larger number in a smaller space. Of course, when tied in this manner, they may suffer less by their struggles upon their backs, because the fins are thus relieved from the pressure of their whole weight; but the best evidence I can afford that they suffer is that position is that they die if it is much protracted; and yet turtles are among the animals which resist longest privations of all kinds. In not the few days—a week, a fortnight, or even more—in which they are forcibly kept the most complete evidence of their suffering is that they would cause death if not pain and the unnatural pressure of parts brought into unaccustomed contact."

The latest case of good luck is related of a young Englishman, in New York. It seems that some months ago he left England for America, and not caring where he went, took the first ship that came across his path, which happened to be one bound for this country. Arrived in New York, he soon squandered all the money which he had brought with him in riotous living, and became penniless, for manual labor he was soon entirely destitute. In this sad plight, with his clothes nearly falling from his back, he gained his bread by begging from door to door, making the steps of the City Hall and the barges floating on the river his nightly resting-place. At last, having been reduced to a wretched state of weakness, he succeeded in gaining employment as porter in a grocery store. A few days since he received intelligence from England of the death of a titled relative, who had left him nearly a million of money in the value of £10,000; and the letter bringing the welcome intelligence also contained a draft to pay his passage home. He is now on the way.

A new style of robbery was practiced upon an unfortunate Bostonian who was a passenger on the steamboat on her way to Fall River on Saturday. He had his hat stolen at a way-station by some fellow who threw his own hat in the window in its place, and was starting, grabbed the hat from the Bostonian's head, and disappeared in the darkness.

The following receipt is said to be a sure cure for a terrible disorder of the mouth commonly called "scandal:"

Take of "good-nature" one ounce; of an herb called by the Indians "mind your business," one ounce; mix those well, and add a large quantity of "fun," and two or three sprigs of "keep your tongue between your teeth." Mix the whole well together, and after smelling to the tongue and roof of the mouth, which will usually make the patient sneeze in company with a species of animals called gossip; when you feel a fit of "coming on," take a small dose of the mixture, hold it in your mouth, which you will keep closely shut till you can get home, when you will find a complete cure. Should you apprehend a relapse, keep a small dose always about you, and on the slightest symptoms repeat the dose.

When the cholera was ravaging New York in 1832 Dr. John Mitchell resided in the city. In a description he gave of the appearance of the city on the 31st of July of that terrible summer, he said:

"Business entirely and wholly at a stand; more than half the population had gone into the country; many houses entirely shut up; the whole city seemed to outline were exposed at every corner. It happened to be the day of the Orphan Asylum Society's festival, and twelve persons had died that day. The cold gripe of death was on the whole city, and every city's terror aggravated the ravages of disease; and all the energy, the firmness, the hope of the citizens were prostrated. Only a few days before the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and destroyeth at noon-day, was abroad, and it was a night never to be forgotten."

The meeting of the Scientific resources of our Board of Health have, by the blessing of God, saved our city this year from the virulence of the disease and the dire scourge which in other years of the Southern and Western cities have suffered severely.

At the recent annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions held at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, the resignation of the Corresponding Secretary, Rev. Nathan Lawrence, D.D., who has been a faithful officer in the work for forty-four years, was received with deep regret by the Board and numerous friends who were present there. Among other testimonials of esteem two checks of $10,000 each were presented to him by a few friends from New York and New Brunswick.

A Southern paper says, "The other day a wolf came into the door-yard of a certain Mr. H——, and committed sundry depredations. A woman of the house chased it to the fence, and as it attempted to pass through had the presence of mind to grab it by the tail. Another woman present went to the opposite side and with a club beat it to death. Might not Hamlet have had a wife with good effect upon the persons of a certain class of gentlemen?) who insist on the strict observance of etiquette, amusing themselves in petty impertinences toward ladies who are unfortunately compelled to pass them? It seems that such a wife would be not secure from the annoyances of insulting intruders.

In a recently published statistical work there are said to be in London one million four hundred thousand persons who never attend public worship; one hundred and fifty thousand habitual drunkards; one hundred and fifty thousand living in open profligacy; twenty thousand professed beggars; ten thousand thieves; seventy thousand juvenile criminals, and five thousand receivers of stolen goods. It is a city the comiller does not give also the number of city rat catchers. Such a city would need many large.

We would recommend Tecumseh, a town in Michigan as a good place to live in. As proof we quote the following items from the Tecumseh Chronicle: Flour: Butter, per pound 23 cents; lard, 15; chicken, 14; turkeys, 15; eggs, 20; cheese, 18; beef, per 100 pounds, $7 50; corn meal, per 100 pounds, $1 50; apples, per bushel, 50 cents; apples, dried, per pound, 10; honey in box, per pound, 30.

People fond of betting on the results of elections should remember what risky business it is—the betting on the Presidential election promises, paid in times past by the foolish, are still fresh in the memory of many. A gentleman of Connecticut who had to carry a fat Republican on his shoulders through the streets, preceded by a band of music. A well-known New Yorker, as an appropriate punishment for being a Copperhead, was condemned to wear for a year a hat two feet high, with a brim seven inches wide. A student in Maine was compelled to part with his cherished whiskers and mustache. Another man had to whistle two hours of shavings in the street. A well-known citizen of Boston, in fulfillment of the terms of a wager, wheeled a barrow of ashes at the horse of a wager, wheeled a barrow of ashes at the horse of a wager, wheeled a barrow of ashes at the horse of a journey which occupied him nearly a week.

Fair warning against dangers of all kinds should be made public, consequently we also give our readers the following cautionary quotations:

"Marriage is like a flaming candle-light
Placed in a window on a summer night,
Inviting all the insects of the air
To come and singe their pretty wingiets there.
Those that are not hurt head against the pane;
Those that are hurt to get out again."

There is a new bonnet on the horizon. It is made of one large, full-blown rose, which lies flat on the top of the head. The stem is a scarf of dove-colored silk, which is crossed under the chin, where another small rose pegs it down. The wearer is a fashionable guy!" In less than three weeks it will be in struggling rivalry with the "chimney-pot."

Cases of absent-mindedness are frequently recorded; but here is one quite equal to any we have recently seen:

"I say, cap'n," said a little keen-eyed man, as he landed from the steamer Potomac, at Natchez, "I say, cap'n, this isn't all!"

"There's all the baggage you brought on board, Sir," replied the captain.

"Well, see now, I great it's all O. K according to list —four baskets, three trunks, one box-house, a pet mauny, two hums, one part cut, three ropes o' hymns and a bundle o' fishing rods—why, dog dubersnake, feel there's something short, though I've counted on over the things and never took my eye off the whole on board—there's something not right, some how."

"No stranger, the thing is right, there is all I know of; so bring your wife and five children out of the cabin, and let's be off."

"There's em! them's 'em! I know'd I'd forgot something!"

The Chicago Post records a singular instance of a woman's revenge. It seems that a certain man in that city, previous to his marriage, had betrayed and deserted a woman to, whom he had paid marked attentions, and she consequently swore that she would be revenged. She waited patiently for years, and then stood a blow at the hearts or those she hated. One day a beautiful little girl, four years old, the pet and darling of the family, while playing around the door, experienced unspeakable agonies. Her mother were in an agony of grief, as month after month passed away, and their anxious search brought no news of their child. Meanwhile the chain had been carried through various cities to Milwaukee, and, by means of a false and artful statement, was adopted by a family who became tenderly attached to her. At length she was discovered, and the parents hastened to take her to their arms. The child but little old had forgotten her past parents, and her affections were entirely centred on those who had reared her from infancy. If she absolutely refused to be taken from them, but the parents, however, insisted upon taking her home. The infidel family, also compelled to see being separated from those she had grown to love so fondly. Her own parents were strangers, and all her endearments failed to pacify her. She refused to eat or be amused with any thing, but sat moaning constantly for home. This continued for about a week, when she was seized with a sudden spasm and died. The woman who carried her off, and who was the cause of it, was the satisfaction of knowing that her revenge has been indeed complete.

The following advertisement, which appears in an English paper of recent date, is a unique specimen of style and grammatical construction:

"TO GENTLEMEN AND BOYS.—Youths (up to twenty 17 years), made perfectly tractable and gentlemanly, in one year, by a Clergyman, near town, of thirty years' experience, whose peculiarly permissive, high moral, and religious principles, and domestic habits of recollar tempers and disposition (because not undersecond to the rest of others. A liberal education (including modern languages, successful preparation for civil engineering, and the universities), and the very gentlemanly comfort) on moderate terms.

We do not know the author of the following original poem; probably the writer was afraid to be ashamed to take any other signature than "Anonymous:"

"Dip the Atlantic Ocean in the deep cup with a teacup; pour into the sea of sorrow bout; send up fishing rods with bullets for sinkers, and hooks baited with a broken heart; choke a mosquito with a brick-bat—in short, prove any impossible thing, and then will the impossible be possible, but never attempt to coax a woman to say she will when she has made up her mind to say she won't."

The following is a translation of a passage from a Spanish poet:

"The Heavens are a point from the pen of God's perfection: the World is a leaf from the writer of His book: the Sun is a spark from the light of His wisdom; and the Sky is a bubble on the sea of His power. Time is a moment from the point of sin hidden in the thick veil of darkness. He made every thing of the dust of the earth, and from a selection from His own face on every atom."

A baby, about two miles in circumference, from which bones is obtained in extremely rare condition and in very large quantity, has been recently discovered in Africa. The bones hitherto seen have been procured by combining boracic acid from Tuscany with soda. The new discovery is reported to be certainty, the potteries of Staffordshire alone consuming more than 1100 tons annually.

A curious book has been published at Paris, in which the author endeavors to prove that the destiny of the human race is influenced by the earth's magnetism. The new planet or the solar light, shooting stars, and other natural phenomena are referable to an effect of magnetism, and, as he thinks, are great events in the history of nations and of individuals. For example, the 9th of November, the day of the assassination of Caesar, and the day of great meteoric energy, while the 22d of June is the day of most circulation and most energy.

Paris, again, the author declares it is to mesmerism that certain great moral events are due—Protestantism and the Reformation to Luther, Gallicanism to Francis, and Catholicism in the Papal States. This is a novel solution of difficult questions.

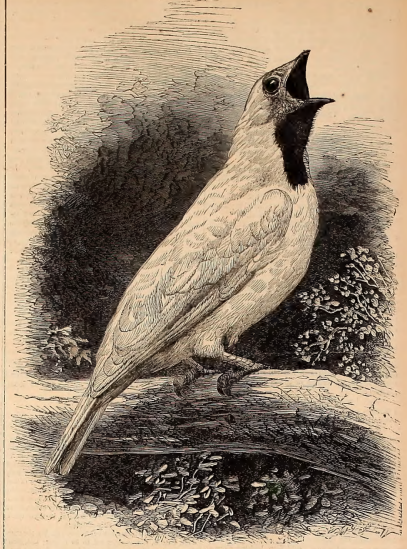
MOTHER'S WORK.

Toiling all day like a galley slave,
Teaching the baby how to behave,
Reading the older ones quarrel and fight,
Hearing the lessons that must be learned right,
Tending and brushing and blowing their noses,
Soothing and washing the mother rose's face,
Sewing up rents in their best pants torn,
Reaching on new cloth over the worn;
Ever alive pausing to count the stitches,
Darning alike the boys and the breeches;
Thankful to hear when they're out of the way,
Such is a mother's life day by day.

Sending each night-gowned urchin to bed,
Hearing to hear the last word said,
Wishing them happy in heaven above,
With all the warmth of a mother's love.
Now, may the good angels be thanked always
That they never work like mothers all day.

STATUE OF THE LATE SIR JOHN FRANKLIN, IN WATERLOO PLACE, LONDON.

MONUMENT OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.



THE accompanying illustrations give an idea of the monument recently erected to the memory of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, the lamented hero of Arctic navigation and discovery, in Waterloo Place, London, and of the bas-relief sculpture on the front of the pedestal. The statue is cast in bronze, and is eight feet four inches high. The pedestal is of polished granite.

The moment selected for representation in the statue is when FRANKLIN was addressing his officers and crew, and telling them that the Northwest Passage had at last been discovered. He grasps in his hand the telescope, chart, and compasses; and wears the uniform of a naval commander, with a loose over-coat of fur as a protection against the extreme coldness of the Polar climate. The sculptor's great object was to give the character of FRANKLIN in the statue, and as far as possible by outward form to indicate those qualities of the mind which enabled Sir JOHN, by his deeds in life and by an example of heroic endurance in death, to add to the fame and glory of his country. The likeness has been pronounced by Lady FRANKLIN, and others who knew her husband best, to be characteristic and excellent.

The bas-relief on the front of the pedestal represents the funeral of FRANKLIN, at which Captain CROZIER reads the burial service. He is surrounded by the other sorrowing officers and crew of the two ships, the Erebus and Terror. It is well known that not one of the whole number of these brave fellows ever returned. Their names, however, with the name of FRANKLIN himself, are recorded on bronze panels at the side of the memorial. In the panel at the back of the tribute there is an embossed bronze chart of the Arctic regions, showing the position of the two ships and their crews at the time of the death of FRANKLIN. The pedestal is further adorned with the representation, in bronze, of a large cable at the cornice, to indicate at once the tribute commemorating a sailor; and there is also a bronze moulding at the plinth, enriched with oak-leaves and acorns, to denote strength and magnanimity.

THE BELL-BIRD OF SOUTH AMERICA.

THE BELL-BIRD OF SOUTH AMERICA.

ON illustration of this remarkable bird (the Chasmorhynchus nudicollis) is taken from a living specimen. It is not of the same species known and described by the late CHARLES WATERTON, but one very nearly allied to it; in fact, so near that the absence of a singular wattle over the upper bill constitutes almost the only difference in their shape.

The difference in the vocal powers of the two species is, however, very remarkable. It is generally in the early part of the day that this bird sends forth its loud and wonderful notes. The first note is a loud, harsh, and somewhat grating note; this is followed by six or eight fine, clear, metallic-ringing notes, with an interval of about a second between each note. The resemblance of these to the sound of an anvil is most extraordinary, and has given rise to its local native name of the Anvil-bird, though it is called by Europeans the Bell-bird. The clear metallic ring, repeated at about the rate a blacksmith strikes upon the anvil, is so perfect that many persons upon hearing it were unwilling to believe the sound could be produced by the delicate organs forming the vocal apparatus of so small a bird. The bird is a native of Brazil, and is said to feed almost entirely upon fruit.

This bird is a little larger than a mistel-thrush. The plumage is perfectly white, the eyes pale gray; the naked throat and skin round the eyes are a fine bright green.

WATERTON, in his "Wanderings," page 108, speaking of the Bell-bird, says: "His note is loud and clear, like the sound of a bell, and may be heard at a distance of three miles. In the midst of these extensive wilds, generally on the dried top of an aged mora, almost out of gun-reach, you will see the campanero. No sound or song from any of the winged inhabitants of the forest—not even the clearly-pronounced 'whip-poor-will' from the goat-sucker—causes such astonishment as the toll of the campanero. With many of the feathered race he pays the common tribute of a morning and an evening song; and even when the meridian sun has shut in silence the mouths of almost the whole of animated nature the campanero still cheers the forest. You hear his toll, and then a pause for a minute; then another toll, then a pause again; and then a toll, and again a pause; then he is silent for six or eight minutes, and then another toll, and so on. Actæon would stop in mid chase, Maria would defer her evening song, and Orpheus himself would drop his lute to listen to him, so sweet, so novel, and romantic is the toll of the pretty snow-white campanero. He is never seen to feed with the other species, nor is it known in what part of Guiana he makes his nest."

NATIONAL CEMETERIES IN VIRGINIA.

The erection of National Cemeteries over the Federal dead who now lie on the battle-fields of Virginia devolves upon Colonel JAS. M. MOORE, of the United States Army. For some time extensive parties have been engaged in this humane labor.

Cold Harbor Cemetery was commenced February 27, 1866, and was completed April 30. This Cemetery contains one and one-half acres of ground, laid out in the form of a square. It is divided into four sections —A, B, C, and D—each section containing 216 graves. A mound, fifteen feet high, stands in the centre, over which always float the National colors.

To the rear of the graves are two large trenches, numbered 1 and 2. No. 1 contains 568 unknown Union soldiers; No. 2 contains 321. The total number of known bodies in the entire Cemetery is 685; of unknown, 1245. Of these 50 are the remains of officers, from the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel down, one chaplain, and 89 non-commissioned officers.

The selection of the site for Cold Harbor Cemetery is peculiarly appropriate. It was here, June 3, 1864, that five successive charges were made by our troops—the Sixth Corps on the left, the Second and Ninth in the centre, and the Eighteenth on the right. The fifth and final charge was successful in securing position for the Second, Sixth, and Ninth Corps, the Eighteenth flanking the rebel General HOKE'S Corps, and inflicting heavy loss upon the latter. HOKE was finally reinforced by PICKENS, and drove back the Eighteenth Corps, thus establishing the broken lines of the rebel front. The Union army then threw up intrenchments and held its position for ten days, skirmishing all the time, when they withdrew to a point many miles northward.

The immediate neighborhood of the Cemetery presents a most desolate appearance.

Seven Pines Cemetery, twelve miles from Richmond, was commenced May 1, 1866, and completed June 27. This is also square in form, and of about the same size as that at Cold Harbor. It is divided, like the latter, into four sections, each of which contains 202 graves. But here there are no trenches. Only 154 out of 1356 bodies here interred have been identified. There are 92 commissioned and 17 non-commissioned officers buried here. All those interred in this Cemetery fell in the engagements at Fair Oaks and Seven Pines.

Bodies in many cases have been found unburied on the fields.

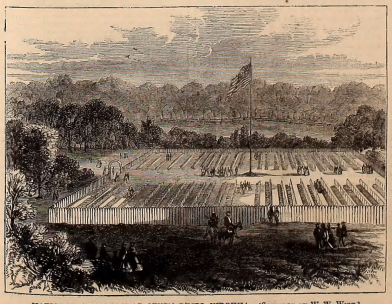
DRIVING IN CENTRAL PARK.—[DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.]

HORSE-MEAT IN PARIS.

WHEN it was reported some months ago that a new institution in the shape of a Horse-meat Market was to be inaugurated in Paris, the Parisian public smiled incredulously. But in spite of incredulity, and even of disgust, the thing has been done, and a horse-meat market has been opened in Paris.

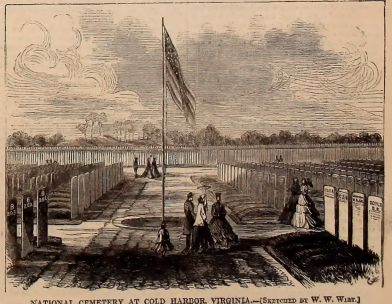
They sell horse-meat in Paris and they eat it, as our illustration demonstrates.

It is said that all those who have laid aside prejudice, and have eaten this new style of viand, have found it excellent. The soldiers of Confederate General PENDERTON'S army, we believe, are willing to corroborate this testimony. Doubt is no longer in place.—The Hippophagi have reason on their side.



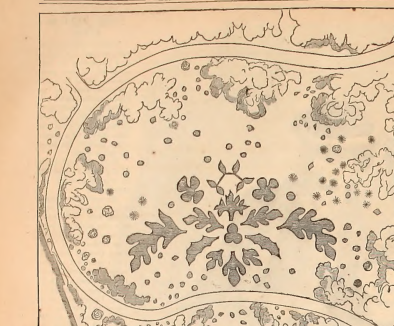
A restaurant adjoins the market, where the Parisian gourmands may eat horse-meat steak or horse à la mode at twenty centimes a plate. We recommend the experiment to those in our city who, in fashion and in cuisine, are imitators of Parisians.

FLOWER-BEDS IN CENTRAL PARK.



WHY should flower-gardens be laid off in round, square, oblong, or other formal beds? This question must have occurred to many who have laid out or planted a garden, be it large or small. But custom, which dulls even the most inventive faculties, has in this matter been supreme. Flower-beds of meaningless and not beautiful shapes, surrounded by stiff box edging, are still the prevailing fashion.

Our Central Park, which has done so much to improve and cultivate the taste of our people in laying out grounds, planting trees, and making roads, affords just now a fine example of what a flower-garden may be. It has occurred to Mr. I. A. PILAT, one of the principal landscape-gardeners engaged on the Park, that, in forming flower-beds, he might avail himself of the shapes of leaves; and by a proper and harmonious arrangement of beds cut out of the turf, in the shape of different leaves, he has produced an effect which will no doubt strike all lovers of flowers as both beautiful and simple.



The sketch given on page 670 presents an outline of this flower-garden, which is now attracting attention from visitors to the Park. It is about an acre in extent, and is kept in full bloom. It forms one of the most attractive objects in the Park. The flowers are planted in masses, which gives an opportunity for the harmonious arrangement of colors as well as forms, in which Mr. PILAT has succeeded admirably. Our lady readers, even if they have but small gardens, will find it a pleasure to work upon the hint Mr. PILAT's plan gives them. They need use but two, or three, or four leaves; and may produce a beautiful effect, in this way, upon a space but a few feet square as well as upon an acre.

ACADIANS OF LOUISIANA.

THESE primitive people are the descendants of Canadian French settlers in Louisiana; and by dint of intermarriage they have succeeded in getting pretty well down in the social scale.

Without energy, education, or ambition, they are good representatives of the white trash, behind the age in every thing. The majority of all the white inhabitants of these parishes are tolerably ignorant, but those are grossly so—as little are they thought of—that the niggers, when they want to express contempt for one of their own race, call him an Acadian nigger. Their views of the future life are principally confined to the prospect of meeting Monsieur VOLIN, a prominent man among them, who departed this life a good while ago. Some of them are devout Catholics, to which Church they are all attached.

To live without effort is their apparent aim in life, and they are satisfied with very little, and are, as a class, quite poor. Their language is a mixture of French and English, quite puzzling to the uninitiated. During the civil war, although forced into the Confederate ranks, they were considered Unionists, and were kind to those who needed their help.

With a little mixture of fresh blood and some learning they might become much improved, and have higher aims than the possession of land enough to grow their corn and a sufficiency of "goujon" (sudgeon). They have suffered a great deal by the overflowing waters, even to making their escape from their houses in boats, or knocking the upper works off and floating to safety on the floor for a raft.

Washing-day is a sketch from life. These simple folks have no acquaintance apparently with the wash-board, nor do they employ their knuckles. Placing their clothes upon a plank, either on the edge of a pool or the bayou, they draw their scanty drapery about them with the most reckless disregard to the exposure consequent, and squatting, or kneeling, beat them with a wooden bat. The approach of a stranger does not disconcert them much, if at all.

The Bayou Lafourche is higher than the surrounding country; and this picture shows the figures on top of the levee, or banquette, as the French residents call it. A. R. W.

BURNING OF ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL.

ABOUT ten P.M., October 6, a fire broke out in the packing-room of VOORHIS & CO.'s porcelain warehouse, 44 Crosby Street. The building, belonging to Messrs. C. GODFREY GUNTHER & Co., had a marble front on Broadway, and was five stories in height. The inflammable material in the packing-room gave the fire a rapid headway. The building was only partially destroyed, but the fire spread into the adjacent streets, destroying altogether property valued at over half a million of dollars.

The principal loss involved in this conflagration was that of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Cathedral, the roof of which caught fire from blazing fragments falling from the GUNTHER building. The Cathedral was entirely destroyed. When the rumor spread that the Cathedral was on fire there was the greatest excitement among the Roman Catholic citizens in the streets. Led on by their priests, they succeeded in securing and carrying away from the edifice a large amount of valuable property—carpets, candle-sticks, sacred vessels, vestments, and oil-paintings. The sacred vessels and vestments were estimated at $20,000. One set of vestments alone, brought from Paris by Archbishop HUGHES, was valued at $3000. But all the efforts made to save the building were fruitless. By 2 o'clock on Sunday morning the Cathedral was a complete wreck.

The aggregate loss sustained by the trustees of St. Patrick's Cathedral is about $150,000 in round figures, upon which there is the following insurances: On the building, $10,000 each in the City, Harmony, Bowery, and Jefferson Insurance companies; on the organ, $6000 in the Stuyvesant; and $5000 on vestments in the Eagle and Equitable. This Cathedral was built in 1811 by Bishop CONWELL, and the additions were made by Bishop HUGHES in 1838, who had the entire edifice decorated and repainted at that time. It was for many years the pride of the denomination which had erected it, and the edifice was endeared to the congregation attending there by many sacred memories. It may be mentioned that its vaults contain the remains of the late lamented Archbishop HUGHES, and the Right Rev. DRS. CORCORAN, CONOLLY, and DUBOIS. Great efforts were made during the progress of the fire to preserve these vaults, and these efforts were successful. The organ was a very valuable one, and was, at the time of its erection in 1839, considered the finest in the United States. The frescoes adorning the edifice were fine works of art, and very costly.

FERRY-BOAT ON BERWICK BAY.

As the business done between the opposite shores of this beautiful sheet of water is limited, so the ferry arrangements are of the most primitive character—a flat-boat propelled by a couple of negroes, who push the oars instead of pulling them. Infinitely picturesque, however, is this boat, with its freight of oxen, country carts, stray Texans with their mustangs, Acadians, and negroes, forming a picture, as it floats to the mos-draped shore, exceedingly attractive to an artist's eye. A THIEF IN THE CONFESSIONAL.

EARLY one fine spring morning the saintly precincts of the Vatican were disturbed by the agitated vociferations of a rude-looking peasant man, endeavoring to pass the Swiss guards, who are the particular custodians of the priestly temple. He was thrust back as a person not good enough to be admitted to the presence of his holiness the Pope. But, notwithstanding all these efforts to obtain him, he still prayed very earnestly to be allowed to see the Pope, or at least one of his immediate attendant priests.

His loud cries and vociferations at last reached the ears that he intended, for the Pope happened to pass near the spot when the earnest tones of the man met his ear. With his usual good-nature Pio Nono asked what was the matter, and who it was who wanted to see him. He was told it was a poor man in great agitation, who said that he had to say something which he would only tell to the Pope on his own behalf. "Let him enter at once. Let him be brought in."

The Pope sat in his easy-chair—not the chair of St. Peter—and in all the splendor of his state all soiled and weary, while suffering, fright and agitation were written on his face. On approaching the Pope he prostrated himself, and in agonized tones demanded absolution.

"Absolution! and for what?" said the Pope. "Has your confessor refused it that you come to me?"

"No, holy father; I come to ask absolution for a crime I was about to commit; for I have to tell you of a tale so dreadful. There is no time to lose; but I must have the promise of absolution first."

The Pope, seeing the violent agitation of the man, made him approach him—for he had remained prostrate at the feet of the Pope, who, stretching forth his hand, gave the man the requested absolution, "Ego te absolvo."

The poor man still continued kneeling, and thus began his story:

"I am now, your holiness, going to confess to you the crime I was about to commit, and for which I have obtained your holy absolution.

"About five o'clock in the afternoon I was passing the church of ——, when I bethought me that I would go in and say a Paternoster, or I might be in time for vespers. I entered the church, and, sly, holy father! not I have absolution—the sight of the gold and silver, and the jewels on the holy image by the great altar, made me think that with one, only one of the many that are there, I might get many things I want." The poor man looked up timidly into the face of the Pope, and read there the horror which he felt at the confession of his quondam penitent, and he seemed afraid to go on.

"Go on," said the Pope, "and tell the truth, and nothing but the truth." The man then proceeded, endeavoring to keep clear of the searching eyes of him whom he was telling his story.

"I looked about me to find a hiding-place where I should be safe from any of the many priests empty-ed about the church; and, thinking that, as vespers were at hand, no more persons would come to confession, and seeing at the farther end of the church near to the altar a confessional rather smaller than the rest, I hid myself there, closing curtain and door after me, determined to wait until all the services should be over, and the church left quiet for the night.

"But still, holy father, the thought of passing the night alone in the church, under the stones of which so many dead lay sleeping, nearly made me give up my place. Again the thought of the silver, and the gold, and the jewels made me quiet, and I remained in my hiding-place.

"Among the many who came in and out of the church, there came—oh, how shall I tell your holiness?" began the man, trembling violently. The Pope soothed the man, being anxious himself to hear the end of the most extraordinary revelation; and at length, after shedding even tears in his agitation, he resumed: "I was saying that among those who came in was one that afternoon—not a young girl about seventeen years of age. I heard her inquire of the sacristan for one of the father confessors. He told her he was gone, but for her to enter the confessional where I was hidden; but no, at this moment—for I could see through the curtains—one of the monks came toward her to the altar very near to where I was, and, bending his head to speak to her, I heard she had come to confess to him.

"I knew the girl by sight, as the only daughter of a wealthy farmer in the neighborhood, a girl who was noted for her modesty and beauty. The priest, by name Father Mura, told the bella donnina to go and kneel down as there were many persons in the church that he could not give her his attention as he ought. This placed me more at my ease, as I now felt sure that there was no time for any one to come to the confessional, as vespers would commence in a few minutes."

The Pope thought it time to have some one as a witness for the strange story to which he was listening, and, touching a silver bell, he ordered that a certain priest, who served as secretary, should be called.

The poor man thought that his hour of pains and penalties had arrived, and prostrating himself before the Pope, he most loudly begged him to let him finish his recital, saying, "If it is not true, your holiness may punish me as you think fit."

The priest for whom the Pope had sent here arrived, bringing writing materials with him, and, being informed that a witness had been passed, prepared himself to hear what was further to be told, and the man proceeded.

"I was still in the box of the confessional when vespers began and ended. The sacristan was going here and there, putting the church in order, when I heard the voice of the girl who had the gift of a his room come into the church in conversation with another priest. They walked up and down, talking together, and the subject they were upon was of no common degree. But suddenly a thought came over me; where was the girl who had gone to the priest's room for confession? She had passed through the church, because, in my position, with nothing to do, I had seen every one who had gone in and out. Oh, holy father! and because my I could not get the thought out of my mind during the hours that I waited for night to do the wicked deed for which your holiness has granted me your benign absolution.

"At length all became quiet in the church, all the sacristans had left, and I came to say an Ave Maria or a Paternoster for a sick child or a husband, had departed; the sacristan had shut the doors, and I remained in entire solitude. Still I must wait, for I had not dare to leave my hiding place until after midnight, as some of the priests or monks might come to say their private prayers, so I waited until the great clock of the monastery chimed midnight, when I had made up my mind to leave my hiding-place, and, with cat-like tread to creep softly forth. I was startled at hearing, from the corridor which contained the apartments of the priest, a door open, and then a woman's voice—my! then all was still. What could I do but go back to the confessional and wait? In a short time I heard again about to get into my box when a kind of procession entered the church, which, oh, holy father! makes me tremble to think of. First came a priest, holding a long iron bar in his hand, such as is used to lift up the stones in the church; another priest, bearing a lantern; while, dragged in by two other priests, one of whom was the monk Father Mura, was the hapless girl who had entered the convent church in the afternoon. Her hair was hanging over her shoulders, and her dress disordered, and her face was pale with death. I dared not put my head out too far, but was trembling all over, well knowing that if I was seen I should never live to tell your holiness of it.

"The priest who bore the crow-bar now lifted the stone over which they had been standing, and discovered a large vault; here they threw the body of the girl, and, replacing the stone, they took their way, thinking that there was no witness of their diabolical crime.

"I can not tell how I passed the night. The fear that some one should return and find me, as also the terrible deed which I had witnessed, kept me from even closing my eyes; and, as soon as the sacristan had opened the doors, and as soon as he had turned his back, I left my hiding-place, and came at my best speed to tell to your holiness all I had seen."

The Pope was deeply moved at the recital, and giving the man into the custody of the priest his secretary, he ordered that some of the carabiniers should go to the monastery, with the priest, lift the stone, and verify the truth of what had been said. When the carabiniers arrived at the church they found the vile Father Mura endeavoring, as it seemed, to give consolation to a neat-looking woman, something above the peasant class, who was deeply distressed at the absence of her daughter, whom, she said, she had not seen since she left home for the purpose of confession the night before her father evening.

"Your daughter has no doubt gone to visit some of her friends," said the wily priest, "and will return before night."

The poor mother little thought that she was almost standing over the grave of her child. At this moment the monk caught sight of the carabiniers, and he became rather agitated; but, recovering himself, he asked them what they wanted.

"We will show you, but our orders are to say nothing."

Upon this the guards formed themselves around the stone which had been pointed out to them, and the mason, advancing at their order, raised the stone, and there lay a heap of what seemed clothing, but when taken up proved to be the body of the poor girl, with a stiletto stab in her breast. Horror took possession of every one who saw it, and all revolted to the monster who had done the foul deed as to murder that innocent, childish-looking form. But there was one whose guilty heart told him that God's justice was overtaking him, and that the deeds done in the darkness are sure to be brought to light. Had this thing happened in any other place than Rome nothing would have saved the monk from the just wrath of the people; but in that wonderful but priest-ridden city the papal clergy act almost with impunity.

The carabiniers bore back to the Vatican the lifeless body which only yesterday was the pride and support of a mother, and the full story of what came forth to verify the truth of what he had been told.

The grief of the mother we will not speak of. May He who has her in his holy keeping pour balm into her wounded heart. The Pope ordered masses to be said for the girl's soul, and gave her a Christian's burial.

And the monks, says the reader, how were they punished? A secret conclave sent from the Vatican, and charged with a severe reprimand, met at the monastery, and the next morning it was known that the inmates had all left under cover of the night, and had gone to another monastery in the hills.

PITTSBURG, May 10, 1866.

Messrs. Hostetter & Smith:

GENTLEMEN,—During a visit to the West, last fall, I contracted chills and fever, which brought me to my bed, and finally terminated in typhoid fever, and confined me to my room for several months, during which time I was physically so prostrated that I almost despaired of ever recovering my health: having almost entirely lost my appetite, for days not being able to eat a morsel, added to which I was distressed with a reeling sensation in my head, and passed many sleepless nights—all from debility, caused by my prostrate condition, brought about by fever. At this stage of my condition a friend recommended me to use your celebrated Bitters, but, believing that nothing equaled to the use of stimulants in any form, I at first declined, but afterward yielded my prejudices, and, after taking the medicine for several weeks, my appetite returned, and with it I am rapidly regaining my former strength and vigor. My sleep (from the use of which I have suffered much) has never been better than it is now, and the reeling sensation (before alluded to) has entirely left me. My bowels, which were much constipated and irregular, are now quite natural, and, in fact, I am glad to say that I feel myself a new man, and tender you this testimonial of my appreciation of your valuable compound, in order that others may avail themselves of its virtues, which prejudice kept me from enjoying for so long a period. I may also add that my physician, after seeing the beneficial effect of your Bitters on me, recommended that I use them regularly.

Yours, very respectfully, E. BORNS,

Purify the Blood.

If the blood be pure the body, which is formed from and by the blood, can not be diseased. But if there be in any part of the body any affection, acne as a boil or ulcer, scrofula, a bruise, the blood circulating through that part takes up impure matters from the local affection and carries it into the general system. This is the cause often of sudden death to persons of full habit afflicted with boils and ulcers, and who use no medicine the matter gets into the circulating system, and chokes up the blue blood vessels which supply the brain with vitality, and life ceases as it

THE present Number closes the Thirty-third Volume of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The Conductors believe that in variety and interest it has been exceeded by no previous Volume, and their arrangements insure that this interest and value will be fully maintained in the ensuing Volume.

In the Number for December will be commenced "THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS," a Tale by GEORGE F. HARRINGTON, Author of "Inside: A Chronicle of Secession." This tale was written just before the breaking out of the late Civil War, but its issue was postponed in consequence of the events of the time. The Author, at the time a resident of Texas, describes the life and adventures of a Virginian Planter, who with his family emigrated to the "New Dominion." The tale is of special interest at the present time, setting forth what Texas was before the war; what it would now have been but for the war; and what it may yet become notwithstanding the war, when liberty is secured, law maintained, and industry restored under the Union.

GENERAL STROTHER will continue his "Personal Recollections of the War;" and the various departments of the Magazine, whether furnished by the Editors or by Contributors, will be maintained in such a manner as to merit a continuance of the favor which the Magazine has received for almost Seventeen Years.

OFFICE OF THE NOVELTY IRON WORKS,
NEW YORK, Sept. 25, 1866.
A. BALDWIN, Esq.: Dear Sir,—Having examined the model of your CHAMPION PRESS, I am favorably impressed with the design, as combining great power with the most simple construction of parts, so that there is the least chance for delay caused by breakdowns. Also the direct application of power to reduce the gradual effect by means of the worm wheel and screw is a combination of great simplicity and true mechanical arrangements to produce the result with the least expenditure of power. Hoping you will have success with it, I remain, yours truly,
JAMES P. ALLAIRE,
Constructing Engineer and Superintendent.

PROGRESS MACHINE WORKS,

LADY LOBBYISTS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

We need not direct special attention to the picture of the Lady Lobbyists given below. The picture itself calls attention to what all good men and women must regard as an evil, and, we are sorry to say, a growing one. The Washington correspondent of the Herald thus describes the scene at the White House:

"There was no diminution of the crowd at the White House to-day, nor of the persistency manifested by those present to secure interviews with the President. The usual number of females were conspicuous in the throng. It is a noticeable fact, and by no means creditable to the age, that there is a growing inclination to use the gentler sex in manipulating the political wires. In the lobbies of Congress during the last week, about the Departments at all times, and at the White House this element largely prevails. And it is observable that they are not the wives, sisters, or daughters of those whose interests they represent. In most cases they are purely professional wire-pullers, who for a consideration undertake the prosecution of any claim, secure the appointment of their principals to office, or labor for the passage of bills. Relying on the deference universally paid to the sex, they thrust themselves in where the most venturesome man would be repulsed, and once obtaining the official ear they plead their cause with a pertinacity that will not be denied. It has come to be quite a common remark of late when a difficult job is on hand, 'Get a woman to work.' So numerous have these female politicians and agents become of late that the heads of Departments and official personages are compelled to denounce them as nuisances. At the White House this afternoon there were upward of fifty of them at one time awaiting an audience with the President. The courtesy due to womankind forbids that when once they are admitted they should be treated precisely as are the sterner sex, hence their interviews are usually protracted, greatly to the inconvenience and annoyance of others who may be in waiting. If ladies throughout the country could fully understand the estimation in which these female lobbyists are held here the number of them would certainly not be increased."

It is only too notorious that, with few exceptions, "they are not the wives, sisters, or daughters" of those whose interests they represent. As a rule they dress well, few of them deeming it necessary to plead poverty in approaching a public functionary, especially one upon whose too susceptible heart "beauty wreathed with smiles" may be supposed to make a quick impression.

The class of female lobbyists has always existed in Washington, as in all other political capitals, and has included many ladies of high social position and brilliant accomplishments. From these bright particular stars of the salons of aristocracy, however, the quality of feminine influence employed to influence refractory heads of bureaus or obstinate Congressmen shades downward—to just what depth and infamy we do not care to say.

Old Washington story-tellers are full of "funny" things in which by-gone political magnates and bygone beauties figure not exactly as heroes and heroines. In the past, however, the halls and anterooms of the Capitol, especially of the Lower House, were the peculiar field of the female lobbyist, and no doubt this is still measurably true; but it is only lately that they have appeared in any considerable numbers at the White House end of the "Avenue." No doubt their numbers and character indicate with fair correctness the usual extent of their success—their well-known audacity and experience may be trusted for that much.

In Mr. LINCOLN'S time it was no unusual thing to see some pale and anxious petitioner, in sober and often threadbare habiliments, waiting in the ante-room for an opportunity to beg of the "good President" a pass to visit some sick son or husband or brother, or mayhap to petition for the life or liberty of some erring but loved one; but Father Abraham's well-known dislike for professional lobbyists, male or female, was a sufficient security against the occurrence of such scenes as our artist has so well depicted. He could be kind and tender, even if justice or necessity compelled him to refuse the petition of honest sorrow; but even his courtesy and chivalry did not prevent the plain expression of his disgust for the character and pertinacity of such women as have earned in this day so unenviable a notoriety as "pardon brokers."

Some noble and devoted women there were, laboring as true women should, and honoring their sex by merciful and charitable deeds, who always had free access to Mr. LINCOLN; but they were few in number, and unexceptional in all respects.

It may be that the many anecdotes in circulation of the manner in which lady applicants were thus received stimulated the professional sisterhood to their apparently extensive and successful assault upon the susceptibilities of Mr. LINCOLN'S successor.

We read, in the annals of the most corrupt days of the French Revolution, of the vast influence exercised by the brilliant but unprincipled galaxy of wit and beauty which shone in the Parisian salons of that day. Can it be that we are to furnish an ignoble copy of the folly and frivolity of that day of feverish excitement and gilded vice? Not that among the suitors for Executive clemency or favor there are not now to be found ladies who really represent the subjects of their application, and among them also some of the gifted leaders of that Southern aristocracy which is now laboring to reconstruct its plantation nobility; and their animus may be gathered from the following anecdote, the verity of which is beyond question:

The widow of a prominent rebel Senator called upon Mr. JOHNSON for such a pardon as should release the immense estates of the family from the operation of the Confiscation Act. After so employing her eloquence and other facultiations as to secure a favorable result she flounced out of the White House à la reine, and proceeded to repect of a sympathizing coterie of Southern ladies.

"Well, Mrs. ——, and how did you succeed with the beast?"

"Oh, very well; of course he consented to every thing."

"But how did he receive you?"

"Why, well enough; but do you believe, the beast had the impudence to invite me to make the White House my home during my stay in Washington!"

"How ridiculous!

"And you know we never even visited with the JOHNSONS in the South! As if—indeed!"

LADY LOBBYISTS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

MY ANSWER.

I am a widow—grief and many a care
Have made the furrows deeply in my face;
Thick are the threads of silver in my hair,
And my poor trembling hands can hardly trace
The Good Book's words, or turn from place to place,
As mind and eyes go wandering every where.

Little I know of politics or laws—
But women made them there had been no strife;
No deeds had done, no hatching up of flaws,
With its heart-burn of many a noble life;
No promises unkept, or treasons rife,
To clog the feet of Freedom's holy cause.

They tell me wicked men are plotting still
Their schemes of ruin, and that good men lose
A thoughtless ear to mischief and to ill.
For such they cry, Let every difference end!
And those who should a worthier cause defend Turn and reject it with a stubborn will.

I will not weep—and yet I can not take
My grief in silence, smother as my fears.
Men say we moan at trifles—I will make
My humble answer, and though quaking tears
Pray that my words fair not on heedless ears.
Mothers I bear with me for your children's sake.

There are two graves upon the Southern plains,
Far, far apart, perhaps, and overgrown
With the rank grasses—where the summer rains
Blot out the letters on each time-worn stone,
If there are any. I am all alone!
No one to call me "Mother" now remains.

They rise before me now, my precious dead!
Their faces beautiful with Christian peace;
Those lips which yearned at mine, when hot and red
Their dying prayers, and waited for release:
Nor did they murmur then that life must cease,
Who had not covered by the way, nor fled.

And yet I glory, and can offer praise,
That I had sons to give at such a time.
Their lives early in the pleasant ways
Of Justice and of Freedom—truths sublime
We've taught from lessons, and to manhood's prime
They loved the precepts learned in early days!

But can it be that this was all in vain?
Were those two nameless graves heaped up for naught?
Must I, when thinking of my children slain,
Exwail the love of country that I taught?
Losing by this the only thing which brought Comfort and gladness to me in my pain?

Must we obey and follow the commands
Of men my boys faced on the battle-field?
Our native soil or fuller where she stands,
And to their trust bet their own treasure yield?
How can we reverence laws which they have sealed,
And with our dear ones' blood upon their hands?

We, who in wakeful moments on the night
Hear voices calling from the stillness deep;
Or, sitting by our lonely fire-light,
Listen for footsteps, and can only weep,
Those prison cells their horrid secrets keep—
In unkempt graves our children's bones are white!

Oh wretched, wretched country, it she needs
To take rebellious offspring to her heart,
And to be reckoned anew in sinful creeds,
Which tear the laws at God and man apart!
What glorious harvests from the earth shall start
If unrepenting traitors sow the seed!

Oh, loyal women! 'tis to you I speak—
And most of you have shed more tears than I—
Your prayers were fruitful when man's soul was weak,
When armies wavered, and defeat seemed nigh.
He is our friend who gave us victory,
Let us again His aid and favor seek!

Men of New England! of the East, the West,
Whose mighty will a savage thought can tame,
Grasp hands and unite! Faster not nor rest
Till the good work a hands and hearts can claim.
He who 'mid changes is unchanged, the same,
Will bless your cause who do His high behest.

H. B.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1866.

WHAT NEXT?

THE President has for some months declared plainly that, in his judgment, Congress is not a constitutional body, and the air has been full of rumors and surmises as to his probable action upon the meeting of Congress. Indeed, the late story in the Philadelphia Ledger, although immediately confessed to be false, was not so improbable but that the public mind was at once directed more earnestly to the actual situation. Nor ought that attention to be relaxed. This is not a time in which any good is to be gained by refusing to consider every possibility.

The case will bear to be constantly stated. The President differs with Congress as to the conditions of restoration which ought to be imposed upon the late rebel States. He speaks of their "exclusion," and of their "right" to be represented, and of the "usurpation" of Congress in requiring conditions, but it is nevertheless true that he himself united in such exclusion; that he denied their "right" to representation by exhorting them to form governments which should be satisfactory to Congress; and that he imposed certain terms satisfactory to himself. The theory now adopted by him is utterly subversive of the Government and of a harmonious Union, for it allows any State to make war upon the Union, and at any moment, by laying down its arms, to resume all its relations within it without any guarantee whatever of future security.

That such is not the theory of the people who have maintained the Government during the war is made perfectly clear by the autumn elections, and nothing is plainer than that they will not submit to its practical enforcement.

If the President should undertake to withstand their resolution, he could succeed only by totally overpowering them, and surrendering the Government to its most envenomed enemies and the Union to the care of those who hate it. His success would, of course, be the present end of the American Union, and the discomfiture of the principle of popular government. But as his chief reliance in the struggle would be upon the late rebels, it would be for him and his friends to remember that his opponents would be the mass of the lately victorious people of the loyal States, and even with all the Union men of the South of every color.

Every patriotic and thoughtful man is naturally unwilling to believe that so grievous a contest is possible; but with a man like the President every thing is possible. No fear of being an alarmist should prevent every man from looking steadfastly at facts, or from considering the drift of the situation. The President has not ceased to vituperate Congress as an illegal body. The difference between him and has been presented to the people, and they have declared every where for Congress. That is not a result which is likely to pacify such a man as the President. He is not likely to be even threatened with impeachment. Mr. BOUTWELL, at a meeting in Faneuil Hall in Boston, announced that he should move in Congress an inquiry looking to impeachment. Mr. LORING, in supporting the nomination of General BUTLER, says that he is pledged to the same course. As it probably will be, Congress will meet, Congress and send in his Message as if nothing had happened? If he be persuaded that he is likely to be impeached, is it not possible that he might endeavor to gain the advantage in advance over the impeaching body?

These are questions that can not fail to suggest themselves to every one.

But we hope sincerely that the President may not only hear but fully understand the result of the elections. He has constantly asserted that he was the special representative. He has now heard from the people. But as the spiritual medium always insists when the experiment fails that the conditions are not favorable, so the President may assert that not "the people" means the whole voting population of the country at the South as well as at the North. If, however, the President persists in that ground, he should remember that even then the majority of an entire Congress must be held to indicate the popular will, and that that has decided against him.

Since it has so decided, the President may now wisely and properly say and do what he did when the Civil War broke. He may present or veto. He may declare that he differs, but at the same time he may submit to the superior will. It is well for us all to anticipate that action upon his part, without losing sight of the possibilities of which we have spoken. That is the plain way of peace, and his own satisfaction in walking in it would be beyond his most ambitious dreams. Should he acquiesce in the popular decision, public opinion would forbid Mr. BOUTWELL and General BUTLER from fulfilling their pledge.

THE END OF THE "EVENING STAR."

THE fate of the New York and New Orleans steamship Evening Star, which sailed as one of a fortnight since, with almost three hundred passengers, of whom but a score escaped, is another of the terrible warnings which seem to pass almost unheeded. The disaster has become so perilous as the Southern coast passage. And what is the reason? Why at this moment is there such untold misery in so many homes? There seems to be no doubt of the reason whatever. Many of the ships that sail for the Southern ports are utterly unfit to go to sea. They are sent to sea when, if owners were but worthy, and crowded steamers have been floated upon the Southern coast passage only by the most strenuous exertions. While those who officially knew the facts and the dangers have been for various reasons silent.

The insecurity of this particular steamer has been alleged by "one who knows," but who ought to have known enough to sign his name to his testimony. He says: "Speaking generally, every thing about her was in a loose condition;" while JAMES HARRISON, secretary of the Steam Firemen's and Coal-passers' Association, writes to the Times that the Evening Star was manned by men who did not understand the engine and who were unused to the sea, and who were hired because they could be had upon better terms than proper seamen. And of how many other ships is the same thing true!

We do not forget that, in the excitement of so great a disaster, it is very easy and very common to exaggerate defects and to believe in carelessness. Moreover, at this season there are furious hurricanes before which the best and stanchest vessels may go down. But the knowledge of many of our readers will assure them that nothing also is easier, and nothing more common, than the most culpable carelessness in regard to steamers that carry an enormous crowd, and that the most frightful risks are often unnecessarily taken. Indeed it will be found that most of the melancholy disasters at sea, reported within a year or two past, have happened to ships of whose security there was great doubt, or of whose insecurity there was full knowledge. The Australian steamer that foundered some months since in the British Channel was notoriously unfit for sea-service.

It is not easy to indicate a remedy. The only sure one is the conscience and knowledge of the owners or examiners. But official examiners may sometimes be bribed, and owners are sometimes capable bribing. It would be a true service to humanity if passengers who have known of any real danger, or who have even experienced actual discomfort, would report the facts to the papers upon their responsibility. For these great companies are virtual monopolies, and the only check which the public has upon them is patronage. But while nothing is said of the perils escaped, and when a great accident is put off upon "Divine Providence," instead of being charged where it belongs—to the avarice or carelessness of men—no adequate or sufficient remedy will be applied. Yet if every such Company felt that the ship's passengers were a body of witnesses who would give ample evidence, it would take a very desperate case that the evidence should not be damning.

THE NATIONAL BUDGET.

THE Treasury Department has at length published its official account of the public revenue and expenditure for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866. From this it appears that the expenditures of that year were $$$520,814,337, of which $$$281,649,701—or more than half—were for the War Department, and $$$13,519,632 for the Navy Department; while the gross revenue was $$$556,039,195, of which $$$179,046,-630 were from customs, and $$$309,226,812 from internal taxes. There was thus, on the business of the year, an excess of revenue over expenditure of $$$39,691,857.

It need hardly be observed that though the war had ended in July, 1865, the year 1865-66 must nevertheless be classed, financially, among the years of the war. The war expenditure of the first quarter of that year, during which period three-fourths of the volunteer army were paid off and mustered out of service, were almost, if not fully, as heavy as during the corresponding period of the previous fiscal. They amounted to over $$$165,000,000, being at the rate of $$$660,000,000 per annum. From October they declined rapidly. During the two months ending on the 31st of August, 1865, and ending 31st March, 1866, they amounted to $$$104,000,000, and for the last quarter of the year ending 30th June last they were only $$$12,000,000.

Were it not for the bill of last session equalizing the bounties paid to volunteers, the army expenditures during the current fiscal year would not probably exceed $$$40,000,000, or at most $$$45,000,000. The Navy expenditure will probably be brought within the compass of $$$25,000,000; say, at the outside, for the two arms, $$$70,000,000 a year. For interest a sum of $$$125,000,000 will probably suffice; and for civil, foreign, and miscellaneous service, including pensions and Indians, $$$56,000,000. At this rate the aggregate public expenditure (exclusive of the money voted to the volunteers by last Congress) for the year 1866-67 will be as follows:

Army	$45,000,000
Navy	25,000,000
Interest charge	125,000,000
Civilian, foreign, pensions, etc.	56,000,000
Total expenditure	$251,000,000

On the other hand, the customs revenue last fiscal year was $$$179,046,630. Thus far the customs revenue for 1866-67 shows a considerable increase; and though it is not particularly safe to speculate upon the probable course of our foreign trade, especially in the present condition of the gold and exchange markets, the prospect now is fair for a revenue in customs (gold) for the current fiscal year of not less than $$$200,000,000. The internal revenue may be estimated more nearly. During the first quarter of the fiscal year 1865-66 trade was in a feverish condition, owing to the heavy fall in gold and the general dislocation of commerce produced by the peace; hence the revenue from taxes was light. Thus far this year trade has all branches has been prosperous, and if no commercial revulsion occurs the chances are that it will continue so throughout the remainder of the year. In this event it would be fair to estimate the produce of the internal revenue tax at not less than $$$400,-000,000 as against $$$309,226,812 in 1865-66. The miscellaneous revenue of government, which was large in 1865-66, owing to heavy sales of government property and war material rendered useless by the end of the war, will be less this year, probably $$$50,000,000 as against $$$65,126,966 in 1865-66. At this rate the public revenue of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, would be as follows:

Customs Revenue	$200,000,000
Internal Revenue	400,000,000
Direct Tax and Lands	5,000,000
Miscellaneous	50,000,000
Total Revenue	$655,000,000
Deduct Expenditure as above	251,000,000
Estimated surplus	$404,000,000

In other words, if these calculations be verified, the country will have an excess of income over expenditure of up to 15 per cent. of its total indebtedness, and will be enabled to cancel so much of the principal of its debt after paying interest on the whole.

If any thing could be more remarkable than this statement of income and expenditure by a country just emerged from a four years' exhausting war, it would be the fact that, in the face of this astounding display of resources, the obligations of this same country are offered for sale at a discount of 25 per cent. At 70@72 per cent. Europe can purchase a new issue of six per cent. bonds as it wants; and at home, the United States dollar, for the due payment of which we pledged the entire resources of this great country, with an income more than double its expenditure, will only purchase seventy-two cents in gold. A merchant who could show as large an excess of income over expenditure as the country shows would think himself outraged if his paper did not sell readily at 5 @ 6 per cent. interest—assuming that his character were good, and his record clean. Why is it otherwise with the National credit?

Something must be allowed for past mismanagement of the public finances. The throwing away of thirty odd millions of coin in May last transferred the control of the gold market from the Government to the Gold Room, and even at this day enables the unscrupulous operators of that locality to corner the market, and force up the premium. Yet so little wisdom do people learn by experience as to suppose that This one keeps, from day to day, hounding on Mr. MCCULLOCH to repeat the blunder of May, and sell his reserve to enable rest our only hope of a resumption of specie payments.

Nor is the record of the Government entirely clean. A large proportion of the current legal tender notes bear on their face the promise that they are exchangeable for Five-Twenty six per cent. bonds. Many holders have applied for the Department for such bonds. They have been told that the Department could not fulfill its bargain for want of appropriate legislation. This is quite sufficient to account for some depression in the public credit. Only securities will never command the price to which our revenues and our resources entitle them so long as the slightest taint of repudiation adheres to the administration of the finances.

For the rest, we must have patience. Our vast capacity to bear taxation is comparatively a new discovery. Only a couple of years ago, sound and judicious financiers doubted whether the people would submit to be taxed an amount sufficient to meet the interest—to say nothing of the principal—of the national debt, and with the best wishes in the world for the prosperity of the nation, dissuaded their friends from purchasing Five-Twenties at 45 in gold. Opinion has since taken a vast stride onward. In financial effect follows, though at a slower pace. Our sweet friends of the London Times, who predicted that Americans would be ruined by its purchases of Five-Twenty bonds @ 45, almost recommend the investment of British capital in the same securities at 70. By-and-by, when the true financial status of this country is realized, they may seem cheap at 90. And as to the Gold-Room, it, too, may once more realize that riches have wings. Twice or thrice since its establishment has an unexpected turn in the market stripped the kings of that unclean realm of their money. Let them beware of the Law of Averages. Gold is scarce, the necessities of the merchants are pressing, and "the game is a sure one, if you have nerve," so they say; but for all this we tell them: Beware of the Ides of November!

THE POPULAR JUDGMENT.

THE elections of this autumn are full of triumph for every man who honestly believes in the intelligence of the people. Indeed there is no hope, and of course no confidence, for any one who does not. A man like Mr. THURLOW WEED, who never appreciated the force and value of the moral conviction which underlies popular action, is a mere terror-stricken ass and utterly adrift at a time when the only sure reckoning is to be made by confiding in the good sense and justice of the people. He is therefore obliged to the ridiculous plan of flying from the storm into the cave of the winds. He thinks there is danger ahead, and incontinently frantic to himself to the society of those from whom the danger is now to be apprehended, as it has always proceeded. Mr. WEED in the same breath complains of the appointment of a Copperhead to office by the President, and declares that he hopes a Copperhead may be elected to office by the people. That is the exact measure of the value of his judgment.

But his hopes are being sadly disappointed. The elections show that there is no reaction, and that the whole weight and blandishments of the Executive patronage are not powerful enough even to bend the line of loyal hearts, but best still as they have been for six years, true to the Union and to liberty. The plan of the Executive and Copperhead alliance has been to devote every energy to carrying certain Congressional districts, so as to secure a majority of the whole number in a full Congress by uniting the Copperheads with the members elected in the Southern States. This plan has utterly failed. The people have defeated it exactly as they defeated every rebel and Copperhead combination during the war, and exactly as they will defeat every other rebel attempt.

Questions of tariff and finance, however radical and important, must, in the nature of things, yield to a question of the national existence. For nothing less than that is the exact central point of the present situation. Should the President's policy succeed, the national unity is a tempered question. Parties would continue grouped as they now are. On one side there would be the party of the old State-rights school, and on the other the Union party. The difference between them is not one of policy under the Government, but of the very nature of the Government itself. And while such a party division has no other is possible.

It seems to us very necessary that all Union men should constantly bear this fact in mind. While the present situation continues, while part of the States are unrepresented, and the main question is upon what conditions they shall be admitted, all other debate is impertinent and dangerous, except as a discussion of expediency within the party. If a Union man who favors protection sees Congress inclining to free-trade, or a free-trade Unionist sees signs of a tariff, let him remember that though it may be an evil, and an evil sufficient to drive him in ordinary times from the party, yet now the alternative is pursuit of the Union party or surrender of the Government to the party which is still warm with the effort to destroy it.

The grand proof of the capacity of the people is, that they see this just as plainly as any man can state it. They have not gone astray in the mists of theories of trade, or upon any point of merely material expediency, but they have held steadily to the primeval principle of the national existence. It is this which binds their victorious columns together from Maine to Iowa. It is the voice of fidelity to this essential necessity which is heard ringing out of the mines of Pennsylvania and over the prairies of Indiana. When the national security is beyond doubt—when the unrepresented States have returned under just conditions, and the ground is firm beneath our feet, then we may turn to other issues, and other parties will arise upon secondary policies and expedients.

SHEEP AND DEMAGOGUES.

The Richmond Times has an easy explanation of the situation. It all comes from the fact that "The masses of the Northern people do not think for themselves. They are led like sheep by their demagogues, and evil times having put bad men in office, the grooves of error into which they have slided are now difficult to leave." It adds that the "North has not had such a deluge as would cleanse all her gutters. The South has apparently been equally unfortunate; some Augean gutters remain.

Does the Times suppose that any sensible man will imagine that such stuff is written for people who think for themselves and who are not led like sheep by demagogues? If good sense and moderation are the necessities of the time is it sensible and moderate to say, as the Times does, that "Cimmerian darkness envelops the intellect of that howling faction which will neither heed the voice of justice nor listen to the cry of suffering which comes up from this stricken land." Of what does the Times complain? Of the unwillingness of a sensible nation to put a premium upon treason. In the view of the Times, not to reward States which have plunged the country with bloody war by giving them twelve additional representatives for a population which those States themselves differentiate, is to be enveloped in Cimmerian darkness and to be a howling faction.

The Times also alludes to the "fell spirit and demoniac power which drenched the land in blood." That is a very characteristic portrait of the spirit and the party which stole custom-houses, forts, and ships, and fired upon Fort Sumter when peaceful, drowned, shot, and maimed Southern Union men, and tortured Northern Union men in prison pens. Is it because "the masses of the Northern people do not think for themselves" that the Richmond Times imagines they will believe the Government of the United States to have been that "howling party"? Or is it because the masses of the Southern people are not led like sheep by their demagogues that they swallow such chaff as food?

Once more the Richmond Times speaks of "that fierce tempest of blind hate and passion which, urged on by all the arch-fiends of Radicalism, is now sweeping the North from centre to circumference." What, again, is this tempest? It is the resolution of those whose hearts and homes are bleeding, that the hand which smote them shall not be paid for its devilish work. This "blind hate" does not call for a word or an act of vengeance; this "passion" demands only that the worst conceivable treason shall not be consummated; these "arch-fiends of Radicalism" ask only that the States shall be equal in representation.

These are the "grooves of error into which they have slided," these unthinking masses of demagogue-led sheep, and they are now very "difficult to leave." Indeed, they are quite impossible. The Charleston News sees this clearly. Having seen the election returns, it says:

"Disagreeable as the prospect may be, we are forced to conclude that, without any power in us to control the tide of events, we are drifting slowly back into the Union on the terms of the Abolitionized Government, and that we will only cease to occupy our present anomalous position when we are represented in Congress by men who can take the test oath, and when our States stand where they did when we have never violated an express oath of allegiance to the United States."

We trust the eyes of the Richmond Times may soon be opened likewise.

MR. STEWART'S TENEMENT HOUSES.

The proposal of Mr. A. T. Stewart to give a million of dollars for the erection of good tenement houses, upon condition that proper ground shall be supplied, is a generous offer in which the whole public is interested. For so large a sum, judiciously expended, should be sufficient to establish a few models of such buildings. There has been a great deal of attention devoted to the model lodging-house, especially in London, and it is quite time to see something were done in this country to furnish better houses to those who are able to pay only the smallest rents. The extortion practiced upon the poor by the owners of the dens and cellars in which the poorest people of this, or of any great city, huddle is among the chief infamies of civilization. If half the money now given to the prevention of crime that is bestowed upon its punishment, the sum of human happiness would be infinitely increased, and every man's taxes would be lessened. At least half our taxes go to correct consequences which a very little foresight would have avoided.

Mr. Stewart's example in this matter is one which may very profitably followed. It is one also which is not only most serviceable but most natural to this country. The system of opening up happily the great cheap properties which exist wherever a family is to be "found ed" or maintained, and where, consequently, great hereditary estates are to be acquired and sustained. That is a ruinous selfishness which is entirely uncongenial to our climate. When a rich American has built a fine house in town and country his whole social importance could be wastefully expensive, even if it be profuse and splendid, for our scale is entirely different. Of course any man may toss money away; but the spur of an English estate, for instance, and his expenses are very different from those of the American merchant. The tendency here is happily not merely to the gross enjoyment of great fortunes, but to the participation of their advantages with the public. The Vassar College, the Cooper Union, the Astor Library, the Central Park, are illustrations which at once occur to every New Yorker, while other States have their own monuments of the same kind.

We do not understand that Mr. Stewart's intention is to erect a "Poor-house," or a place in which poor people are to be made paupers in a decent as such, but to build handsome, useful and pleasant dwellings at truly moderate but just rents. He does not offer a premium upon poverty; he hopes to provide respectable men and convenient lodgings at the same price which is now paid for nolsomeness, filth, darkness, disease, and death. Probably he knows quite as well as the rest of us that clean houses alone are not enough to make clean people; but he doubtless is also fully aware that dirty and detestable houses do not make clean people. We see, also, we may infer, that a vital reform of the inhabitants of the slums must begin outwardly in the material conditions. Sunday-schools, however excellent in themselves, are very pointless to a starving man; while the Christianity which begins by stimulating and helping those who are willing to help themselves is the very one which once proved to be a system of brotherly love. Good tenement houses in New York will be a model for all other cities, while the wise example will lead to many more inspire similar designs every where.

IMBECILE FURY.

The National Intelligencer of Washington—a paper latterly known only by its abject servility to the President—says, with amusing falsity and fury, "They know that they are sworn to resist the restoration of the Union to the last extremity and with every means of violence which they can invoke." The desperate follies which are thus intent upon national destruction are those who do not think that rebellion ought to be rewarded, and who believe in those who have been true to the Union, rather than in those who have made war upon it for four years. They also hold that the people in Congress are the proper authority to settle the questions arising from an armed effort to destroy the nation, and they object to the admission of accused persons to the jury-box at their own trial. They also believe that the Union is not dissolved and its most solemn pledges are to be inviolably respected by the people; and they are now engaged in expressing at the ballot-box their judgment upon such "conservative" influences as the National Intelligencer.

That delightful journal sees national safety only in the Conservative course of patriots like his Honor Mayor Monroe, of New Orleans, and perceives vital fidelity to the Constitution and the Union only in Judge Raphael Semmes, of the Probate Court of Mobile, or the Northern Governors who refuse to hear that John Logan's yacht, the Alabama, had come to grief two or three years ago. The people who have saved the Union are the mere canaille, thinks the National Intelligencer. Those who by fire and blood and unimaginable tortures of Union soldiers strove to destroy it, are its proved friends. The men of Copperhead faith hissed and darted at every act of the Government during the war in the true Union League; while those who elected Lincoln and told up his arms are a disorganizing, incendiary crew, of which the delectable National Intelligencer exclaims with anguish, "Anarchy is its opportunity; cruelty is its passion; and bloodshed is its game." The anarchy of the Union party was proved, probably, by saving the Government; its cruelty by not imitating the "conservatism" of Andersonville, its falsehood by asserting the truth of the Declaration of Independence.

It has been understood for some years that the National Intelligencer survived only by liberal alms; but what an enormous supply of Executive cold pieces must have been bestowed to produce such a ludicrous explosion of "Conservative" gratitude.

"AND, MOTHER! DRAW IT MILD!"

Carl Schurz took the liberty of observing that the freedmen universally celebrated the last Fourth of July while the late rebels did not. Thereupon the Louisville Observer, in Lincoln County, Kentucky, remarks:

"Is that any of your business, you squash-headed, flap-eared, beer-swilling, garlic-eating, negro-loving, Dutch scoundrel? We don't, we don't know about the Sixth, or the Fourth of July either! We are old on country, and always celebrate the anniversary of its independence in a becoming manner until it was overrun by several millions of Dutch, Irish, Scotch and cutthroats like yourself, whose votes were bought up by Northern demagogues at a pint of liquor beer each."

The Observer is wrong, of course, a warm friend of "conciliation" and "magnanimity," and has no patience with an "unconstitutional Congress," which suggests that rebellion shall not be rewarded with increased political power.

VENTILATION AGAIN

It is a previous article we developed the principles of ventilation; but there are some practical points in their application which we will now very briefly notice.

Before coal was introduced so extensively, and the open fire-place was in general use, there was ordinarily sufficient ventilation, at least among people in comfortable circumstances. The upward current in the chimney secured both that agitation of the air in the room which is necessary to the diffusion of noxious gases, and that change of the air by which it is renewed from without. This supposes, however, a sufficient flue for the introduction of fresh air. There was generally no difficulty about this as houses were formerly constructed—enough to spend good deal of time and service about the doors and windows, with the necessary occasional opening of the doors, to supply the want. But not so with the kitchen fire-place, where there are no doubt windows, making an almost air-tight arrangement. Then there must be some special provision for the introduction of fresh air.

In heating rooms from a hot-air furnace it is easy to effect proper ventilation. Here fresh air is constantly introduced, and in such a way as to agitate the air in the room. All that you need in addition, therefore, is sufficient outlets to afford a proper escape for the air, and these secure continual change. An objection is sometimes made to this mode of warming, that it tends to dry the air by heating it, as it issues at the furnace, and therefore is not fresh air. But what is meant by burned air? The gases which are produced by combustion, and escape in the heated flue, unless it be the oxygen, and that only by oxidizing the iron, which can not be done to any appreciable extent, if at all. Impurities in the air may be burned, and the products may or may not be deleterious, but we are supposing that the air which goes to the furnace is pure, as it does.

If the furnace be a steam-heater, the apartments being warmed by reservoirs of steam, there is here no introduction at all of fresh air, as there is in the ordinary furnace, and it must be secured by entirely independent expedients. These are very commonly not adequately practiced, sometimes wholly neglected, and it is probable that the great majority of houses heated by steam are nothing like as well ventilated as those which are heated in the common furnace.

In our arrangements for ventilation it is hopeless to avoid using portions of cold air strike upon individuals. In ill-ventilated public rooms, whose resort is had to temporary expedients, much harm is often done in this way, especially to persons who are in delicate health. It is not our intention to discuss the various plans for ventilating rooms for public assemblies, but we would say that, in all cases, such permanent means of ventilation should be provided that there will be no necessity for resorting to temporary expedients. It will cost something to do this, for the simple reason that, besides the expense of providing for more heat to heat a sufficient supply of fresh air than half or one-third of that quantity. A few hundred dollars will cover all the expense of apparatus for any church or hall. This expenditure should be considered, in every case, an absolute necessity; and if it can not be provided for in any other way, it should be taken from the ornamentation of the building; for pleasing the eye is of small importance compared with the vital necessity of getting the lungs their due supply of air. But this is not the common sentiment; and any one who advocates the securing of ventilation in the construction of a public building will encounter opposition from the great mass of those who are interested. The difficulties that he will meet with are thus given by a clergyman, who succeeded in having his church properly ventilated at a expense of only three hundred dollars: "First, he will meet with indifference and opposition, and even ridicule. From the many of those who are to be the most benefited. Secondly, not one architect in a hundred will render him the least assistance. Thirdly, builders will be sure to regard the whole thing as a humbug, and if not closely watched will trick up his flue or flues after his tales, or do some other careless or malicious thing which will frustrate all his plans."

A harm is done to the health from imperfect ventilation in churches and halls, much more is it so in ill-ventilated factories and work-shops; for here the effect is both prolonged and often great. And to say nothing of humanitarian considerations, securing ventilation in a manufactory is a matter of economy in the sense. Just so far as there is a lack of supply of fresh air will there be a diminution of vigor in the workmen, and consequently a reduction in the amount of work which will be accomplish. Their efficiency depends as much on their being well aired as on their being well fed.

If the health as well as the comfort is to be warmed by a hot-air furnace, and there be freedom in leaving the doors of rooms open, there is no difficulty in effecting the ventilation in the simplest means. The letting down of a window from the top will secure the best air current. But when each room is warmed by itself more care is needed to guard against exposure to cold currents. The smaller the room the greater is the difficulty. It is accordingly difficult to ventilate properly a small room heated by a close stove; and therefore, even among well-informed people, a great deal of air is breathed over and over again in such rooms to the constant deterioration of the health. It we remember that the object to be attained is the exposure of every one person every hour, we can have some appreciation of the failure of this supply to persons who spend the greater part of their time in offices. It is accordingly difficult to ventilate properly a small room heated by a close stove; and therefore, even among well-informed people, a great deal of air is breathed over and over again in such rooms to the constant deterioration of the health. It we remember that the object to be attained is the exposure of every one person every hour, we can have some appreciation of the failure of this supply to persons who spend the greater part of their time in offices. It is the consequent depressing influence to which the physical system is subjected. The effect is like that of a slow general poisoning, breaking down the health gradually but surely. Defective ventilation is, in fact, one of the prominent causes of disease, especially in cities, where there is so much economy as to room, even among people that can well afford to have enough good air.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ELECTIONS.

General Geary's majority for Governor in Pennsylvania is 11,000 and more. There was a fullquorum of the Union vote in Philadelphia, but this was counterbalanced by the absence of the Home Guard. The Union gain of two Union Congressmen, Mr. Cake succeeding Mr. Chapman, and Mr. Cowden, Mr. Myers.

The Union majority in Indiana is about 12,000. The Union Congressional delegation remains as at present, a decision as in the present Congress.

In Ohio the Union majority amounts to nearly 50,000. The Congressional delegation remains essentially as at present.

Iowa goes all one way. She has not a single Democratic Congressman.

FOREIGN NEWS

The Emperor Napoleon left for Biarritz on the 6th of September. The state of his health, according to all accounts, is not to excite alarm. The Gulf Stream, which is on the Bay of Biscay, the Emperor hopes to derive much benefit from his sojourn during the period. At Biarritz Count Bismarck met the Emperor Napoleon by appointment of the utmost importance. Question is that which now presses for solution upon the attention and the attentive Emperor's late speech. Italy promises to withdraw from Venetia, and to respect the Pope. But some of the Powers insist that the Pope shall not only be the defense of the Pope's authority is to be maintained. The Pope has refused to accept the terms which they offer, but a necessary portion of 1100 men to whom Monsignor Merode Landelle has entrusted the command of the Papal troops will scarcely suffice to defend the Papal States against the attacks of the Italians. The latter will proceed with caution, and will not, it is said, cross the frontiers without a violent outbreak. of the Emperor keeps his attention fixed on Rome. The question of the Pope will be limited by the walls of the Vatican and the Quirinal. As to the military force of the Pope and Spain for the Pope's protection, they will never be allowed to land.

The Cretan insurrection appears to be confined to the island. There is nothing further of any progress of revolutionary movements on the Turkish main land. The Turkish troops are said to be concentrating. They will be able to throw continually fresh troops into Crete as they may be needed, and the Greeks will be compelled to flee to the mountains or leave the island. The latter course many are taking, and no less than 40,000 of the Turkish peasantry have quitted their houses in the interior and fled for safety to the city of Candia. If this continues the wealth and labor of the country will be scared away from the scenes of outrage and bloodshed that may take place, and the Turkish Government will be unmolested in the sway over the solitude they have made. It is possible that Count Bismarck may seem, in this state of affairs, to be advisable in the interests of humanity.

"BABY HAS DROPPED ASLEEP."

Now Franky, boy, 'tis time for bed;
Put up those books, I pray:
And Katy, dear, those toys of yours
Must all be cleared away.
The clock struck six some time ago,
Sounding through all the room;
And ere it gives us seven, you know,
Father will be at home.

He says there is no place to him
So sweet as this his home;
So sweet that he can never care
Elsewhere for joy to roam.
So let us make it nice and snug,
That he may not complain,
But feel it o'er his guiding-star
Through all the dark and rain.

Now softly, Frank; don't make a noise—
Baby has dropped asleep:
She's been as good as gold all day;
I want her so to keep.
Off with your boots, and say your prayers;
You must be ready quite
To go to bed when father comes,
And you have said "good-night."

NOTES FROM A SEA JOURNAL.

By ROGER STARBUCK.

In the year 18— our ship, the St. Athans, anchored off Honolulu, Sandwich Islands.

The vessels in the harbor were mostly whalers; but there was a large merchantman anchored to windward of us; and about fifty fathoms ahead lay the Russian frigate Diana of fifty guns. Beneath me, on our decks, the men were at work, bunting water-casks from the hold, under the superintendence of Mr. Gibbs, the first mate, who, to the amusement of some of the Russian officers leaning over the quarter-rail of their vessel, was constantly breaking one of the ten commandments in a manner peculiarly his own. Suddenly he paused and colored with confusion as a tall, thin, benevolent-looking old gentleman, who had come off in a shore boat, stepped aboard, and, touching him on the shoulder, offered him a tract. The visitor was immediately recognized as the Rev. S. C. Damon, Seaman's Chaplain, and editor of a Honolulu paper. His timely arrival was hailed with pleasure by the persecuted watchmen, to each of whom he presented a tract and a copy of his interesting little paper, The Friend. Soon the first officer, who had dodged into the cabin, reappeared, dressed in shining broadcloth. He seemed to think that the splendor of his attire would atone for his late violent behavior; he strutted rather than walked toward the "divine," and grasping his hand, pompously remarked that "he was now in a fit condition to welcome his visitor to the ship in the absence of the captain, who was ashore."

The Chaplain was evidently amused. He said, however, that he was very glad to be so kindly received. Then, having by this time distributed all his tracts and papers, he turned to depart, gently declining an invitation from the mate to step into the lower hold and see the "fun" (oil).

An hour later I was ashore. Having a few reals to spend I entered a shop kept by a Chinaman to purchase a straw-hat. While trying one on I heard a plaintive voice outside of the store, and turning saw an old Kanaka—a pitiful-looking object, who seemed to have lost the use of both legs—clinging to the sleeve of a gentleman whom I recognized as a well-known and very benevolent "missionary."

The native was begging for a few cents; he declared that he had not eaten any thing for several days, except a piece of a watermelon, thrown to him by a sailor.

To my surprise the missionary, turning a deaf ear to the man's pleading, disengaged himself from his clutches and hurried off.

"That is very strange," I said, turning to the shop-keeper; and I put down the hat, remarking that I had concluded to give my reals to the beggar.

The Chinaman could not speak a word of English. He posted himself between me and the beggar, however, and motioned me back, rattling off at the same time a whole volley of words in his own tongue, which I could not understand. I pushed past him and gave my reals to the beggar, who thanked me with tears in his eyes, after which he dragged himself toward a bake-shop not far distant.

Feeling very glad that I had found an opportunity to relieve the sufferings of a fellow-creature, I returned to the ship.

Early the next morning, while seated in the steerage, I heard on deck such cries as are seldom heard in port.

"There it is!" screamed a number of voices—"there blows!—off there toward the reef—a big blackfish!"

I rushed on deck, and glancing to leeward saw, sure enough, the well-known spout. It was seen, I believe, almost at the same instant, by every man on the decks of the whole fleet; for a simultaneous shout, that seemed to pierce the very caverns of the clouds overhead, now was heard, followed by clamorous orders to "clear away the boats there!"—to "hurry up that line"—to "get those harpoons ready," etc. etc.

In a few minutes the waters of the harbor were dotted with hundreds of boats, their crews with rolled up sleeves and strained eyeballs, pulling like madmen toward that single spout. Four blackfish!—it had certainly entered upon dangerous ground. The din of voices was terrific; while each officer, anxious for the honor of being the first to strike the fish, encouraged his crew with all the power of his lungs; the rigging of the merchant ships and the frigate swarmed with spectators, who laughed, clapped their hands, and applauded. I belonged to the larboard boat, which, on this occasion, contained the best oarsmen in the fleet, as was soon proved by our leaving our competitors many fathoms behind us.

On we flew, and presently I heard the mate order our harpooner, Tom Chimes, to "stand up."

A moment later we peaked our oars, when the voice of the first officer, shrieking the well-known order, "Give it to him!" pierced our ears. While went the iron from Tom's hand, and, turning, we were sorry to discover that he had missed.

Breeching its full length out of water, the frightened fish now bounded like a shot over the surf that sweeps, booming, across the reef at this point to a great height.

To stem the careering wall of water in a whale-boat was out of the question, so the whole fleet of boats now became nearly stationary, their crews and officers uttering yells and groans of disappointment.

Suddenly, however, all eyes were riveted upon a canoe, which, worked by a single native, was rapidly approaching the reef. In the bow stood another Kanaka, armed with a well-sharpened harpoon of great length and calibre. As the light vessel shot past us I was astonished to recognize in this man the old beggar to whom I had given my reals!

I pointed him out to Tom Chimes, and told my story in a few words. "You've been imposed upon," said he; "that chap is an old Kanaka who is worth his thousands, earned by whaling in different vessels as harpooner. Of late years he's grown lazy and taken to begging for a living, pretending to those who don't know him that he has lost the use of his legs. Now, however, is there's a chance for him to make something in an easy way—for he's one of the best at an iron that was ever known—he's grown smart again!"

Even as my shipmate spoke, the canoe, skillfully worked by the man at the paddle, was borne forward over the reef with terrific velocity on the crest of a sea that rose to a height not less than thirty feet!

This manœuvre is often practiced by the natives of Oahu, and is performed with a skill that usually enables them to clear the reef without shipping a drop of water into their frail vessels. Very soon we perceived that the Kanaka was fast to the blackfish. He had contrived to strike that tender part of its body which by whalemen is termed the "life spot." The creature came up near the beach, spouting blood, and died in a few minutes.

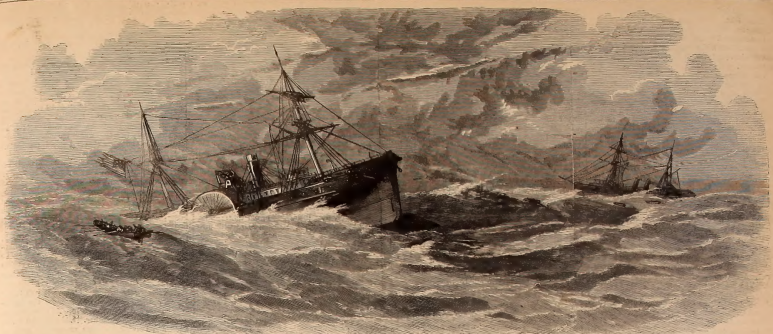
Subsequently the Kanaka sold his prize to a whaling captain in the harbor for fifty dollars, after which, I believe, he continued his occupation of street begging, until he was arrested and locked up in the calaboose.

When released he shipped in a vessel bound to the United States. I do not know whether he is now living or dead; there are few old whalemen, however, who have not heard of "Kanaka Jim," once the best harpooner that ever hurled an iron from a boat's bow.

ORANGE-PEEL;

OR, A NEW-TESTAMENT LAW.

"EMMA," said a faithful nurse, "don't throw that orange-peel on the flags, and thereby break a New-Testament law."



"What! is there a law in the New Testament about orange-peel?"

"'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' You would not like any one to throw you down, or cause you to stumble, and perhaps injure a limb for life. Do not, then, endanger the life or limb of another. Many have been lamed for life by people throwing, as you have done, pieces of orange-peel on the flags. Some time ago a porter in New York was carrying a heavy bag on his back, when he stepped on a piece of orange-peel which a boy had carelessly thrown on the flags, and that fall caused his death. When his poor wife and children arrived at the hospital he was a corpse! I could tell you of several cases of persons who are cripples for life through falls by orange-peel. If, therefore, you would love your neighbor as yourself never throw orange-peel on the flags."

"Thank you, nurse, for so kindly reproving me of a very thoughtless habit. I will strive not only to remember what you have said about the New-Testament law, but will also throw off from the flags any pieces of orange-peel that I may find left there by others."

THREE SHIPWRECKS.

WE illustrate on this page three shipwrecks—those of the Daniel Webster, the Manchaka, and the Evening Star, occurring during the recent disastrous gales off the Atlantic coast. The Daniel Webster and the Manchaka were so fortunate as to prove shipwrecks fatal only to the vessels, while the Evening Star foundered and went down with nearly all of her passengers.

The Daniel Webster (Captain J. BOLDER), a side-wheel steamship of 1050 tons, was owned by Captain GEORGE S. WRIGHT. She was used as a transport during the war, but has since plied as a regular trader between New York and Mobile. She started on her last trip for Mobile September 27, with a crew numbering 25, and 18 passengers. On the 29th she encountered strong gales, with a heavy sea and rain. The gale increased, and on the evening of October 2 there came on a heavy storm with a tremendous sea, the vessel laboring heavily and shipping large quantities of water. Before the morning of the 3d the gale had become a hurricane, and the ship hove to. The guard and wheel-house were broken up at 4 P.M. on the 3d, and the vessel had the appearance of a wreck. That night a heavy sea stove in the forecastle hatch, and every sea that came on board went below and the ship filled rapidly, the water putting out the fires. The pumps now gave out, and all hands, including the passengers, went to bailing water. The vessel was soon at the mercy of the elements and sinking. At 7

A.M. on the 4th the George Cromwell (Captain VAILE) bore in sight. The boats were launched and the passengers, with the greater portion of the crew, were transferred to the George Cromwell. At 10.30 A.M. the Emanuel Webster sank, stern foremost. She was an old vessel, and believed by some to be unseaworthy.

The schooner Minnehaha, of Baltimore, sailed from Savannah for Richmond September 29. On the 30th, about 35 miles east from Charleston, she encountered a gale which soon increased to a hurricane with a tremendous sea. The vessel sprang a leak, and the hands applied themselves to the pumps. On the 4th of October the crew, numbering five persons, were saved by the George Cromwell from a disastrous death by shipwreck.

But the Evening Star had no saving George Cromwell near her when she went down, October 3, in a hurricane. The Evening Star was considered a good vessel, and was built in this city at a cost of $500,000. She was one of the celebrated Star Line of steamships, plying between New York and New Orleans. She was under the charge of WILLIAM KNAPP, an officer of acknowledged ability and experience. She encountered a storm on the 2d, when 180 miles east of Tybee Island. After weathering the storm for seventeen hours she foundered at 8 A.M. on the 3d, with 270 souls on board. Only twenty-three persons are known to have been saved. All of the women but two seem to have been lost. The captain was drowned. There were on board nearly one hundred young women of the demi-monde, a New Orleans opera troupe, accompanying Forbes who had been engaged in Paris, and a circus company numbering about 30 persons.

It appears that the ship went down, boats and all. But a few of the crew and two or three of the passengers were fortunate enough to lay hold on the life-boats when they came to the surface. Forbes E. S. ALLEN and nine others were two days out on the open sea without food or water, when they were picked up by the Fostering, bound for Queenstown, England. On the 6th they were transferred to the J. S. Waring. The Morning Star picked up three of the crew and four passengers, two of whom were women. The third mate, three sailors, and a passenger, FRANK GARRARD, of Brooklyn, New York, succeeded in reaching Fernandina, Florida, October 7.

COUSIN JANE.

WHEN my little cousin, Jane Lumley, came to me one morning, and said in her blushing way: "Cousin William, Mr. Forbes has proposed to me, and I have accepted him," I felt that I must be a very old cousin indeed, a very safe cousin as girls would say, or she would never have chosen me for a confidant.

I was pleased, and I was sorry, to hear the tidings. I was pleased, because it was a very good offer; and I was sorry, because I knew Forbes would take Jane away—selfish animal!—and though I had never cared to marry her myself, I thought it a hard case to see her marry another. Forbes was a gentleman he had come first, so it was the predominant feeling, and I shook hands with Jane, and congratulated her on her good fortune. Forbes, though a widower, was not thirty: he was good-looking and accomplished; he was well off, too, and had a charming home within a convenient distance of London; in short, he was a most eligible husband for Jane, who had not a farthing of her own, and who owed the very clothes she wore to my father's kindness. Not that he thought it much kindness, dear old boy! Jane was a pet, and I feel pretty sure that he considered Mr. Forbes a very fortunate man in having secured her. Of course, I thought so too, for I knew Jane's value. Still Mr. Forbes's offer puzzled me.

Jane had come with her little story to me in the garden; we were alone in one of the grove arbors. She stood in the shade, bareheaded, modest, with a happy blush on her cheek, and a soft dewy light in her brown eyes. I had never seen her look half so well in her whole life as she looked then—and, shall I say it?—Jane did not look at all pretty? No, not as all. No one, indeed, could call Jane pretty or even plain; but there was an absence of beauty in her face, which was the more remarkable that pretty girls abounded in our country. She had a nice figure, a graceful carriage, a pleasant voice, and a happy look; that look she had, and no more. She was also a sensible girl, clever, well-bred, and unaffected, though dreadfully shy with strangers; but how could Mr. Forbes see any thing of what was her shyness? He had not seen her more than a dozen times in all, and Jane was so quiet that he must be a very penetrating and far-seeing man indeed if he had discovered her merits during those brief interviews. I ventured on expressing some surprise. "How do you both have been, Jenny," I said.

"No, William, not at all sly, I assure you," she replied, gravely. "I had no idea Mr. Forbes thought of such a thing till he mentioned it the other day."

"Then you did not say 'yes' at once, Jenny?"

"How could I? I was so confused that I should not even have asked for time to think over it, if he had not made the suggestion."

It was very plain that Jane was not in love; but then how cold it'd were! I had seen them together the day before this, and Mr. Forbes, for a young man, was a good lover, to say the least of it. In spite her inexperience in such matters, Jane felt some surprise too, and she expressed it with a mixture of seriousness and simplicity which delighted me, played with me, but which she had certainly never showed to Mr. Forbes.

I was alone with her on the evening before the wedding-day. We sat in the parlor, by one of the open windows, and we looked out at the garden. I could not help thinking that this garden would seem very dull and lonely when my little cousin Jenny was gone. No more should I hear her gayly carolling in the morning, as she ran down the alleys, light and lithe as a bird on the wing. No more would I see her reading in one of the arbor tent as a young Muse. No more would the waving of her muslin dress or the pattering of her little feet on the gravel give me pleasant thoughts of youth and girlhood. She was going off to Paris with that cold Mr. Forbes, and after their honey-moon trip he would . . . be her to his house and keep her there forever. These were dismal thoughts; so, with a groan, I said:

"You are going away to-morrow, Jane?"

"Yes," she answered, in a low voice. "Do you know, I can scarcely believe it, cousin William."

"Nonsense," I said, with a groan. "You like it. I have no doubt you are desperately in love with Mr. Forbes by this time."

"No, I am not," she replied, with one of her little solemn ways; "it is very odd, but I am not in love with Mr. Forbes, in spite of all his devotion to me."

Mr. Forbes's settlements had been very liberal indeed, but other devotion I had not seen.

"It is very wrong, I suppose, my dear Jenny, in a tone of keen remorse; "but it is no fault of mine, you know. Nevertheless, I spoke to Mr. Forbes about it the other day."

"Did you, though?" I exclaimed, rather startled at this unnecessary piece of candor.

"Yes; and he said it did not matter, that we should be very happy together, and that I would be, he knew, a good mother to his little boy."

I don't exactly know what I said; I gave little Jane; I dare say some truism about the non-necessity of ardent love on her part, for she said, in her serious way:

"So I think, cousin William; besides, you know, feeling that deficiency, I must, of course, make it up by living ever so much better. I might have been ill I had returned all Mr. Forbes's feelings."

But she sighed; perhaps the prospect of being so very good seemed to her a trifle in my young cousin. Aunt Mary came in and put an end to the conversation. I went out to smoke a cigar, and did not see Jane till the next morning.

A pleasant blushing bride my cousin looked, almost pretty and quite happy. Mr. Forbes was, as usual, very handsome, very polite, very genial. He sat down to say that he went through the trying marriage ceremony with much fortitude. When it was over he seemed to have cast a weight of care away, and accepted our congratulations and good wishes with something like a happy smile. The wedding-breakfast was late, and I did not see much of him before we all sat down; but, when we did sit, I thought Mr. Forbes looked a most excitable bridegroom, and that even quiet little Jane had very fitful spirits for a bride. I drew no conclusions until after breakfast, the library, where I stood alone, to bid me good-by. We had spent many pleasant hours in that library, and I did not wonder that Jane showed some emotion at leaving it forever. But when she came up to me, and, instead of taking my hand, threw her arms around my neck and laid her cold cheek on mine, I felt certain that sobs and tears, I felt a wonder verging on alarm.

"Jane, my dear girl, my darling, what ails you? I said, anxiously.

"I am going away," she sobbed; "oh, cousin William, I am going away!"

She would not stay. She was going away, but surely she had known that all along; and surely it was not to go and leave us that could put her in such a state of excitement. It was to go and meet a plantation from her. There was no time. The carriage was waiting; they were looking for her.

"I am coming, my love," I said, hurried, darting from me, and speaking in a light-hearted voice. I followed her out. Mr. Forbes handed her into the carriage, stepped in after her, and in a little course Jane, now Mrs. Forbes, was gone forever from among us.

Jane had not been long married when my father died: Aunt Mary was ordered to the south of France, and I remained alone with the housekeeper. I was very dreary indeed. Jane, whom I had proposed to Jane and married her, I fancied we should have made a happier couple than Mr. and Mrs. Forbes. She seemed to love me, I had never complained, but she never once said, "I am happy." She praised Mr. Forbes and his house, and spoke of her position and future prospects with pleasure. The theme that most frequently recurred in her letters was Arthur, Mr. Forbes's little boy. She recorded his sayings and doings with maternal pride, and I began to think that a young bride whose mind was so much engrossed by her husband's child could not be a very happy one. I had received a pressing invitation to Mr. Forbes's house, and though Jane did not once remind me of it, I resolved to visit the Elms. It would be a charity; besides, I wanted to see why Jane was not happy. I am bound to say that, though my visit was unexpected, Mr. Forbes received me with great civility.

"Jane will be delighted to see you," he said; "she is not with my little boy."

Jane came in presently with a sickly, peevish-looking little fellow—the wonderful Arthur, about whom she had had so much to write. She colored on seeing me, but deftly. I had not the least idea I could have believed it of Jane I should have thought she was sorry I had come. She stammered a welcome, however; but, as Jane always had, showed every opportunity of remaining alone with me. Once I caught her on the staircase.

"Well, Jane, are you happy?" I whispered.

"Oh, hush, hush!" she replied, shrilly. "Is not the Elms a charming place?" And she made her escape.

Yes, the Elms was a charming place; a brown old-fashioned, spacious mansion, with a gay flower-garden around it, and bowling-green in front, an ancient elm-trees scattered on a grassy slope. Truly the mistress of this pleasant abode and well-ordered household, the wife of that handsome, agreeable gentleman, ought to have been a happy woman; but she was not. I saw it at once. Jane had grown thin and pale, and looked sad and careworn. Nor did Mr. Forbes look a happy man. I did not like the slight frown which at times had spoiled in his handsome face. He was very kind to his wife, and strictly polite; but of fondness, of love, of tenderness, I saw no sign. He kept these for his child, who was certainly one of the most illtempered little five-year-old wretches I had ever seen. Yet Jane seemed to rival her husband in doting affection for that little monkey, who began our acquaintance by making faces at me, and followed it up by biting my leg before dinner. "He was a great sufferer," apologetically said his father.

I thought Jane's health was the particular instance, but I bore the pain—I have the mark to this day—with that heroism which politeness alone can inspire. I had intended going to Paris, and his wife a long visit; but our intentions have little power over the course of events. That same evening I was thrown from Mr. Forbes's stumbled over the root of a tree, and sprained my ankle. It was very provoking. My sprain was one of the worst; the doctor said so. I was called in ordered rest—total rest, he said. In short, I was condemned to spend many days, some weeks, perhaps, at the Elms. Mr. Forbes received unreceptionably; he was cordial, he was kind, he was hospitable; and my little Jane, on seeing me in severe pain, became more attentive than ever to her friend her uncle.

"I—I am very happy," she stammered.

"No, Jane, you are not; neither is Mr. Forbes. I do not see why you should not tell me the truth, Jane, if a word of sound, sensible advice from cousin William would help to set matters right, you may rely upon yourself the chance, and his pleasure, of that word?" Her color came and went; her head dropped on her lap; she clasped her hands and said:

"Oh! if you could—if you could tell me something—advise me, I—I—I am very unhappy."

Were you? I could only mutter to myself.

"I always suspected this," I replied, rather fearfully. "I did, indeed. I must know why he married you. Do you know?"

"Oh yes," she answered, in a very peculiar tone; "and that is just the mischief. If I had known nothing, all might have been well."

This was very mysterious. It took me some time and trouble to make Jenny more explicit; at length she said with a sob:

"When we were really married," she began, "and I came home his wife, and looked at him and felt myself his wife, I—I—I hated him. Oh! so happy. Perhaps you remember that, even before changing my dress, I went down the garden. I had a foolish fancy that there lay some of my favorite flowers and take them with me. I thought to be alone there; but some one had given Mr. Forbes a letter on our coming in, and he followed me to read it. I saw him in the summer-house, sitting in your chair, his head flung on the table, his arms clasped above it; and I—I—I thought nothing as if he were ill—not agony. I turned cold and trembled. I knew it was no physical pang that wrung those moans from him. I knew he had been reading what was on the ground by him. I picked it up and read it. It was from my hand, dated at sea. It had not heard, and he did not heed me. I looked at him at the first words; and when I had read them, I could not look at him till I had finished the whole."

God help me! It was a love-letter, written to my husband by one who had been compelled to marry him, lured by the eleven hundred a year of her error and asked to be forgiven! She wrote full of hope and fondness. She had suffered so much from Mr. Forbes's love, she said, to long every with his own Annie! Yes, she called herself his own. I was his wife; I had not been as dear formerly; I still was not as dear now as that poor, my orange-wreath, and another woman wrote thus to my husband! He now roused himself and saw me. I laid down the letter. He turned, and, pale face, no doubt, told him that I had read it; for he took it from me and walked away—both without a word. I remained where I was. "Was he sorry for the letter had not come sooner? Would he have given me up even at the foot of the altar? I knew better now—I had not been married to my husband before; but then my mind was not my own. One thing, however, was clear. He did not love me. He had wished to marry me in order to punish the ingrate, and to hurry our marriage in order to forestall hers, and show her how little he felt her faithlessness. He was very good, quiet, and not unattractive, that I might owe him much, and he, the rich, handsome gentleman, owe me very little. That was it, poor Jane! That was very like her.

"You know now why we are not, and can not be, happy. It is because I read that letter. I am Mrs. Forbes, and I am sorry, I pay for my error. I had remained ignorant I should have been content. Mr. Forbes would have acted his part to the end, and I should have had no way thought that I had fascinated him. But my poor little pride has had a fall, and little cousin Jane has been sorely punished for it. Tell me what you know all along that she was never loved, but merely made the instrument of an angry lover's revenge. Still, I must be just to Jane. I am sure he meant to make me very happy—to be generous, kind, and attentive, and perhaps, in the end, he would have liked me. Only, you know, you must. I know you must. As he is in your presence, so he is in private—a perfect gentleman. I, who meant to be so good, so devoted to him, never had a word to say, a look to my husband. I answer when he speaks, and that is all. I am cold as a statue when he is by. I feel it, I know it, and I can not help it: that Annie is ever between us, and she freezes me. I have never seen her; I do not know who she is, what she is like; but sometimes I lie awake at night and think, 'If he were to find them dead together, would he be very sorry; he could marry his Annie?'"

Poor little Jane! My heart ached for her, and it ached all the more that I fancied she was fond of her husband. "Jenny, Jenny," said I, with a sigh, "I will tell you why you can do nothing to win Mr. Forbes; it is because you love him."

She hid her face in her hands, and I saw her forehead, her neck even, turn crimson.

"Yes, that is it," she said at length, looking up and turning pale again. "I like him—I who reproached myself for not caring enough about him when we married—I who meant to try so hard to get that liking. I like him. He does not see it, he never will see it; but if he should I shall be the most wretched of women. It is the thought of my indifference that reconciles him to his fate; I know he trusts me, he would find it unendurable."

"How do you know that?" I asked, much startled.

"I can not tell you, but I know it. I nearly betrayed myself once, and I can not forget his look of uneasiness and alarm."

"Jane, you deceive your husband."

"No," she replied, quietly, "and you must not misunderstand me and wrong him. I am quiet, you know; well, I believe Mr. Forbes does took me partly for that. 'Here is a girl who will expect no devotion, no fondness, no nonsense,' he thought, 'nothing, at least, that I can not give her.' Suppose he finds out that I am not the woman he thought me, and that when I married I did expect to love and to be loved, will it be necessary to him to try and fulfill his part of the compact?"

Alas! that was true, and because it was true I heaved a deep sigh. At that moment the parlor-door opened and Arthur came in. At once he crept up to his young step-mother. She took him on her knee, and twining her arm round his neck she nestled on her bosom, and thence looked at me with a pale, pitiful little face that made me forgive him all his sins.

"Jane," I said, and I am not ashamed to add that my eyes were dim—"there is your hope and your link with the father."

Jane shook her head rather sadly.

"No link," she replied, "but, if possible, a cause of further division. When I came and found this poor sickly thing my heart yearned toward it, perhaps because it suffered like myself; perhaps," she added, with a fond blush, "because it was his. I called it, and it came. I caressed it, and it fell asleep in my arms. When it was sick I tended it; when it was peevish and fretful I bore with it. I bore with it; and thus, I suppose, it loved me. But, you see, it loves me too much. One who ought to be first is second now, and second he says. I am obeyed when another is not; and I am not his Annie that the preference should not be resented as against me, indeed, not against the child, but resented as a wrong. For if there be a being passionately loved it is this little fragile creature. He watched when he was born, and his father almost became a woman for his sake. He nursed him, he tended him, and I reap the whole fruit of love—I, who had not the care of the tree. But I can not help it. This is my comfort in sadness; this little warm living creature whispers to me, and I can not help it. When I talk to it and play with it, when I dress it, as I like to do daily, I feel almost happy. Arthur is not always as you have seen him to-day, cousin William; Arthur does not always bite, for Arthur is not always in pain, poor little fellow! He has days when he is bright and merry and rollicksome, without mischief, just like a young kid. Eh, Arthur?"

Arthur looked up; she stooped, and their lips met in a long fond kiss. They were thus when Mr. Forbes entered the room. I saw his color change as he perceived the child in his wife's arms; but he soon recovered his composure, came up to us cheerfully, and, bending over Jane's shoulder, asked Arthur to kiss papa. Arthur frowned, and gave papa a sulky push. Mr. Forbes tried to smile as he had already done, but the smile was forced, though a blush which followed it was real. I took no more of us perfect, and I am bound to say that as Arthur pushed his father away a saucy little look of triumph passed through Jane's tears. It was a look that to me, at least, said plainly: "I am not lonely; but there is one who loves me." Perfect! At was this look which, whether he understood it or not, made Mr. Forbes color like a girl.

Nothing is easier than to solicit confidence under pretense of giving advice. I have more troubles some, to a conscientious person, than to give the proffered counsel which the confidence begets. I have made. So, at least, I now felt, and I dreaded being alone with Jane again; but I found, to my great comfort, that she was under no such apprehension, that Jane had spoken to get relief, not to be advised. At least, she never asked me to suggest what line of conduct she should pursue with remedy to her sorrows. I pitied Mr. Forbes too. You see, it is one thing to marry a woman with the intention of giving and receiving affection and regard, and it is another thing to marry a girl who takes the bitterly of falling in love with you, and who feels separated by your side from what you know all along that she was never loved, but merely made the instrument of an angry lover's revenge. Still, I must be just to Jane. I am sure he meant to make me very happy—to be generous, kind, and attentive, and perhaps, in the end, he would have liked me. Only, you know, you must. I know you must. As he is in your presence, so he is in private—a perfect gentleman. I, who meant to be so good, so devoted to him, never had a word to say, a look to my husband. I answer when he speaks, and that is all. I am cold as a statue when he is by. I feel it, I know it, and I can not help it: that Annie is ever between us, and she freezes me. I have never seen her; I do not know who she is, what she is like; but sometimes I lie awake at night and think, 'If he were to find them dead together, would he be very sorry; he could marry his Annie?'"

Poor little Jane! My heart ached for her, and it ached all the more that I fancied she was fond of her husband. "Jenny, Jenny," said I, with a sigh, "I will tell you why you can do nothing to win Mr. Forbes; it is because you love him."

She hid her face in her hands, and I saw her forehead, her neck even, turn crimson.

"Yes, that is it," she said at length, looking up and turning pale again. "I like him—I who reproached myself for not caring enough about him when we married—I who meant to try so hard to get that liking. I like him. He does not see it, he never will see it; but if he should I shall be the most wretched of women. It is the thought of my indifference that reconciles him to his fate; I know he trusts me, he would find it unendurable."

"How do you know that?" I asked, much startled.

"I can not tell you, but I know it. I nearly betrayed myself once, and I can not forget his look of uneasiness and alarm."

"Jane, you deceive your husband."

"No," she replied, quietly, "and you must not misunderstand me and wrong him. I am quiet, you know; well, I believe Mr. Forbes does took me partly for that. 'Here is a girl who will expect no devotion, no fondness, no nonsense,' he thought, 'nothing, at least, that I can not give her.' Suppose he finds out that I am not the woman he thought me, and that when I married I did expect to love and to be loved, will it be necessary to him to try and fulfill his part of the compact?"

Alas! that was true, and because it was true I heaved a deep sigh. At that moment the parlor-door opened and Arthur came in. At once he crept up to his young step-mother. She took him on her knee, and twining her arm round his neck she nestled on her bosom, and thence looked at me with a pale, pitiful little face that made me forgive him all his sins.

"Jane," I said, and I am not ashamed to add that my eyes were dim—"there is your hope and your link with the father."

Jane shook her head rather sadly.

"No link," she replied, "but, if possible, a cause of further division. When I came and found this poor sickly thing my heart yearned toward it, perhaps because it suffered like myself; perhaps," she added, with a fond blush, "because it was his. I called it, and it came. I caressed it, and it fell asleep in my arms. When it was sick I tended it; when it was peevish and fretful I bore with it. I bore with it; and thus, I suppose, it loved me. But, you see, it loves me too much. One who ought to be first is second now, and second he says. I am obeyed when another is not needed; I am sought when another is left that he resented that love, or that it bored him; but he could not return it.

I was beginning to walk about with the help of a stick, when I saw Mr. Forbes go off in his chaise one morning with Arthur.

"Please to tell Jane that I am taking the child—" he said to me.

On hearing this Arthur, who had sat quietly till then, uttered a scream of dismay, and called on his "mumsie." I saw Mr. Forbes bite his lip, but he drove away all the faster, and both father and child were out of sight in a few moments. Jane had heard the cry, and now came down rather scared. On hearing the explanation I gave her she turned very pale.

"Oh, why does he take him to Harting?" she cried, piteously, "my maid has just told me the small-pox is there. Oh, if one could only overtake him!"

That was out of the question, so I did my best to comfort Jane till the tears stood in her eyes as she still kept sighing:

"Oh! why did he take him?"

Why, indeed? The child came home bright and well, and his father seemed quite triumphant at having kept him half a day away from his step-mother.

"And he was not at all unhappy, Jane," he said, with marked emphasis.

All day the child continued well and merry, but next morning he felt sick, and by the time his father came home at night he was ill; he had the small-pox. I was told Mr. Forbes. He turned dreadfully pale; he had learned in the course of the day that the epidemic was at Harting. It was there the child had taken his child-ish ill; he had taken him to illness, perhaps to death, just to brave and tease his poor young wife! I knew all this passed in his mind, for the first words he uttered were:

"God forgive me!"

His next words was the question:

"Has Jane ever had it?"

"Never," I replied, gravely.

"Then she must not stay with him," he said, quickly; "she must not."

His went up; I followed him to the nursery. Jane was there bending over the little cot, with Arthur's hand in hers. Mr. Forbes went up to her; he was much agitated. He could scarcely speak.

"Jane," he said, without looking at the child, "you must not stay. I know you have never had this complaint—you must not stay."

"Would you say that if I were his mother?" she asked.

"You have no right to risk your life," he urged. "I have had it, so has your cousin." (I am dreadfully pock-marked, reader.) "We risk nothing, you risk much."

"What?" asked Jane, and my pale, sad-faced little cousin became for a while a glowing and almost a beautiful woman; "what is it I risk? Why? It is not so dear, Mr. Forbes. Disfigurement! What change for the worse would that make in my lot?"

Mr. Forbes said not a word.

"I have had that child's love," continued Jane, looking very forward the cot, "and nothing, nothing shall make me leave him!"

No more was said. Arthur moaned as he lay, and Jane sat on one side of him, and her husband on the other.

Three days they sat thus. Three days the little sufferer lingered. On the fourth, an angel lifted him and released him from his pain. A two present when he died. That poor, prevish little fellow had become so patient and so meek in his illness, that I, too, had begun to love him. My heart smote me when I saw his eyelids flutter strangely, and his right eye quiver, and his little face turn, and neither blotched nor altered—take the strange calmness of death. Jane wept silently. Mr. Forbes was fearless, and sat looking on him as though he were stone. At first he seemed incredulous, but at length he understood that it was all over. I do not think he saw me; if he did, he forgot me. He turned to his wife.

"Jane," he said.

She looked, and did not move.

"Jane, come to me."

She rose, and went and sat on the couch by his side. With a sudden moan, in which love, remorse, and pain seemed to mingle, he drew her toward him. He laid his head on that kind bosom where his child's head had so often rested. It had been the refuge of all little Arthur's troubles, and it now received the strong man's passion of grief. Jane flung her arms around her husband's neck and mingled her tears with his, and while they wept together the young and innocent dead slept on and smiled down by, with closed eyes, at that fair world, without sorrow, passion, or pain, which it had just entered.

I softly stole away, feeling that out of the saddest grief good may come. Long after this Jane said to me:

"Cousin William, my husband gave me his heart in that hour, and he has never taken it back again."

"And never will, little Jane; for if there be a fond-hearted wife you are that woman."

Jane had the small-pox; but her husband nursed her through it, and she recovered quickly, and was not at all disfigured. Happy Jane! I saw her the other day when I called at the Elms on my way to London. What a bright old house it looked, now that Jane was loved and happy! How proud Mr. Forbes seemed of his wife and of their only child—a beautiful boy very like him—and I say his name is Arthur? Well! Do you know, fond though she evidently was of him, I doubted if Jane loved this Arthur quite so much as she had loved the other one? I told her so.

"The first Arthur," she replied, "was the child of my sorrow; the second Arthur is the child of my happiness. Both could not be dear after the same fashion. Besides, the other Arthur loved me best, and this one prefers his father."

"And why?" I suggested; "what about her?"

"I neither know nor care," replied Jane, with superb indifference. "The dead Arthur makes me fool secure in the past, and with the living Arthur I can defy a dozen Annies."

Dear little Jane! She was just the same little goose as ever. It was like her to think that her hold on her husband depended on a dead or on a living child. Mr. Forbes knew better. In the fullness of his happiness he told me the whole story about "Annie" as he drove me to the station. Of course he did not tell me who "Annie" was; but he knew her again at a party, and he could not help saying:

"Cousin William, you can not imagine what I felt when I conquered those two wounds—my dear pretty Jane" (pretty Jane! oh, love, love!), "and that cold, shallow, frivolous woman! My darling felt me shudder as we left, and she was the first to grow cold. Cold! I was thinking—I might actually have married that woman!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

EVERY body should live on the sunny side of their house as much as possible, and so the new social rays to penetrate the rooms. Darkened parlors are fashionable evils. Pray, is it gloomy enough to be ushered into a tomb-like apartment, where one can scarcely grope his way to a seat, and to discover, when his eyes become accustomed to the dim light, that every chair and sofa has on its knee "duster," contemptuously consigned for traveling to some unknown land. But ladies must have their carpets kept bright and fresh, even if their cheeks are the paler for it! And so the shutters are closely closed, and the heavy curtains drawn. But for the sake of health and beauty, ladies, let this be done only in the first hours, if it must be done at all. Let the rooms where the family live be cheerful and sunny. No lady would expect her horse plants to grow tall, blooming blossoms, unless she placed them as a window where the sunshine could fall upon them. Then, how much more she expect her children to show fresh, rosy complexions, or to develop genial dispositions, unless they have light, sunny, airy rooms.

Whoever has the National Debt in charge reports that it was reduced in September last twenty-two million dollars.

It is reported that the renowned race-horse "Kentucky" has been sold by Messrs. Osgood & Travers to Mr. L. W. Jerome for the round sum of $40,000. The famous animal has won an imperishable name from his matchless speed and endurance. It is said that he was never defeated on the turf but once, and then he was in an utterly unfit condition to use his strength.

A short time since a young man, aged about 20 years, died in the Alms-house in Portland, Maine. She had been an inmate of the House for the last thirty-five years, and not quite six months ago took a child at that time. Having been disappointed in love in early life, she made a vow never to marry another word, and she religiously kept her vow till her tongue was paralyzed in death.

The Masonic Journal, in speaking of the Atlantic Telegraph and the difference in longitude between the two Continents, remarks that it is seven o'clock in the evening at New York when it is midnight at Paris. It then goes on to suppose that some great edifice in Paris, the Grand Opera House, for example, is to-day two hours to-morrow, and the event is immediately telegraphed to New York, dated: "Paris, a quarter before midnight." Any people living in New York may say in two hours, to make ample allowance for interruptions, which would be a little more quiet than the evening previous, so that a New York manager could appear on the stage, and, after the three customary bows, could thus express gratitude to his patrons, gentlemen, I am sorry to have to inform you that the Opera House was destroyed by fire three hours before after the present time. Our director has just transmitted to his Paris confrere his condolence on the disaster which is going to him."

Very curious statements sometimes appear in print. A Pittsfield journal says: "A man fell dead in this city last week, and on his person could not be found a single bill his wife was nearly extinct."

A foreign newspaper, in giving an account of Tonbon, remarks: "It is a large town, containing upward of sixty thousand inhabitants built entirely of brick."

A Pennsylvania paper reads as follows: "The cases are holding meetings in the north part of the State, and are being addressed by Governor R——— and General C———." It is to be supposed that an ex-bitcherist slipped out of the proper place in the arrangement.

A Western paper recently contained the strange announcement: "The grasshoppers have destroyed every green thing in Deer Lodge Valley, except the grass and weeds." The reader will be desirous whether "or" substituted for "of" in the last word, or a by phrase in the place of "and," would make the best sense.

A country newspaper states that on one end a meeting-house in that place the following notice was recently appeared: "Any body sticking bills against this church will be prosecuted according to law or any other manner."

An ingenious French arithmetician has calculated that the space which a young Parisian belle, who is fond of the sublimer exercise of dancing, traverses in the gay saloons of Paris amounts, in the course of one dancing season, to four hundred and thirty-four miles and a half. He has also examined that a French lady, fond of performing the functions of a tee-totum, would go round in a waltz as fast as many times as are the wheels of a steamboat revolve while running the distance between Dover and Calais.

Another novelty announced for the Great Exhibition is a new model of a guillotine, invented, it is said, by a compatriot of Count Bismarck. It works by steam, and is capable of cutting off six heads per minute—or eight, if great haste is required! It can be taken to pieces and put together again in ten minutes! The engine works the wheels, and the machine can steam to the place of execution, with the body up to the cemetery afterward. Really, if such a charming invention is to become popular in France, those not represented as being among the elite of society will be in a fix. The lower classes, the fast ladies of society, with her dress all tucked up to her knees, her hair all bundled up like as if she hadn't time to comb it for a week, and one of her grandmother's old caps in an awful crumpled condition on her head. Why, have, honey, when I was a gal, if any of the fellers come along when I had my clothes tucked up that way, and my head kivered with an old rag, why I would run for dear life and hide out of sight. Well, well, the gals them were innocent, unconsecrated critters: now they are what the French call "blasés."

We do not know who is the author of the following little poem, but we believe it will be read with many a tender remembrance by those whose bones have been made desolate by death; and may also reveal to the busy mother, who sometimes feels that the little ones make a great deal of work, what home would be without them:

No baby in the house, I know—
'Tis far too nice and clean.
No hope by morning fingers thrown
Upon the floor are seen:
No finger marks are left on the panes,
No scratches on the chairs:
No woodsy dirt on the floor,
Or marshaled off in pairs:
No little shoes to be darned,
All ragged at the toes:
No pile of mending to be done,
Made up of baby-clothes:
No little bodies to be soothed,
No little hands to fold:
No little faces to be washed,
No stories to be told:
No trundle-bed alone to be given,
No nicknames, "Love" and "Mouse,"
No little forms to be dressed for tea—
No baby in the house.

A curious story—with a moral—is told of a fair lady who was lately dining with a friend in Paris. The dinner had passed off pleasantly, when, on rising from the table, the fair and fascinating lady thought proper to flirt. She was immediately carried to the bed of the lady of the house, where she remained immovable. Her lacing was so tight as to compel to utter moan—everything was useless; she still remained immovable on the elegant bed surrounded by sighs and lace. The attendance grew impatient; even the mistress of the house grew weary of being employed for so long a time about the same person. At last she made her a little malicious, and, to spread a snare for the fair finisher, she simply said: "Let us cut what makes her ill! Her hair is too tight; it must be untied."

These words acted like magic. Forgetting every thing, by an involuntary movement the fair invalid put both her hands up to her head, to defend her false curls from the aggression which might reveal too much; and, following to come to herself, "Where am I?" said she, in a feeble voice.

"At my house," replied her friend; "that your carriage is here, and in five minutes you will be in your own."

Moral of the story: Pretended fainting requires real skill.

Readers of Charles Dickens's works will remember the account he has given of the way in which he came to adopt the name of "Boz," under which his earlier writings appeared. He says: "Boz was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, after the Vicar of Wakefield, which being facetiously pronounced through the nose, became Boses, which being shortened became Boz. 'Boz' was a very familiar houseword to me long before I was an author, so I came to adopt it." It is now pronounced by the younger brother, Augustus N. Dickens, recently died at Chicago, where he has resided for several years past. He came to the country many years ago, and settled at the West. He was for some time, but not very successfully, occupied in literature, as are many of his relatives. In 1860 he was appointed to a position in the Land Department of the Illinois Central Railroad, which he retained until his death. He was a man of remarkably cheerful and kind-hearted disposition, strikingly resembled in personal appearance his famous brother Charles, and shared to some extent his genial humor.

I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and, in joining the rebellion, has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government. We say to the most honest and industrious foreigner who comes from England or Germany to dwell among us, and to add to the wealth of our country, 'Before you can be a citizen you must stay here for five years.' If we are so cautious about foreigners, who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor who, although born and reared among us, has raised a parricidal hand against the Government which always protected him? DEEDS, NOT WORDS.

Nor forever on thy knees, man,
Would Jehovah have thee found;
There are griefs Jehovah sees, man;
There are burdens thou canst ease, man;
Look around!

Work is prayer, if done for God, man;
Prayer which God, delighted, hears.
See, beside you upturned sod, man,
One bowed 'neath affliction's rod, man;
Dry her tears.

Not long prayers, but earnest zeal, man,
This is what is wanted now;
Put thy shoulder to the wheel, man;
Bread unto the famished deal, man,
Bring, then, thou.

Not high-sounding words of praise, man,
Does God want 'mouth some grand dome;
But that thou the fallen raise, man;
Bring the poor from life's highways, man;
By kind deeds.

Deeds are powerful; mere words weak, man,
Battering at heaven's closed door:
Let thy love to actions speak, man,
Wipe the tear from Sorrow's cheek, man,
Clothe the poor.

Be it thine life's cares to smother,
And in brighten eyes now dim,
Kind deeds done to one another,
God accepts as done, my brother,
Unto Him.

HIS YOUNG LORDSHIP.

A Story for Great and Little People.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENT."

It was a pat of butter—only a pat of butter—a small, silly thing, and yet it made me feel, as the children say, "like to cry." For I knew the spot it came from—a lowly nook in a lowly land. I could picture the narrow valley, so rich and green, over which the huge grey granite mountains watched, frowning or smiling, but still watching. His faithful eyes never left their charge, collecting the sunshine, gathering the rain, and sending both down alternately upon the fertile tract below. I could summon up the "pasture green," not like English meadows, hedged and dotted, but divided only by stones and rocky copses, among which grew innumerable ferns and accidental clumps of heather and white, white here and there in patches, where not long ago pure butter-wort, with its flat leaves and tall-stemmed blue flowers; the white tufts of cotton-grass; the aromatic bog myrtle. Nay, as I looked at my pat of butter I could almost see the cows that produced it—small, shaggy, active Highland beasts, or the dainty little Ayrshire breed, the prettiest of cattle, moving slowly and peacefully in quiet contentment under the shadow of these same mountains which—whom, I was nearly writing, they feed as they feed the people—by one who knows none, and once loving, loves forever.

"Yes," said Mrs. Burns, whom I had neter can by the good Scotch name of Mrs. Burns, "it is real Scotch butter: we don't get any thing here but what is. I'll send to you when—" naming the place, to which I mean to give an imaginary name, and call it the Laighlands.

For upon it, and the butter, hangs a story which we immediately set to tell me: a story which was simply as that of Jeanie Deans—of which, while she related it, we were both strangely reminded. I asked her now to tell it here, just plainly as it was, with no elaborations or exaggerations—for indeed it required none; only changing the names and the places, so that while the fruit remained—the eternal truth, which is the real life and nutriment of fiction—the bare outside facts may be quite unrecognizable by the general public. And I wish a good give to the written tale my little tale the simple graphic power with which it was unconsciously told.

"Yes," said Mrs. Burns, looking me through with her clear, kind eyes, "I must tell you all about that butter, and how we got it from such a distance. You know the Laighlands? Isn't it a bonnie place? Such a sweet, quiet, out-of-the-way farm. We lived there a while a-married—We had come to the neighborhood, and did not know where to get lodgings; the whole countryside was full; and they took us in at last, Jamie Leask, eight ill—pays, and me, and our six; and we lived there a happy while. I was like to leave them again."

It was not nearly so long since I had seen the farm myself, and though I was only there, at that particular farm-house, for one day, I could still remember it, with the particularity real and well-stocked for that part of Scotland, where the lazy Highland nature has not yet arrived at the difficult science of business life, and among the common people life implies mere living, without any attempt to adorn the life with even the beauty of a cottage flower-border, or the small luxury of a dozen gooseberry bushes, and a row of beans or peas. Nevertheless, I could especially call to mind the house, for it had a capital garden, and an upland orchard behind it. Its loftiness was one of those picturesqueness, which is a great deal to say for dwellings of as size and character in the Highlands of Scotland.

"Yes," continued Mrs. Burns (I will go straight on with the story, as the conversation of two old women, which indeed consisted mercly of a few questions), "we lived there six weeks, and during the whole time got to have quite an affection for our landlord and his wife. They were much simple people, and no housekeeping pairfuls. Of course in country lodgings, where the people can only make hay while the sun shines, and in her about two months of the year, they are almost expects to be cheated, or at least made the most o as many pennies as they could slick and shave out themselves. For instance, we had the run of the garden, and you see imagine what a rapid my sit chin! We would open up the gooseberry bushes, and besides, we had an unlimited quantity of vegetables. But when, after the first week's all, I looked over what was put down in the bill, there was nothing at all! 'Oh,' said the gudeman, a tall, handsome Highland woman, much younger than her husband, and speaking English with a quaint, slow purity of accent that you often find among those who have to learn it like a foreign language—'Oh, I hope you'll use your freedom with the garden—we'd never ask ye to pay. But when I remonstrated—for I don't like that Celtic fashion of being too proud to receive honest payment, and yet expecting a ways as equivalent in kind—Mrs. Kennedy (that is her Scotch) only kindly assented, with a sort of dignified acquiescence that had a touch of regal reconcile in it, suggesting I would put my own price on the things we took, for she nearly did not know what they were worth, which doubtless was the truth, for you are aware how little actual coin is current in that district, and how people there often live half a lifetime without ever having a town errand, or the inside of a moderate-sized shop.

"This woman, Mrs. Kennedy, was a case in point. She was about forty, her husband being somewhat over sixty; yet neither of them had ever crossed the sea more than once from Iona, which had been rented by Kennedy, and his father before him, for the best part of a century, from the Laighland landlord or his place parts.

"And the landlordly kens us well,' said the gudewife to me one day, when my children had been describing a grand-looking gentleman whom they met riding over the hillside. 'He's a fine man, and a gude friend to us. Many's the day I has seen him stand and crack wi' the auld gudeman. Gude Kennedy's father, as I'll be never means Kennedy himself but he'll stop and talk the hours and differ as much as twenty. Ay, a fine man—his landlordship—and a gude landlord; he kens a' that's done on the property. Though I'll be ay but he might has ower many tenants than oursels; for my man and his father before him has lived at the Laighlands, and held their leases, every one, for—I'll no' serestly-five years.'

"I remember that little incident," continued Mrs. Burns, "because I remember the woman's face as she spoke—full of that honorable pride which is as justifiable in a farmer as in a lord—and, also, because circumstances brought it to my mind afterward.

"Well, we staid there the Laighlands all summer. It was a glorious summer to my young folks—and a sorrowful day when we left the place. We had to start about four in the morning, in Kennedy's cart, which had been our sole link with the civilized world, and to which he had consented to go daily, for this absolutely refusing payment to the last—all provisions which the farm could not supply, and for which we gave ourselves silies—letters, newspapers, linen-drapery, etc., which he brought from the town and delivered. He brought them from the nearest town, of course, but what flattered itself was a town, several miles off. We had given him a deal of trouble, and now he had taken on him the final trouble of all, by bestowing endless pains on the arrangement of seats and stowage for us and our boxes, a rough jolting cart a little comfortable for me and the children. They cried at the parting, poor bairns, the pretty place where they had been so happy, and the good folk who had been so kind to them; and I, who had been the most phlegmatic hitherto to cry too, when Mrs. Kennedy, who had been rather invisible of late—she had been gathering eggs, I suppose, or making cheese at the Laighlands—appeared, week and white-looking as she was, in the cool dawn of the morning, and gave me a basket neatly packed with all sorts of good things —eatables and drinkables—for the journey, and on their account also. 'Well no forget the weans.'

"And it was a very long time before the weans forgot her or the Laighlands. Many months passed before I had to go over every bit of our slittne time there—from the day I left my native country, a child in the steerage, to my tidy parlor, in the clean bedrooms, full of furniture that looked as if it had been bought the last century by a grandfather, to the furnishing the final day when old Kennedy, he was quite an old man, though hale and hearty, and I, we had to start off in a hurry, for the waves were running high—and carried the children through them on his shoulders, for there was no pier, and the steamer that was to bear us far away—to horrid London, to streets, and squares, and work, and school, and care and worry and fret, and the society of fine ladies, whose memories were fainter than they cared to confess. I had written to them, and received letters, but be could speak but little English; the boys answering him in their words and tongue, and Mrs. Kennedy could remember ever so long, till Gaelic was rubbed out of her head by English, and she could only write to me a mother can not help having toward any one who has been kind to her children. And I was not much of a store-clopard the basket Mrs. Kennedy had filled for the bairns on their voyage. And every New Year, for many years, we received a letter from one or both of the Kennedys, hoping every summer that we should manage to go back to the Laighlands. But we never did; and in process of time our connection with the place became only a pleasant memory likewise: in this busy London life it is so easy to forget.

"It was last New Year, or possibly a few days after then, that I was sitting alone in my little back room"—(which was a very nice one, for Mrs. Burns's former position as nurse-maid in a large wholesale house in one of the best streets in London)—"I was sewing by myself, and the young folks were down in the kitchen-school-room. It was one of those terribly cold bleak days that we had last winter, the wind howling in the chimney, and the rain pouring down in a way to fill, for it was too cold almost to snow. I was sitting with the door ajar, for the fire-light and the feeling of intense thankfulness which I always have in such weather, that I have a good home over my head and all my dear ones about me, when a message came that some one below wanted to speak to me.

"It was a lad, a boy of the lowest appearance and class in our house, and generally prove to be applicants for employment, or for charity, whom we always relieved; a woman with a little girl, and she would not send up her name, but insisted upon speaking to me.

"I thought it was one of the former genteel, poor, but don beggars, and you know what London begging is, and how often it is a cloak for worse things. I myself once has to harden one's heart'—(a process which, I am afraid, Mrs. Burns has not yet had to undergo to be sudden or easy). "Of course, I could not refuse to see the person; but I went down to her, looking, I dare say, as hard as a stone.

"She was a tall, thin woman, remarkably tall for a woman, and dressed in widow's weeds, with a large sailing black shawl, no thicker than yours to-day, though it was bitterly cold, drawn over her head and shoulders still. I looked in her face, which was sharp-featured, worn, and elderly, but I could not remember ever having seen it before. So I asked her what she wanted. very coldly I suppose, for she drew back at once to-ward the dining-room door.

"'It'll no mind me. Pin trudling ye; so I'll just step down again.'

"It was a Scotch voice and a Scotch manner: the air of quiet independence that, I am glad to say, even the poorest of us notice and respect. The Scotch don't beg like your London beggars. So, o course, I asked her to come back and tell me her business.

"'Do you no ken? Eh, Mrs. Burns! I must be sair changed, and what sort of a welcome she got—she and her daughter, for the little girls that hung by her gown, and peered from behind her with shy, dark Gaelic eyes, must be here—possibly the baby that was born while we were there.

"'Ay, so she was. She's the youngest; and I could see how it was behind: Donald, the eldest, and joyous at once on to this awful London. Oh, it is an awful place, Mrs. Burns, for a young soul to come into, and the gudeman and a' the bairns!' added she, with the instinctive tact and courtesy which one sees almost universally among Highland people, and which we have always noticed so much in the Kennedys. Though a farmer's wife, her manners were as good as many a lady born. But she looked so ill, so depressed, so actually weighed down with care, that I shrank from asking her the especial trouble which had brought her hither. By-and-by she poured it out.

"'No, the gudeman's no dead, Mrs. Burns, though sometimes he almost wishes he were. He has got no-tice to quit the Laighlands. Just think! the Laighlands! Where he was born, and his father before him, and where he has paid his rent—never behind a day—for fifty year. Is not that hard?'

"It was hard. We folk who live in streets and houses all just like one another can scarcely recognize how hard. Habitation and property went on to expiain, and which I myself knew well, in that thinly-populated district are sometimes acres. turning out, with small prospect of finding another home. The farms were few enough, and there was a law by tenants who had held them for generations. A notice to quit meant not merely a flitting but a come up-rooting. No wonder the poor woman's face was as speak of some heavy calamity.

"'But you have a good man,' said I. 'Did you not appeal to him?'

"Mrs Kennedy shook her head. 'I'm no sayin-aught against the factor, but he's my lord's servant, and they say my lord wants money, and they're willing to fet the rents. He has already had let my man keep the Laighlands a bit while. I'll no be lang—he's always severely true to his word, his heart.'

"I asked her why she did not write to the young lord for the old one, for I knew the latter, though a rarely just middle age when he died, had, I knew, been dead a year or more.

"'We did write at first. His young lordship—do you ken him, Mrs. Burns?'

"That was not likely; but I had heard about him—a promising lad in his teens, left under master of one of the best Highland estates. He was too young for people to know much good about him—but nobody knew any harm: he was a college youth, frank and lively, going to all the pleasures of his age and rank —not much of a student, but that could hardly be expected—he had plenty of time afterwards a year. Still, as I told Mrs. Kennedy, a young man scarcely twenty, in any rank of society, and in the circumstances, and in his rank great people often do little people a deal of harm without in the least intending it.

"'Did your young lordship never said—the lawyer I went to in Edinburgh, yesterday.'

"Yesterday! Mrs. Kennedy repeated.

"'Ay, ma'am, though it seems a year sleepyse. The Laighlands were let to a new tenant, and we must flit-tem, so I just thought I would go up to Edinburgh myself, and see Mr. Campbell, a friend o' mine that's a writer there, and—and—' Mrs. Kennedy's.

"If was you I would gang up to London and speak wi' his young lordship himself.' That was yesterday, and as I said, there seems a day to-lon—in a week's time the notice was to quit from the Laighlands was due, and we would be turned out. So I wrote to my husband frae Mr. Campbell's office, I put myse,' in the train—he and the bairns will neither come and bee lame nor leave her in Edinburgh: and we traveled a' that night and the morning, and here we were.

"Just as they were—I mean the clothes, and also a terrible cold night as it had been! No wonder they looked as they did, and that my servant had made such a mistake in admitting them into the kitchen in-lie. Very much surprised she must looked when I rang the bell and desired her to bring the little girl and make her comfortable in my children's nursery; and bring the breakfast down for my friend and myself, who had come all the way from Scotland last night.

"Mrs. Kennedy said nothing, nor resisted in the least; she was completely worn out. She sat by the fire with her hands on her lap, and her eyes looking straight before her, considering the things around her, as if she had been familiar with them all her life. And when at last she got a little strengthened by warmth and food, she began to tell me her story, which she did so with a composure and quiet dignity that made it impressive and touching in the extreme. How the Jeanie Deans's nature, fearless, self-reliant, yet absolutely truthful, unconventional, is not exceptional, but lies dormant in many and many a Scotchwoman, ready to appear at once when circumstances require it, as in this case it did. I suppose, can hardly realize what such a burden and journey to London must have appeared to the poor woman, who had never been to the Antipodes.

"'But you came, and safe?' I asked her.

"'Maybe,' she answered, faintly smiling. 'But somebody maun do it, ye ken, and there was naebody but me.' In the circumstances the woman was heroic at all.

"Poor body! only imagine her, dropped in the gloomy winter morning at the terminus in Euston Square, and requesting a cabman to take her and her go to in all London, and with her Scotch directness of purpose she went right to it—his young lordship's lodgings, which, of course, remained in—town.

"It was partially closed, as most great houses are in the London season, and the servants were scarce. 'The London folk are awfu' late of rising,' and unwilling to disturb the family, sat down on the lowest stone step with her little girl beside her. There she waited, pinched with cold—but she was now accustomed to cold—until there appeared signs of life in the lower house within. By-and-by came a brawny sooperg young man, to whom Mrs. Kennedy told her tale. She had no fear of disturbing his lordship's slumbers, but he poked his fetters in at a slit in the door—and still she was not spoken to. Mrs. Kennedy took off her age, and rang the bell likewise, and begged the footman who opened it to tell his master that a woman from some all the way, from Scotland to speak to him, and that she was not to be answered on private business, as soon as he rose?

"But the footman only laughed, and called another gentleman who passed too, and they told her it was a capital story, but that she didn't go away they would call the police-man. 'Police!' said she, 'I didna know what the young man meant,' added Mrs. Kennedy, 'but I left them, and went back to the little girl, for it was only doing his duty; that his young lordship would mind me well, I was Mistress Kennedy of the Laighlands, and Mr. Kirk-Hill in Mrs. Burns?' and she looked at me with a grieved simplicity, 'he had never been in a London house before.

"There must have been some uncomfortable passages between the young lord and Mrs. Kennedy, with her natural dignified reticence, which did not like even to own that she had been insulted, Mrs Kennedy avoided particularizing them. Besides, the feudal reverence in which the young lord was held every where on the estate was such that under the shadow o. it even his domestics were exempt from blame. I could only gu her that she was turning to quit the house, when up there came a young man, or, as Mrs. Kennedy pointedly put it, a young gentleman.

"He entered as if he owned the property, as that she might have taken him for her landlord, only it had been plainly seen that the young nobleman was absent from home; 'and,' reasoned she, in her simplicity, 'his lordship must be the first to greet a gentleman to hold his servants tell a lee about himsel.' But the new-comer was of considerable importance in the establishment, for he perceived the confusion in the hall he asked impatiently what it was all about. He was informed by Mrs. Kennedy's name, and where she came from.

"'He was a Scotsman—I'm gey sure he was a Scotsman,' she said, looking at me as if he was a kindly-natured young gentleman, and evidently had some good position in the establishment, for when he was once listened to her answers the servants ceased 'incertin' him,' and were quite respectful. At length he ordered her to walk into his 'study,' a little room leading off the hall, and there told her who he was.

"Mrs. Burns gave me the gentleman's name and position in the young lord's household; but neither as of consequence to my story. It was sufficient that he may take the reward of one of those small kindnesses which exist so little and so rare as much, and recognize himself.

"He placed the weary woman in his own armchair, and shut the study-door. Then, before he allowed her to speak another word, he opened a cupboard and took out a large bottle of wine and a log of brandy, which he put a little like into her and the child—the good bairn, who had been daughter, sister, and school silent and sleepy and hungry, but had never once shed a tear. Then he bade Mrs Kennedy tell him her whole case from beginning to end.

"It was very simple, and he, of course, must have seen it contained no grounds for complaint more than the poor woman herself saw it. It was the common story of a young lord, who, with the whole world before him, set about his task and duties. Probably nobody was to blame, or the whole, or else it was a matter of mere carelessness. In his absence the young nobleman's agent, whose business about it, and never would, unless some one came to call him, 'You can see him,' he said Mr., 'the really is not here, but you might write to him.' But he was not left unassisted. He had a friend who was not unbeautiful Highland face—her companion and sister, Miss Kennedy, to whom the whole she had before her. So, after a little consideration, he agreed with the woman's persons, and proceeded to give the best chance. But it could only be attained by her going to the college where the young lord then was; and which, to avoid all recognition, I will call St. Cuthbert's Hall, Oxbridge. Would she do this? Could she do it? For if it was a journey from Surrey from London, and it would cost a good deal more money. But the woman was not one to be hopelessly reckoned her purse. It fell short by at least twenty shillings.

"This was a hard discovery, but she kept it to her self. She had never borrowed a halfpenny in her life and would not begin now. Silence was better a stra gee. The only thought that occurred to her was to call something to her husband to remember to send it; but how to set about it she did not know. And then, in answer to the young gentleman's question, had she any friends in London? she remembered Mrs. Burns.

"She did not know, or if she ever did know, had forgotten, our London address, and our name was a common one enough. The literary gentleman sat and took down and diligently searched in, scarcely helped her at all; till at length she recollected my husband's profession from the somewhat peculiar Christian. 'That's him!' she cried, and found to her comfort that Mr. —— was known, at least by reputation, to the young Scotsman in London knew my husband. So, without more ado, he left the room, and went down to one of the gentlemen, put herself into a cab by his advice, and drove to our door.

"Here, however, for the absolutely refused to go to bed or to sleep, I went in to consult with my husband. He was out, but I knew his habits from the story I had heard, by the odd remembrances which the sight of Mrs. Kennedy and the children's things in general, that I could not speak a word, but fainy began to 'greet.' He, too, was in no small degree affected by what he had to tell him, for he knew as much that he had to take refuge in the study of Brodsham, and clergyman of the Church of England.

"We found the only available one now would take Mrs. Kennedy and the children, and without delay—an impossible time to see a young undergraduate. So we persuaded her with great difficulty, for it seems not to be like the Scotch to accept hospitality, and accept our house, she and Jessie, and take the earliest morning train which was at hand. To this she consented, seeing, with her clear good sense, that nothing better could be done, and was withal greatly comforted by perceiving how happy Jessie was with our children.

"The children—or rather the young people—were in great excitement all day. It was such a reminiscence—in a humble way, of course—as Jessie's was a remarkable person, and Jessie (who being left behind in the Laighlands, was at a boarding-school) and then being taken to the Zoological Gardens, found consolation in a ride on the big elephant was such a great sort of thing to happen. Besides, Jessie, the child of a curious Highland grace and Highland intelligence, was a bit village to another order of child, for when we all thronged round her, eager to learn how she had fared in fact, greatly over every one of her story.

"It was told in her face. Never was there such a face. I wish his young lordship could have seen it.

"Understand, I don't mean unwarrantably to blame the young nobleman. He was but a boy—as wise as boys are; and upon him had fallen, much, before his time, the solemn responsibility of property. I do not suppose he meant any harm, or had the slightest idea he was doing an unkindness. Only he did it.

"When Mrs. Kennedy and Jessie arrived at about nine in the morning, she was told that his lordship had not been out late, in fact, he had not gone to bed. This she valet informed her confidentiany; adding, as he seemed to feel a kind young man, and one who knew Scotch property, and even thought he remembered the farm at the Laighlands, that as soon as his master rose he would tell him. There was a woman waiting, who had come all the way from Scotland to see him.

"She did wait—hour after hour—wandering, often by about the college gardens and quadrangles—then going into the town for a little food—then walking hurriedly back again, led by chance she should miss the summons, and yet trembling to be forgotten and overlooked, until nearly three in the afternoon. Then, in despair appointed to see her, she sent and told him she would wait at breakfast; some friends were breakfasting with him; he could not possibly be disturbed.

"Nevertheless, she was left waiting in a message, importing that she might see him after breakfast.

she would not trouble his lordship longer. He surely must remember the Laighlands; he had ridden there many a time on his little pony. He sent out word last he did remember the Laighlands, and that though he could not see her now, he would see her on Monday following, at his house in London.

"Mrs. Kennedy knew that Monday would be too late. If she could not leave London on the Saturday evening, she would not reach home in time to prevent the stories from taking effect, and the ejection being accomplished. She urged this upon the valet, who was really kind, and he, as was during Monday, went to go in and speak to his master a second time. Then one of the gentlemen—a merry-looking gentleman they seemed a merry set, Mrs. Kennedy thought, for she heard their shouts of laughter through the doors—came out and spoke to her, quite civilly, but with a cooling entertainment at the idea of her thinking it was possible she could see his lordship. But, nevertheless, he told her to make her mind easy, for that a telegram should be sent to the factor to-night, and an ejection until he heard further.

"This Mrs. Kennedy was forced to be content with, but she left Oxbridge with a very heavy heart.

"She staid with us until the appointed Monday, and we took her about and showed her and directed the wonders of London, and diverted her mind as well as we could from the painful suspense under which she was laboring. She tried to enjoy herself—she was touchingly grateful. But all the heavy sense of what was hanging over her—hanging upon half a dozen words from a youth's careless lips—seemed to cloud over every thing. I never spent a more restless and comfortless Sunday than the one before that Monday. In thinking and wondering what would be the end of it, her application: a result so such slight moment to the young gentleman, was a breathless sequence to the old farmer and his family.

"I hope I'm no wicked, Mrs. Burns,' said the poor woman, pausing in her pitifully on coming home from church—we had taken her to hear our own dear minister, though he was Free Kirk and she Auld Kirk—'I hope I'm no wicked, but I'm very grateful to Providence Almighty that I'm not to be called to be wicked or unthankful'—and I likit the look o' him, and his sweet voice and kind eyen—but I didna hear one half o' the minister's sermon.'

"Neither did I, so I could say nothing. It was no use to begin comforting to Mrs. Kennedy's mind the relations between class and class, and the respective duties that each owes to the other. It is just what I practise in my own household, that what seems a very small thing to me may be a very great one to my servant; and that I discovers all who are in the habit naturally to take the utmost pains to look at every question from the point of view of the upper class.

"Eleven in the forenoon was the hour fixed for the interview. We dressed Mrs. Kennedy for it with great care, and helped her out with some few things; for she had hardly any clothes with her; and we thought it advisable in the lordship's tenant of fifty years' standing, and representing a tenantry of fifty years previous to the second agent having been seen, to be able as possible. To this end, it being a fearfully wet morning, we sent off in a decent cab, which no husband gave orders should wait for her at the corner of the square.

"This cab—we, too, waited; in a suspense that for my young people was very exciting, and to me actually painful. We had given her a full hour, though I expected a much longer absence, for I thought she would be a long time hinting; people whose time is little value never reckon the values of time to others. So if we were back by one I should have been well pleased. But before the clock struck twelve the cab drew up to the door, and Mrs. Kennedy stood in the hall. The moment I saw her face I knew that I was lost.

"'Come in,' I said, and drew her into the study, and shut the door to keep the children out a while. 'Come in and sit down.'

"She sat down and then lifted up to me the forlornest face! 'Ye're vera kind, ma'am; I'll tell the gudeman ye've been wonderful kind. My puir gudeman!—and he past seventy year!—It's a sinful hard for him.'

"I took her hand—poor soul! and then she shed one or two tears, not more, and rose.

"'I maun go home as soon as I can, Mrs. Burns, to look after the auld man.'

"Then there is no chance? What did his lordship say to you?'

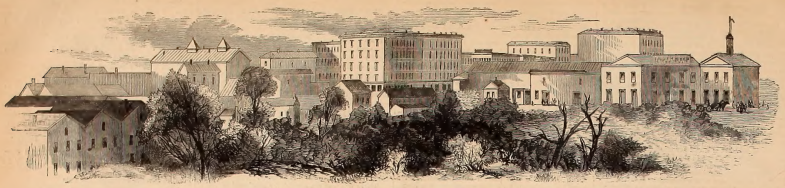
"'Nothing. He went aff to Paris yesterday.'

"'And did he leave no letter—no message?'

"'Ne'er a word. He's clean forgot me. Young Sir has had memories. Maybe he minded no harm.'

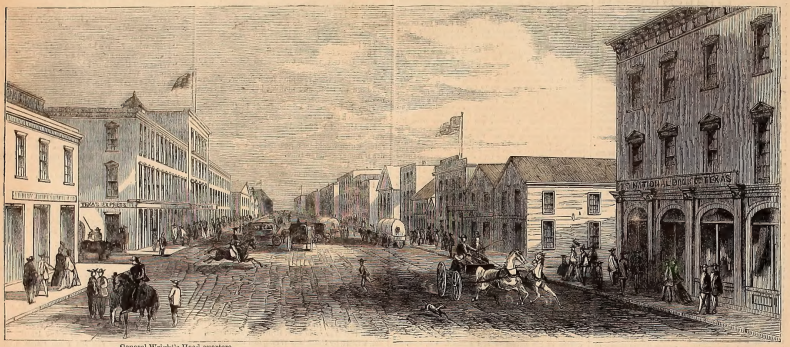
"This was all she said. Not a word of blame or reproach or bitterness. The instinctive feeling of fondest respect in which she and hers brought up, up to them as a higher order, still sealed her tongue even then. Nor did I—indignant as I was—desire to be more severe upon the case than he deserved. I only wished that he, who had such an infinite power of good in his hands—such an unlimited power of—exercising the keenest joy in life—making people happy—could have seen the misery on this poor old face thrown away—of her returning journey to—to the bitter tidings of her husband, about whom she seemed to grieve far more than for herself.

"'If his lordship would but let us stop at the Laighlands while the auld man lived,' she said, 'we wad hae paid a better rent—we telt the factor that—and he wad hae had auld Kennedy wad hae done his best wi' the new-fanged ways, though he hates them sair—and it would be but for more than ten years at most, and what's ten years to his young lordship, that will scarce be a man when my auld man has left the farm?—Ochone—Ochone!' And she began rocking herself with a low moan, and talking to Gisle to console her. I had run in myself with several of my children. I took them aid away, and left the child and mother together.



"There was no more to be done. To appy to Mr. ——, who had given a kind, was also useless: he had told her he was only in London for two days. Besides, he could not interfere openly in her behalf, while, from his position in the household, he had nothing whatever to do. The only thing was to accept passively the decree of fate, and trust to the chance that the telegram sent had stopped present proceedings at the Laighlands. While in the morning I had fervently night take the course which had at first been intended of addressing his lordship by letter.

"We were not here, putting the case in her name, but in as strong terms as we could, and my husband took care that it should be forwarded in such a mode as that it was almost impossible his lordship should not receive it. This done, we sent the poor woman away by the night-train to Scotland—for she was most eager to be gone—making her and Jessie as comfortable as we could, earnestly hoping, and with perhaps an allowable hypocrisy trying hard to persuade her, that after all we might earn out best not to be much feared. We assured her—and ourselves in doing so—that the telegram would make all safe for a few days to come; and in the mean time her letter—that momentous letter, the invention and indicting of which had cost us, as well as herself, such a world of pains—might, nay, must, not only appeal to the young landlord's sense of justice, but touch his heart, even in the midst of his Paris enjoyments; so that he would immediately send back word, confirming the Laighlands Farm to poor old Kennedy for his lifetime. My young folk, full of youth's romance and inherent belief in goodness, felt quite sure it would be so; nay, I think the younger ones actually imagined his lordship would do it in a manner of noble and generous self-sacrifice—in driving to the farm in a coach and six, personally to announce to the old man that his lease for a year and a time he happened to be on his property.



"I myself was not of—poor boy!—with many good wishes on both sides: husband or her very often for a week or so, and then, hearing no more, we concluded it was well over. We had other matters to be involved in, and the subject dropped out on our memories.

"It was only a few months ago that I was in the letre here, and it is dated 11th March—that my husband got the following letter, which I transcribe at once, as the old man's hand, but carefully composed and spelled, as became one of the well-educated peasantry of the North; one, who though used to write, but little could his forefathers for more generations than many a member of a magistracy could.

"'DEAR SIR,—I beg to return you my sincerest thanks for your unremitting kindness to my wife and daughter when Sir Landon's letter to Jessie came and told us, the whole family were delighted to hear of such kindness being shown to them. Before Mrs. Kennedy came home, a friend put a paper made out in our favor before his lordship, and he signed it himself. The friend was home in the boat along with Mrs. Kennedy, and I got the paper from him as soon as I went. In the morning to call upon the factor and see if he had got the telegram from his lordship, but I could not see him, and I asked his clerk if he knew it he had been, and he said he had had a word about it. I told him the telegram was certainly sent, for that Mrs. Kennedy saw the valet put it into the letter-box at Oxbridge with it. The officers came to the farm, but I told them to wait a little, because I had received afterward that the telegram had been misdirected, and as it would be sent on to Paris, it would be best for me to call on the factor. We have got no answer from his lordship, but I am sure he would not leave London without seeing his lordship, and I am sure he would not leave London without seeing his lordship, and I am sure he would not leave London without seeing his lordship, and FANEUIL HALL.

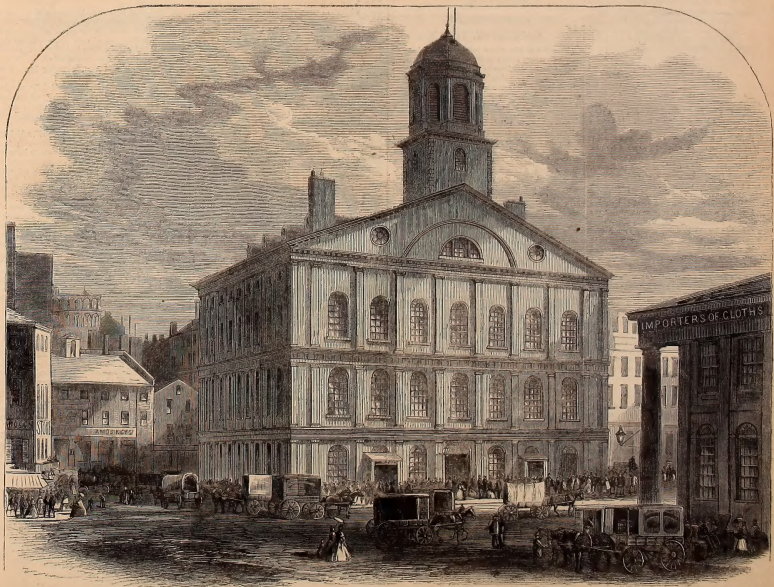
FANEUIL HALL has been denominated "the Cradle of American Liberty," having been the popular gathering-place of the Sons of Liberty during the incipient stages of the Revolution. It was erected in 1742, at the sole expense of PETER FANEUIL, Esq., of Boston, and by him generously given to the town—the basement for a market, with a spacious and beautiful hall above for public meetings. It was burned in 1761, nothing but the brick walls remaining; but the edifice was immediately rebuilt. It was enlarged in 1805, by the addition of another story and an increase of forty feet in its width. The hall is about eighty feet square, and contains some fine paintings of distinguished men. The original vane, copied from that of the London Royal Exchange, still turns upon the pinnacle: the vane is in the form of a huge grasshopper. In 1776 Faneuil Hall was converted into a theatre by the British. When the news reached Boston of the passage by the British Parliament of the Boston Port Bill (providing for the removal of customs, courts of justice, and government officers of every kind from Boston to Salem, and for the discontinuance of landing, discharging, and shipping of wares and merchandise at Boston), a town meeting was held in Faneuil Hall, at which SAMUEL ADAMS presided. The meeting voted to stop all importation from or exportation to "Great Britain and every part of the East Indies;" and with this declaration in his hand PAUL REVERE took his celebrated ride from Boston to New York, inflaming the country as he went along.

It was in Faneuil Hall that THEODORE PARKER and WENDELL PHILLIPS aroused the citizens of Boston to resistance against the Fugitive Slave Bill in the case of the slave BURNS.

COUNT BISMARCK.



KARL OTTO VON BISMARCK auf Schönhausen, the bold and dextrous Minister who has conquered Germany for Prussia, was born at Brandenburg, in 1813, the year of that great uprising of the German nation against the empire of NAPOLEON I.,

COUNT BISMARCK, PRIME MINISTER TO THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

from which may be dated the movement in favor of national unity among the different populations of the German race. It has been the fortunate achievement of Count BISMARCK in Germany, as of Count CAVOUR in Italy, to invent the political emergency which has enabled the progressive tendencies of the divided nation to rally around one of its principal States, on the occasion of a great military victory won over the rival Power, which had long been viewed as the representative of illiberal and anti-national interests. The kingdom of Prussia has by this means gained the same kind of supremacy in Germany which devolved seven years ago in Italy upon the kingdom of Sardinia—or rather, as it should have been styled, of Piedmont. The parallel, however, between the conduct of the German and of the Italian statesman can not be pursued further by an examination into their dealings with the internal affairs, and especially with the constitutional liberties and franchises, of the State which each Minister respectively ruled. For while CAVOUR applied himself fairly and honestly to the working out of parliamentary government, on the English model, in order to win the attachment of the other populations of Italy to the Piedmontese monarchy by the attractive example of freedom, BISMARCK, on the contrary, persisted in outraging and corrupting the Prussian representative constitution till he had almost made the King an absolute despot, prepared to cope on equal terms with the Austrian military empire.

In the earlier part of his career Herr von BISMARCK does not appear to have shown any promise of future distinction. He was educated successively at the Universities of Göttingen, Greifswalde, and Berlin, where he is said to have been addicted beyond measure to the boisterous pleasures of the German Burschen, and to have displayed no great proficiency in his studies. It is even asserted that he failed to pass the requisite examination for entering the civil service, and was admitted by special favor. His father was a country squire of noble birth and moderate estate; but more than one member of his family had held high office, and OTTO VON BISMARCK was not without the aid of influential patrons. Nevertheless, he had obtained no higher promotion than the post of Superintendent of Dykes in the Altmark up to the time of his election, in 1847, as a member of the Prussian Diet, having previously had a seat in the Provincial Assembly of that part of the kingdom where he dwelt. He was immediately noticed as one of the most vehement and even insolent champions of the Junker or Tory party, as he ostentatiously manifested his contempt for the principles of constitutional government, ridiculed the practice of parliamentary legislation, denied that the Rule of Prussia was bound to grant those franchises which had been solemnly promised at the time of the war against NAPOLEON, and declared that the Royal prerogative was derived, not from the consent of the people, but from the grace of God, and was practically unlimited save by the voluntary concession of the Royal bounty.

These opinions were not the extravagant conceits of a youth, but have been asserted by VON BISMARCK on all occasions since he began to take a conspicuous place in public life, which was in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He has repeatedly denounced the freedom of the press, and the spread of intelligence among the working-classes; he has gone so far as to express a wish that the large manufacturing and commercial towns could be destroyed, so that a purely rural population might subsist solely by the produce of an absolute crown. These and similar utterances of rampant Tyrism, such as can scarcely be matched by any instance in this history of St. Bartholomew, rendered HERR VON BISMARCK one of the most unpopular men of his time. He was excluded from the German Parliament Assembly of 1848, and lived some months in retirement; but in the following year, upon the triumph of the reactionary party, he took his seat in the Chamber of Deputies at Berlin as member for the district of Zuache. Here, again, he was the bitterest assailant of the Moderate Liberals, and was accustomed to deride the aspirations toward Germanunity which the so-called Gotha party already began to express, as associated with the cause of constitutional liberty in Prussia. Herr von BISMARCK, for his part, maintained that it was to Prussianism, not to Germanism, that they must look for the safety and advancement of the State. He afterward in three days to vote into Austria as the proper representative of the ancient power of Germany, while he censured the struggle for Schleswig-Holstein as a petty act of revolution, and an infringement of the rights of the King of Denmark. As an instance of his sagacity on questions of political economy, it is remembered that he was the advocate of a law by which the trade guilds should be empowered, as in the Middle Ages, to fix an arbitrary price for every sort of goods to be sold, and to prescribe the number of apprentices who should be brought up to each trade.

In 1851 HERR VON BISMARCK was admitted to the diplomatic corps, and sent as First Secretary of Legation to the Prussian Embassy at Frankfort; but, within three months of his arrival at this post, was elevated, by an extraordinary promotion, to that of Embassador at the sittings of the Federal Diet. He had evidently been selected for his independent and superficious bearing, no purpose to bid defiance to COUNT REICHBERG, who was then Austrian Embassador at Frankfort and President of the Diet. Many amusing stories are told of the encounters between them, HERR VON BISMARCK, by his spirit, tact, and courage, gradually obtained the better of his more dignified antagonist, who was once so plainly insulted by the Prussian that they were on the point of fighting a duel. It became necessary, therefore, to recall HERR VON BISMARCK from Frankfort, and he was transferred to the embassy at St. Petersburg, where he entered into intimate relations with Prince GORTSCHAKOFF, then busy with schemes for a triple alliance of Russia, Prussia, and France, by which each of those powers was to acquire an extensive addition of its territories at the expense of Austria, Turkey, Belgium, and the smaller German States. The Crimean War, however, prevented, or at least postponed, the execution of these projects, which seem not to have been agreed to by the Emperor of the North, and were afterward disavowed by the Prince Regent of Prussia, who at that time was unwilling to entertain any thought of self-aggrandizement at the expense of his brother sovereigns.

After his accession to the throne a change, apparently of the worse, came over the mind of Prince. The Liberal influences of the Crown Prince, the Prince of Hohenzollern, and their friends, now gave way to the intrigues of the Embassador, or they are sometimes called, from the title of their newspaper organ, the Kreuz Zeitung party. COUNT BRANDENBURG having become Minister of Foreign Affairs instead of HERR VON SCHLEINITZ, a new line of foreign policy was resolved upon, though it was necessarily to be kept dark till the views of the other European Powers could be ascertained. HERR VON BISMARCK, therefore, COUNT GOLTZ remaining still at the Russian Court, had no sooner returned to Berlin than it was intimated by the French Minister that the Emperor NAPOLEON would like to see him as much as Prussian Plenipotentiary at the Tuileries. He had more than once spoken in favor of a French alliance, under certain circumstances, previously to the war between France and Austria in 1859. Herr VON BISMARCK thus became Prussian Embassador at Paris; what passed between him and the Emperor NAPOLEON is best known to themselves.

In September, 1862, HERR VON BISMARCK was summoned home to Berlin and intrusted with the task of forming a new Ministry, over which he has since presided, with the port-folio of Foreign Affairs, COUNT EULENBURG being Minister of the Interior, HERR VON ROON, Minister of War; and BODELSCHWINGH and VON DER HEYDT successively Finance Ministers. The whole course of their administration, from 1862 down to the outbreak of the late war, has been a pertinacious conflict against the majority of the Chamber, whose views have been impudently set at naught, and whose Constitutional power to control the public expenditure has been nullified, while the Prime Minister has coolly declared that he and his colleagues will not be responsible to Parliament, and that they consider themselves only servants of the Crown. The subject-matter of the original dispute was the augmentation of the army estimates and the law extending the period of compulsory service in the army to three years. The Chamber having, by majorities of 272 against 68, and of 251 against 86, decided those propositions against the Government, BISMARCK dissolved the Chamber after a series of angry altercations, and informed them that the King would govern without a budget, if need be, for years, and would put in execution whatever measures he thought best for the public service. The campaigns which ventured to encounter on this high-handed procedure of the Government were prosecuted with great severity; and those who ventured to defend to raise their voice on behalf of the Constitution were punished by removal to distant places, if not by the loss of office.

This practically despotic, the rule of King WILLIAM I and BISMARCK, his Minister, during the last three or four years, has been marked, with astonishing success, though by conduct which history will perhaps stigmatize as perfidious and double-dealing, to the achievement of two great objects, the expulsion of Austria from the German political system, and the consequent union of the several States of North Germany to the Prussian system. Both are regarded by most impartial observers as a change beneficial to the interests of European peace and civilization. Nor can those of their views which are equally acceptable to the national spirit of the Germans. It is unnecessary here to review the series of transactions by which HERR VON BISMARCK's main provinces, which led to the open quarrel between Prussia on the one hand, and Austria, with the minor German powers on the other, finally issuing in the rupture of the Federation, and the short but decisive war of last midsummer. It would be a difficult task to reconcile the principles of honesty and good faith of the Prussian Government in these transactions; but the skills and valor of the Prussian army, the intelligence and patriotic spirit of the Prussian people, have justly earned for their country a degree of political and military importance second to none of the Powers of Europe.

HOUSTON, TEXAS.

THE city of Houston, Texas, is situated in Harris County, on Buffalo Bayou, 45 miles by water from its entrance into Galveston Bay. It is a flourishing town, the centre of a large area of commercial importance, and is advantageously situated for trade, at the head of steamboat navigation. It is the principal shipping point for several adjacent counties, in which cotton, sugar, and maize are produced, and toward which a copious flood of emigration is flowing. A railroad is being built which is to extend westward to the BRAZOS River, and probably to Austin. Houston was founded in 1836. Its population in 1860 was nearly five thousand.

GALVESTON, TEXAS.

THERE are few towns in the South where so much Northern energy and the effects of Northern capital are as visible as in Galveston. The reason of this seems to be that the city was the principal port at the close of the war as a good place to make money. Army officers soldiers and other persons connected with the army have settled here, seemingly for a permanent home.

The climate is delightful and the people, generally speaking, courteous and hospitable.

On the Strand, or principal street, there are some fine stores and other buildings. A bank, the First National of Texas, has a fine building. Colonel A. South Carolina president, and an ex-General—Major-General W T CLARK, of the Army of the Tennessee—their cashier. Colonel CLARK is a fine business, and is cordially supported by the people.

A fine Custom-house, in which is located the Post-office, attracts the eye from the new-comer almost the first thing upon his entrance into the City.

The Collector, General KENT, was General GRANT's Provost-Marshal at the time of the surrender of Vicksburg, and did the tedious duty of policing PEMBERTON's army. General KENT has not forgotten his army discipline, and locks sharply after the revenue laws. The Surveyor, a fine-looking gent of parties that used to "slip things through."

The Galveston beach is said to be finer than any beach in the country. D.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," &c.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"I REALLY think," said Mr. May, one morning, at the breakfast-table, "that you children have done wonders with your flower-garden. Why, the gardens are splendid!"

"Yes, indeed," said Lily, "I think they are. If it wasn't for two or three things gardening would be so delightful."

"What are the two or three things, pray?"

"One is the weeds, papa."

"Ah!" said her father, laughing; "I thought you did not mean to have any weeds?"

Lily shook her head with an air that said very plainly if she had not meant it the weeds had.

"It's so hard to rake 'em off, papa. I toe them up ever so nicely, but the minute I begin to rake away comes the earth and every thing, as if I was going to take off the whole garden."

"How do you hold your rake?" asked Mr. May.

"I don't know, papa. In both hands."

"Yes, of course. But is the end of the handle high or low?"

"Pretty low, I guess," said Lily.

"Hold it high next time," said her father.

"When you rake a bed after digging, and have to level it here and there, the handle must sometimes be held low; but when you are raking off weeds you can hardly hold it too upright. Then the earth sifts through the teeth of the rake, and only the weeds are drawn off. What's the other hindrance to the perfect felicity of gardening?"

"My children!" said Lily, with such a pitiful intonation that every body in the house laughed in the most unsympathetic manner.

"Yes, I perceive that papa," said Jack. "If you don't, just ask Malvina."

"I will when I desire any of Malvina's conversation," said Mr. May. "I am not the greatest passion he dislike to hearing the kitchen quoted for any thing. What's the matter with the clothes, Lily? They will get soiled, just as the weeds will grow."

"Oh, papa, muddy don't express it!" said Lily, despairingly.

"Well, keep up your courage, my dear," said her father, laughing. "I am much inclined to fear that you will see little more mud this summer; it seems like the beginning of a dry time. Clover, I have seen no balsams so fine as yours any where, except at that little house of Nobody's by the hillside. I can't remember the boy's name."

"But oh, papa!" cried Primrose; "have you seen my heart's-ease?"

"Your heart's-ease?" said her father, lifting her up in his arms; "why, you are heart's-ease yourself! If you can show me any better I should like to see it."

Prim pulled him away out of the room, followed by Lily and Clover, the one talking eagerly about her own flowers, the other about those of the cottage of the beautiful balsams of little Dick Nobody.

Mr. May was right—a dry time set in; and Lily soon began to rue the day she found again, with all its troublesome qualities. The soil in the little gardens lost its rich brown hue, and looked hot and sandy; while the grass-borders hung their heads in the pitiless sunshine and cried for rain. Lily would fain have watered them at all hours of the day, but Sam assured her that that was the very way to kill them.

"Wait till the shady hours come," he said, "and then water thoroughly. And do not begin watering at all unless you are sure your patience will hold out."

"Mine will—till the cistern fails," said Lily. "But why do you say that?"

"Because a little watering only cakes the earth round the roots, and makes matters worse than ever," said Sam. "Keep the earth as loose and soft round your plants as ever you can in dry weather."

"That's odd," said Lily. "I should think it would just let the heat in."

"It lets the heat in, but the air brings moisture with it. And it leaves the roots at liberty to go every where in search of all the ground may contain."

"Ah, I think the ground must contain very little just now," said Lily, "for it seems as if all the water I put on my plants at night was just drunk up by the rest of the earth before morning."

It did seem so, indeed. However, the children took good care that no corner of sweet herbs in that dry time; and Mr. May ordered Robin to draw and carry to the little gardens as much water as they would use. It may be certain the three little watering-pots were not idle. Lily, to be sure, made a good deal of splashing with hers, and sometimes the mischievous mud flew higher than she cared for; but holes in the rose of her watering-pot were so large. Ogden, that it was quite easier to sway the earth from the bottom of her flowers, and had to coax it back carefully with her trowel; though still the plants looked thirstily upward in search of a good thing. But Clover's garden at sundown, when she had done watering for the night, looked as if there had been a gentle shower from the clouds; for she, with her long-nosed watering-pot she could reach even the tops of her plants; now and then Sam lowered it to her, and still flowers a shower-bath. But both plants and children were very glad when the weather changed and there came a rain. And then the plants grew then! how the blossoms opened, one kind after another! Prim's heart's-ease were the loveliest things that could be; and after four days of rain, and though just the heat of the weather (for heart's-ease does not bear the sun) the flowers were rather small, yet as the cool days came on they were larger and larger; and they were a wonder to look at. There was the King of the Blacks—a great black purple pansy with a small yellow eye, and another pansy that was bright yellow, and another that was pale yellow, and another that was yellow, with crimson marks. And there were striped purple, and striped purple and gold, and another purple and blue, and another crimson and white. Almost every plant as it came into bloom seemed to be of new color and markings; and Prim would come running into the breakfast-room with a breathless

"Oh, papa, another heart's-ease out! Won't you just come and see it?"

Then when the snow-white smothers began to open in large flowers every evening, there was no end to the joy Clover declared Prim's eyes grew as big as her primrose blossoms.

Clover, too, could boast of beauties; the balsams, with spotted blossoms, as double as any rose; and tall sheets of scarlet sage, with crimson tassels drooping till they touched the ground of love-lies-bleeding. Stocks promised to make a fine show by-and-by; and the finer, quite covered with hyacinth beans and canary-bird vine, looked almost like a green bank, spotted with purple and yellow.

Lily's garden was, to say truth, a little wild: things had been planted without much thought about such trifles as color and height, and some of the flowers had grown to think themselves overcrowded. For instance, the little dwarf convolvulus was planted to go back in the bed that, without stepping in among the flowers, it was hard to see its delicate trailing colors. On the other hand, the hollyhocks were so near the front that their broad and somewhat coarse green leaves stretched out even across the walk. Petunias were every where—Lily had set them out wherever she could find a bit of room—and they rejoiced in blue and whither, ran over the delicate little scarlet flax (which was a real beauty), and climbed quite over the head of Lily's favorite rose-bush. Then they did furnish a great many flowers—pink, and purple, and white-threated, and white-edged. Lily was proud in her praises, and, in fact, seemed to have almost adopted Mr. Jarvis's maxim of "Quantity—quantity," and actually said that the flax was pretty—what there was of it. The hollyhocks were not in bloom yet, and the sisters were more drawn faith in them by the sticks every morning, and the canna spread out its broad pale leaves with quite the air of a distinguished foreigner.

"The three gardens are a like the three children as possible!" Mr. May declared.

"How?" said his wife, smiling.

"Excellent, brilliant, and poetical," said Mr. May.

"I am sure Clover's is brilliant too," said Mrs. May.

"Yes, but in a way so perfectly orderly and neat that the lady-like qualities strike you first. Look at Lily's gardening, running into a most brilliant fashion! And there's my little Prim dreaming over her pansies! This gardening is a great business."

Nothing had been heard of little Dick Nobody's garden for some time, and though Clover had been very anxious to go there, she had not dared to say a word. But one day, after the dry weather had passed by and the showers had come to make everything fresh and green, Clover knew should take a walk that way and see Dick's balsams.

"Well see if they look like yours, Clover," he said.

"Has Dick got any heart's-ease, Sam?" said little Primrose.

"I think not."

"Then I'd better take him some," said Prim, with a very grave face.

"But you'll fill the plants, dear, if you take them up now, when they're all full of flowers," said Clover; "or at least kill the flowers."

"It's only the flowers I want to take," replied Primrose, as gravely as before. "I will take Dick a bunch of 'em."

"What! what for?" said Sam, putting his hands under her chin, and bringing the little sober face into view.

"Because," said Prim, "I've been thinking about it a great deal—about what mamma said. And if God asked me what I had done with my heart's ease I should like to be able to say I never given Dick one."

"Oh, if that's all," said Lily, "I can pick him a great bunch of petunias. Do 'em good too—they want cutting."

While Lily flew down to her garden and began to pull off the petunias with an unsparing hand, Prim rose crouched down by her patch of heart's-ease, carefully culling one of each shade and tint that she could find, putting them loosely together, with quite an artistic arrangement of colors.

"Exquisite!" said Sam, watching her. Prim looked up and smiled.

"Dear me! how splendid!" said Lily, running up with her hands full of petunias; "but just look at these! Clover's are the best, I do think."

"I think—I shall not take any thing," said Clover, slowly.

"Nothing out of all your garden!" said Lily. Clover flushed crimson.

"I'm not sure that Dick would care to have me bring any of our flowers," she said, in a low voice. "Maybe I can find—" And she hurried off, coming back presently with a half open rose-bud, which she quietly put in Prim's hand, to go with the heart's-ease. Then they set off.

Dick, of course, was in his garden—he was always there when it did not rain, and sometimes when it did; and visitors were a particularly pleasant thing to him at any time. He came to show He welcomed them very joyfully, beginning at once to display his treasures.

Great was the surprise of Lily and Primrose to see the very same flowers in Dick's garden that there were in Clover's. The beautiful camellia-flowered balsams, and the speckled carnations, and the showy zinnias. Even a canary-bird vine was there, fluttering over the fence.

"But where did you get them all?" cried Lily.

"A lady," said Dick. "She's a good one, and that's all I know."

"Does she live?" inquired Sam.

"Don't know, Sir," said Dick. "Nobody didn't tell me that. Man that fetched 'em—that's the seeds and the little green trees they grow here by. These be out of the young lady's own garden, says he."

"A young lady!" said Lily. "Oh, I dare say it was Maria Jarvis. You know, Clover, she's got such loads of flowers in her garden, and a man to take care of 'em, and all."

But Clover did not answer, and seemed rather in haste to get away, opening the little gate, and stepping out upon the road. And when Sam looked at her, he saw that she was biting her lips very hard to keep back her laughing. It must have pleased him —Clover's face, or the laughing, or the flowers, or something; for the first thing he did, when they were all outside the gate, was to take his arms round Clover and give her a good hearty kiss.

Little Prim all this while had said scarcely a word, looking on with all her eyes, as we say. But when Prim was going to bed that night, and Mrs. May bent over her for a parting kiss, Prim said:

"Mamma, I don't think God will ever ask Clover what she's done with her flowers."

"Why not?" asked her mother.

"Because," answered Primrose, sedately, "I think He left her what to do with 'em—and I think she's done it!"

STARTING OF

The Great American Tea Company.

The proprietors became fully convinced, several years ago, that the consumers of Tea and Coffee were paying too many and too large profits on these articles of every-day consumption, and therefore organized THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, in order, as far as possible, with these enormous drains upon the Consumers, and to supply them with these necessaries at the smallest possible price.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors:

1st. The American House in Chiba or Japan makes large contracts with the native Agents—and some of the richest retired merchants in the country—for which their necessary fortune through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits on Drafts for the purchase of Teas and Coffees.

3d. The Importer makes a good profit of 10 per cent. in many cases.

4th. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of 10 per cent. additional.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots of 100 packages, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 20 per cent.

7th. The Retail Dealer sells to the Consumer for all the more he can get.

When you have added to these enormous profits many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste of time, and the original cost of the article will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now let us show you how we can sell you at very much lower than other dealers.

We propose to do away with all the various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, our cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the act is pure and simple.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

It has saved me life, and relieved others. I believe this to be the only genuine cure for Catarrh and incipient Consumption ever yet discovered. It has now been before the public less than six months, and if you will exhibit No. 1104 Fulton Street, New York, you can be entertained two hours in reading the letters of gratitude and cure that are being daily received from every section of the country. One lady came in person from a neighboring State of Connecticut, and bought a bottle. Here had been an old and bad case, and she had tried every thing to no effect. Her husband, on reading these remarks, and seemed almost frantic with joy.—ADDRESS T. P. SYMMES, No. 1104 Fulton Street, New York.

ASTHMA CURED.

Mr. Wm. May, of 545 Spring Street, New York, writes, Jan. 1, 1866: "I have been afflicted with asthma for upward of ten years, receiving no benefit from medical men. I was advised by a friend to try one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I said I had tried several kinds of plasters without any benefit, and supposed they were all alike. My friend gave me one of Allcock's and told me to try it. I did so, and have now worn them steadily for nine months, and find myself better than I have been for many years. TEN REASONS WHY

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters

Should have a Place in Every Home.

BECAUSE by invigorating the constitution and the frame they avert sickness.

BECAUSE (especially) their use prevents the atmospheric poison which produces epidemics from taking effect upon the system.

BECAUSE they cure indigestion, and impart unwonted vigor to the stomach.

BECAUSE they are the best appetizing medicine at present known.

BECAUSE they are the only preparation upon which persons of a bilious habit can safely rely to keep the liver in good order.

BECAUSE they tone and regulate the bowels, and invariably relieve them when constipated, without causing undue relaxation.

BECAUSE they strengthen the nerves, clear the brain, and deter the attacks of nervousness.

BECAUSE in case of an attack of spasms or bilious colic, they are the best thing that can be administered on the instant.

BECAUSE they combine the three properties of a tonic, an alterative, and a nervine in their utmost purity and perfection.

BECAUSE they are a specific against Ague and Fever and all intermittents, and with all their potency as a preventive as a remedy, are as harmless as sea water from the mountain spring!

[From Rev. J. W. Poland's Autobiography.]

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disposition to cough. For some months previous I had thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the disease alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine I had been meditating, and the result was beyond question. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Lawrence County, Ky., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by bleeding from the lungs, and had entered extensively with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She has since been in usual health, and is now living. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled."—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted sick and suffering by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have been proved in the most severe cases of consumption, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is used in Hemorrhages, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles no remedy will be found valuable.

POSITIVELY LAST CHANCE. Capital Prize, $30,000.

We have the pleasure to announce to the citizens of the United States that KELLEY'S GRAND

NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT

Will positively take place at the Washington Rink, Chicago, Illinois, on Saturday, November 17, 1866, or money refunded, on which time HALF A MILLION DOLLARS IN PRIZES, including $100,000 in GREENBACKS, will be presented to ticket-holders.

IT IS SAID—We announced that the North American Prize Concert would be given on the 28th of September, but the time set has been found too short to complete a work of such gigantic magnitude; and in justice to ticket-holders we have extended the time of drawing to the 17th of November, 1866, at which time it will positively take place. For fifteen years we have been engaged in the business, and we point with pride to the reputation we have won for honesty and integrity. Many of the prominent citizens in Chicago will bear us out in the statement that during that time we never have made any promises that we have not scrupulously fulfilled. In spite of all opposition, and in spite of every obstacle, we still live, and shall prove to the public that the North American Prize Concert will be given as the time advertised, and all the prizes advertised will be distributed fairly, tangibly, and without reserve.

WE AVOID ALL DELAY IN SENDING TICKETS TO SEND YOUR ORDER AT ONCE, AS THE BOOKS WILL BE CLOSED ON SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 17, 1866, AND THE DRAWING WILL THEN COMMENCE.

Number of Tickets issued, 200,000. Price, One Dollar each.

EVERY OTHER TICKET DRAWS A PRIZE.

The drawing will take place, after the concert, where 20,000 persons can witness it. A committee will be appointed by the audience to take charge of the same.

All agents and purchasers will be supplied with a correct list of the drawing as soon as published.

Tickets are for sale at the principal news agencies, hotels, and book stores, and at our office, 102 Randolph Street. Price of tickets, $1 each. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 3-cent stamp for return postage.

Great efforts and inducements are offered to agents, who are wanted every where. Write for our terms at once. Send reference with application.

"UNCLE TOM" AND HIS GRANDCHILD. [SEE PAGE 699.]

"UNCLE TOM" AND GRANDCHILD.

THE scene represented in the engraving on our first page was suggested to the artist, Mr. WARD, by a few months since while on the road from Columbus to Macon. It is by the roadside, on the six-skirts of a Georgia plantation. A little child, almost white, and very beautiful, is teaching her grandfather—a pure negro—to read. The little girl is just from school, as appears from the satchel hanging on the chair. We did not know or ask the names of either the old man or the child; but from an affection for "Uncle Tom" and its gifted author we have adopted the title subjoined to our engraving. The picture, as we saw it, seemed to tell at the same time a very sad and a very hopeful story. The contrast of color, at first violent in those so near of kin, told the history of a great wrong. The little girl, with far more than "Southern chivalry" in her veins than of negro blood, was, or had been for all that, a slave—a thing to be bought and sold, to be unbelievably abused or insultingly petted, to whom children she must become a curse, as they would be a curse to her. But this sad fate had in her case been averted. She was now free; and her present occupation spoke of a new era for the negro race. So that, on the whole, the picture was a hopeful one. It all seemed to us to be concentrated the great moral of our civil war.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1866.

SHALL THE PRESIDENT BE IMPEACHED?

IN the course of our political history it has been often said by stump orators, in the rhetorical exhilaration of their discourses, that the President ought to be impeached; but to advise a measure has never yet been adopted by Congress nor justified by the country. But when two gentlemen like General BUTLER and Mr. BOUTWELL, each of whom will be members of the next Congress, announce that they shall take the preliminary steps of impeachment, and when one of them states that he has the grounds upon which he would justify his action, it is but fair to suppose that they mean what they say, and intend to bring the subject before Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL says, and with perfect truth, that an impeachment is not a revolutionary measure. It is no more so—indeed, it is not so much so—as an election. The Constitution plainly provides for impeachment as it does for any other emergency. It is the only way in which the official offenses of certain officers can be reached. But it is, of course, a measure of the very gravest character—one which in ordinary times might profoundly excite the country, and which in extraordinary times like these would produce an equally extraordinary agitation. It is a remedy which should be invoked only in great emergencies. The offense must be plain, the peril indisputable, to justify the temporary suspension of the executive authority in the person of its constitutional representative. It is unlike other trials, it seems, according to General BUTLER, that, in case of impeachment, the accused is to be considered guilty until he is proved to be innocent. He may be suspended from his functions until he proves his unblemished right to exercise them.

There are two questions which immediately present themselves. Has the conduct of the President made him liable to impeachment? and if so, would it be wise to impeach him?

We are obviously correct in saying that there is no general conviction at present that the President ought to be impeached. That his Presidency is a national misfortune, and that but for him the country would be rapidly returning to a normal condition, is unquestionable. That he is entirely unfitted by natural capacity and training for the office he holds is painfully conspicuous. That the comprehends neither the causes nor the consequences of the war, and is seriously ignorant both of the American people and of the dominant idea of our politics is undeniable. But these, although misfortunes for the country, are not impeachable offenses. And we are to remember that the President did not thrust himself into his office, but came to it by constitutional election and success. Much is said of his supposed habits, but it is rumor merely. It has not appeared, nor has it been seriously alleged, that he has habits which substantially prevent him from properly fulfilling his official duties.

Ought he then to be impeached for perilous political offenses? He is charged with usurping the prerogative of Congress in settling the questions of to-day by the way, and with a shameful prostitution of official patronage to personal ends. But as to the first charge, his offense is in the beginning more than a violent and indecent assertion of what is constitutional and of what Congress ought to do. He has expressed opinions, but he has as yet attempted no acts. He has, indeed, denounced the opinions of those who differ with him as treason, and their holders as deserving of the gibbet. But this merely shows the mental temper in which he has been long involved. It is natural to suppose that a man of his passionate temperament will endeavor to enforce his views in some way, and it is the part of wisdom to be watchful and ready. But until that time his views are merely his own opinions, and they are opinions held among a people who thoroughly comprehend the situation.

The President's abuse of the appointing power, and his total misconception of the relations of the various officers in the Government, are indeed extraordinary, but they are not unprecedented. His conduct is not essentially different from that of other Presidents, and will lead undoubtedly, as it should, to a legal remedy of a very menacing danger to which the Government is exposed. But the whole question of appointment and removal, in its exact constitutional relations, is still an open one, and if the President be guilty of the grossest and boldest attempt at usurpation in this particular age, his offense is not so peculiar as to justify, in the public mind, so extraordinary a correction as impeachment.

It would be enough, therefore, to prove the inexpediency, under the circumstances, of an impeachment that the grounds of action are neither evident nor adequate to the public mind. But there are other reasons which render it especially impolitic. It would unnecessarily embitter and prolong the present party conflict. Under the circumstances for it in circumstances which determine expediency—it would wear the air of an act of intolerant revenge; and it would be curiously and preposterously timed for the present offense. If, indeed, as Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS seems to suppose, the President is a conscious and malignant conspirator, in concert with the rebels in the Government and the hands of its enemies, and to force its friends into the position of rebels, the situation is revolutionary, and demands unusual measures. But the country know that it is never may be the foul intentions of any man or party, the great mass of loyal American citizens are neither deceived nor terrified. They have paid a fearful price for their control of the Government, and they do not mean to relinquish it. Mr. WADE HAMPTON, and Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, and Governor ORR, and RAPHAEL SEMMES, and the President, and Mr. SEWARD, and Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, and Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, and Mr. MONTGOMERY BLAIR may say and do what they will. They can neither wheedle nor frighten the people who saved the Union from securing it in the way which seems to them most just, most safe, most wise, most enduring. And that security no more requires the impeachment of the President than the hanging of JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE AUTUMN SPECULATION IN WALL STREET.

THE usual autumn speculation in Wall Street set in this year later than usual; but the start is promises to be a brief one. Thus far, an advance of 10@15 per cent. has already been realized in some leading stocks, and all have risen enough to return a handsome profit to September buyers. How long the speculation may last, how much higher prices may rise, how soon the turn will come—these are questions which are engrossing the intellects and dividing the opinions of speculators.

It must be remembered, on the one hand, that the autumn rise of this year did not start from a depressed market. Prices were not unusually low in September. On the contrary, taking the price of United States Five-Twenty bonds as the standard, the average quotations of railroad securities last month were fairly up to intrinsic values. The first-class dividend paying stocks were all above par. Chicago and Alton were at 125, Fort Wayne at 94, Rock Island (ex-dividend of some 30 per cent.) was 108, New York Central was 110, Reading 115, Hudson 120, Toledo 104, Michigan Central 118, Assuming that United States Five-Twenty bonds, paying 6 per cent. in gold, were not unduly cheap@109@110, these prices may perhaps be considered as fairly warranting railway stocks paying from 8 to 12 per cent. per annum. The second-class shares, which pay dividends irregularly, were likewise higher than usual. Erie was at 75, Cleveland & Toledo 84; Pittsburg 88. Northwest, preferred, 70; Northwest, common, 36. So with the miscellaneous list. Cumberland preferred was 51, Ohio and Mississippi certificates over 30; Canton, steady, at 54@55; Quicksilver 55, etc., etc. Within a couple of years we have seen all these securities selling for long periods together at prices much lower than these. The autumn speculation of 1866 thus started with the disadvantage of being, on the average, average prices, and of undertaking at the very outset to carry prices above what might fairly be considered intrinsic values.

But, on the other hand, no calculations with regard to prices can, in our day, be safely made, without proper allowance for perturbations induced by a variable currency. And, moreover, no calculations with regard to prices can be safely based on any fixed standard so long as the value of the money in which all prices are reckoned is subject to fluctuation. So long as the currency consists of paper-money, irredeemable in specie, prices will vary incessantly, widely, capriciously, and in defiance of all rule. They will not always rise with the rise in gold. Sometimes they will do so, but just as often they will fall when gold rises, and rise when it falls. Erie sold at 125 with gold at 150; when gold rose to 250 Erie was 110; when it fell to 128 Erie was 125; when it was 130 Erie was 97; when it was 150 Erie was 60. As all these periods the intrinsic value of Erie was the same, and Wall Street was aware of the fact. The only principle which can be set down as certain, in an era of paper-money, is that prices will fluctuate—that there will be periods of wild speculation, followed by periods of great depression, both of them independent of intrinsic values, and irreconcilable with any known standard.

It is by reliance on this principle that speculators in Wall Street look for higher prices for stocks this fall and winter. They say that two years and a half have elapsed since the last great speculative movement, and that how much more paper-money now than we had then; and that the disturbing element of an irredeemable currency being still in full play, the time is ripe for a new carnival, perhaps as crazy as that of 1864. They argue that it is not material from what point the speculation starts. In March, 1864, Fort Wayne was a great purchase at 125; in April it was a great sale at 100. In the one case the tide set upward, in the other downward. It was worth no more in March than in April, no less in April than in March. Yet those who bought in March made their fortunes, and those who bought in April were ruined. In a paper-money era, they say, prices must necessarily change or falling; all that you require to discover is which way the tide is setting at the particular moment you operate.

There are two influences which make in favor of the speculators. One is the bank expansion, which is so enormous and unparalleled that the very mention of the figures which bank discounts have reached seems to start speculation in every article of commerce. In this city alone they have increased 50 per cent. since January, and in the country the expansion has been still greater. The other influence is the prosperous condition of the railway interest. To this we have more than once called attention, and it is being calculated to effect, sooner or later, a radical change in the status of railway securities. To say nothing of such stocks as the Fort Wayne, Rock Island, and Reading, which are uncertain guides, every city five years ago, which now are now safe 10 per cent. dividend paying stocks; here is the Toledo, which sold its bonds at 50 cents in 1858, and now pays 10 per cent. on its stock; the Hudson River, which for ten years never could earn quite enough to pay its interest, and now pays 8 per cent.; Michigan Central, which for a snug extra dividend some fine morning; the Chicago and Alton, bankrupt in 1857, and now paying 10 per cent., and laying by nearly as much more as it pays, which now can be used to have any but a nominal value, and which is now going to take a place on the regular dividend paying list. It is impossible that these changes in intrinsic values can take place without corresponding changes in market-prices, and the experience of Wall Street is that the market, in such cases, generally runs about as far in excess of the facts as it had previously lagged behind them.

It is about twelve months since Mr. M'CULLOCH delivered his Fort Wayne speech. In the December following he reiterated, in his Report to Congress, the cardinal doctrine of that speech, and declared his unalterable faith. Whether he would or could have contracted the currency, if Congress had given him the powers he asked, may be an open question. Certain it is, now, that he has no power to interfere materially with the volume of paper-money; and equally certain that, if he had the power, it would at this period be impolitic to use it, until $150,000,000 of compound legal-tenders are paid off, and the first issue of Seven-Thirty notes maturing next year snugly funded into long bonds. So the speculators do not seem to have much to fear from him.

THE NEW YORK "RING" REVEALED.

THE article upon the government of the city of New York which the New York Times printed on October ought to be printed in a cheap and legible form, and read universally. The bald iniquity which is synonymous with that municipal government is so generally familiar to every citizen as his own sins. But here we have the details, the wires, the ropes, the whole machinery by which the widows and orphans are ground into hopeless poverty, and the wages are picked out of the pockets of honest men. The story is told with such humor and felicity, and the malice of the writer has been evidently so thorough and faithful, that it would not be surprising if the publication of this article should mark an era of reform, first, by arresting public attention, which mere indignant denunciation will not do; and then by awakening the honest revolution that such shameless corruption and recklessness squandering of hard-earned money shall cease somehow or other.

The article opens with a description of the halls of the councilmen and aldermen, and an analysis or the composition of each Board, with the assistants and salaries. Of the twenty-four councilmen the majority are apparently under thirty, and at the time of writing the article some six of them were honorable and honest legislators. The course of proceedings, as observed by the article in six different sessions, shows that we are all cheated and robbed without the least delay or debate. "The visitor perceives a kind of ungovernable propensity to vote for spending money, and a prompt dragging at any obstacle raised or objection made." The instances given are incredible and preposterous. A vote of money requires the presence of three-fourths of the councilmen. When, therefore, any peculiarly luscious job offers itself, a special meeting is called, and the honest members are summoned in such a way as to be sure not to receive the notice until too late. The aldermen are as like the councilmen as twins to each other. And when there is the Board of Supervisors, who take care of the county as the former bodies have charge o. the city; the city and county being of exactly the same extent, and identical in every particular. The Board of Supervisors is that exemplary body which, being authorized eight years ago to build a courthouse at an expense of not more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, have already expended upon it two millions and a half, and it stands to-day just half done. Professional architects compute that the every dollar which has gone into the building another has gone into somebody's pockets.

The whole swindle of the "Manual of the Common Council" is also revealed. For an utterly unnecessary book, adorned and eked out with the fac-simile autograph signatures of all the aldermen, the tax-payers of New York paid in the year 1865 the neat sum of $57,172 30. Experts in publishing compute the cost of manufacturing this totally useless book at $16,000. The truth is, according to the writer of the article, that the book costs the compiler, who is Clerk to the Common Council, $15,000. He himself assures the world that the other $1 30 goes out of the pockets of the tax-payers into those other pockets wheresoever they may be. The city contracts are exposed in the same satisfactory manner. The ceremonies of "opening streets" and of appointments to office, including the position of teachers in the public schools, are laid bare. "Another poor girl came on the witness-stand" the other day, and testified that she had paid $75 for a situation of $300 a year," and it was proved "that the salaries of all this feel impinged no other than the principal o one of the schools."

On every side and in every detail the municipal Government is an organized system of plunder. In 1830 the city debt amounted for half a million of dollars. In 1865 the entire government cost more than forty millions. In 1830 the population was a little more than 180,000. The population now about 1,000,000. Thus while the population is five times larger, the cost of governing it is sixteen times greater, and yet while the value of the real and personal property owned by the city, that shrewd business men are of opinion "that a private company could govern, sprinkle, clean, and teach the city for ten millions," the whole remuneration only the fair revenue to be derived from its property."

The cause of this astonishing fall from an honest and able city government, in which the best citizens were proud to take part, to the present ignorant and dishonest conspiracy, the writer of the article attributes to the constitutional change of 1821, which abolished the household restriction upon the suffrage and admitted to the polls every body but criminals and madmen. This change was strenuously opposed by MARTIN VAN BUREN. But while this was, in the writer's judgment, the cause, the succession was the railroad grab of 1853 and onward, when "Rings" were first formed and universal spoliation began. At the present time the central "Ring" is composed of about seven men, heads o city departments, Aldermen, Candidates for Congress, for the Legislature, and for the numerous appointments of the city authorities must be approved by them.

For the remedy of this evil, which, if not checked, will sooner or later destroy the Government, the writer looks to the Constitutional Convention of next year. The present relief by the interference of the Legislature is, indeed, a necessity, but it can not and ought not, he thinks, to be relied upon, both because the principle is radically wrong, and because the Legislature is itself rapidly becoming a corrupt body. The writer suggests, therefore, as a fundamental remedy, that while no man should be deprived of the right of suffrage who now legally possesses it, yet that henceforth no man, native or foreign, should be allowed to vote "who can not read English understandingly and intelligently." The ground of the exclusion is, that those who can not read are dependent upon others for information, without which no intelligent vote can be cast. He would further impose a certain tax payment as a qualification; limit the profligate elections to Mayor and members of the city Legislature, and abolish the distinction between the city and the county of New York.

The article, which occupies about fifty pages of the Revoire, is the most vigorous, shrewd, and able assault upon our civic iniquity. The dangers of that iniquity are so plain and appalling that no man can doubt the truth of the closing words of the writer: "The thieves must be driven out, if it costs a bloody war; and it will cost a bloody war if they are not." Nor is it at this moment the least startling of the facts of the case that Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, a Copperhead during the war, is the present candidate of this shameless "Ring" for Governor of New York.

SOUTHERN VIEWS OF THE AMENDMENT.

WE observe that many of the Southern papers are very urgent that the Amendment shall not be adopted. Governor HUMPHREYS of Mississippi speaks of it as an insult, and Mr. WADE HAMPTON speaks upon the duty of the North to conform to the terms upon which the rebel armies surrendered. All of them talk of the section of the country in which they live as their "country," and with us to understand that they will never submit to indignities, and will die with dignity in the last ditch before they will acquiesce in the Amendment.

Now let us be as frank as these gentlemen. If there were any thing which seemed harsh or unjust in the Amendment we should at once concede that it ought not to be adopted. But they will strive in vain who undertake to prove that it is not magnanimous to take the most legitimate and reasonable security for the future, or that it is unjust upon one side to insist, or upon the other to allow, that the basis of national representation shall not be increased by those whom the States disfranchise. The question at issue is not of sides, or terms, or parties, or sections, it is simply of the existence and security of the nation. When Mr. WADE HAMPTON talks, or of an unsuccessful and utterly baseless and cruel effort to destroy this nation, that all is lost but honor, what idea of honor can he be supposed to entertain, and how is it possible for him to conceive the amused contempt with which honorable men listen to his words?

The adoption of the Amendment is regarded by the loyal people of the country as essential to the national security. It is repudiated by the late rebels as insulting and dishonorable. If, then, the question is a point of honesty, which party is more likely to yield? There is nothing said at the South about rejecting the Amendment which is comparable in fury to what was incessantly said and reiterated during the war about never surrendering. But those who said it most stoutly and most sincerely, and who seem to believed them, have seen the result. The last ditch was nothing but the consciousness that further fighting was useless. And has the war thrown no light upon the quality of Northern tenacity? Do the elections leave the Northern determination doubtful? Do the late rebels and their friends still suppose that the stale threat of staying out forever rather than assent to the Amendment has any other effect than to fortify impregnably the resolution of the people?

The editorial writers of the Southern States forget that it is not the country of fifteen, or even of six and seven years ago, with which they have to deal. They forget that those who, affecting to be their friends and to know Northern sentiment, urge them to oppose and reject the Amendment are utterly scorned by the controlling and governing spirits of the loyal States, and are wholly powerless to stem the great flood of popular conviction and purpose. They should remember that assent is required to the Amendment as an arbitrary condition upon which the unrepresented States may be restored, but as a measure of essential justice and national safety. It is a mild and moderate proposition which assumes a certain state of feeling in the Southern States. If that assumption proves to be mistaken, another policy will become just as certainly the necessity of the situation, and it will be just as universally supported as the present. The paramount right of the nation is to secure its existence, and it will do it just as decisively in legislation as it did in war. It is an inexcusable misfortune for the true interest of our fellow-citizens at the South that the election of the Governments and the real public opinion of the country are misinterpreted to them by such intolerable gasconade as the speech of WADE HAMPTON and the Message of Governor HUMPHREYS.

ABUSES OF RAILWAY TRAVEL.

THERE are certain abuses in the conduct of our railroads which have been brought into recent notice by the tragical death of Mr. DWIGHT, and which the people ought not to tolerate any longer. The trains ought never to be moved without due and sharp warning, and a careful observation of the proper officers that there is no evident risk; and railroad companies should be restrained by law from locking any car when there are passengers in it. In the station at Jersey City Mr. DWIGHT, an old gentleman of seventy, was thrown from the train, which moved without sufficient warning, and his daughter, being locked into a car, was brutally insulted by the conductor, and finally put out upon the track at her request, and, with her child, made the best of her way back to her father, who on the next day died of his injuries.

Upon all railroads there are among the officers with whom the passengers are thrown many truly kind and thoughtful persons whom we remember with pleasure, and who would certainly agree with us that there are many others passengers are subjected to the most surly and even insolent treatment. If questions are answered at all by these gentry, it is with a mixture of surprise at the audacity of the questioner, and of contempt for his insignificance which is not encouraging to the further pursuit of information on any terms. The arrival of baggage they resent as a personal indignity, and they wreak their vengeance in a manner of which the trunks of every traveler are fatal witnesses. Indeed the experienced traveler has learned by experience to avoid all intercourse with the persons of whom we speak as far as avoidance is practicable.

And why are drunken men permitted to travel in the cars with decent people? Whenever travels much by rail is sure frequently to find himself sitting near a person who whistles, sings, shouts, and threatens in the madness of drink. Scores of times we have ourselves seen a conductor pass such an offender with a half-confused half-ashamed smile, as if he knew that it was a rank offense, but that he had no remedy. Why has he no remedy? Why do not the New Jersey Railroad Company, and the New Haven Company, and Mr. VANDERBILT, who is the Hudson and Harlem Company, strictly enforce a regulation that every train is at a proper place and put out the drunkard, or secure him in some fit solitude upon the train? Or why do the passengers, gentlemen with their wives or mothers or sisters, submit to it? Why do they not demand that the conductor shall remove the sinner? Is not a fair share of our personal national good-humor merely pusillanimity?

For the remedy is in the hands of the travelers. The trains will be clean, orderly, and safe, if the passengers insist that they shall be. Officers of every grade will cultivate good manners if their ill-manners are publicly exposed. There is no sanitary purifier like the sun, and the sum of publicity will be the assay of the serious annoyances to which railway passengers are now exposed. Nothing is more for the interest of the railway than that its servants as sistants than the friendly feeling which springs from pleasant manners. They cost nothing, says the proverb; but they bring in a great deal.

Yet locking cars and starting without the sound of bell or steam or voice are offenses of which the law should at once punish. If companies and conductors know that heavy damages must be paid for immuring passengers or for exposing them to the consequences of unnecessary speed, they will be at once careful to avoid them as they now are to obey the Connecticut law, which stops every train before crossing a draw-bridge. The improvements of railway travel are very few and very slow; but the sad death of Mr. DWIGHT warns every man how foolish a risk the railroad companies make him run.

A FIRE ON THE "PLYMOUTH ROCK."

WE have as yet seen no published account of an incident which might have had the most tremendous consequences, and of which we apparently the result of a negligence which should be exposed.

A passenger by the Plymouth Rock steamer from Stonington, upon one of her late trips, was aroused at about two o'clock in the morning by a cry of fire, and saw that his state-room was crimson with the flame. He sprang up, and opening his door he saw the flames rising from the floor of the saloon as if they had burned through from below. At the same time another passenger, who had already been awakened from his state-room with all the bedding from his berth, to which our informant added it, and also very generously contributed to smothering the flame before the rest of the passengers had assembled. But the cry had gone through the steamer, and as the saloon was full of thick smoke, and it could not be known that the fire was stopped, the alarm and agitation were very great. Gradually, however, it was understood that the danger had passed, and the passengers slowly retired.

The gentlemen who discovered the fire were, of course, ignorant of its origin until a kerosene lamp was found on the floor under the bed-clothes which had been thrown upon the flame. One of the gentlemen had heard a fall, and upon looking out discovered the fire at once. The conclusion was inevitable that it had been caused by the fall and explosion or merely the emptying of the lamp upon the floor. It seems most probable that some one had been reading at a late hour in the saloon by the light of a kerosene lamp which had been left upon the table, and the jar of the steamer, which was the notable pedestal of the lamp along the marble surface of the table until it fell from the edge. The sound of the fall was fortunately heard, and by the good sense and activity of the two gentlemen the steamer and how many lives were saved!

Is it the habit of the Sound steamers to supply kerosene lamps to midnight readers? Is it the custom of the watchman in the saloon to drop asleep, or is there no watchman? Do these or other steamers often take fire or explode unnoticed? Without any general knowledge of the fact? These and other equally interesting questions naturally suggest themselves to the reflecting reader. There seems in this instance to be a clear, culpable carelessness somewhere, and it is very clear that the police of the steamer might be improved. We might add, also, for the comfort of the nervous, that passenger who nimbly brought a pail of water and emptied it upon the legs and feet of the gentlemen who were extinguishing the fire, and who was very properly knocking the water out extinguishing it. Of course he could not know at the time that the fire was caused by kerosene, and he will certainly take our suggestion kindly.

One obvious moral of the tale is, that when passengers are ready to go to bed upon the Sound steamers they should glance at the many ble-topped tables in the saloon, and see if any marble-bottomed kerosene lamps are dancing on them.

LITERARY.

THE November Number of Harper's Magazine completes the thirty-third volume, and the thirty-fourth opens upon a prosperity which is alike gratifying and remarkable. Harper's is truly the People's Magazine. It reaches the best classes of society with constant skill, and it is an established domestic institution in thousands of households all over the land. The secret of its success is to be found in the careful variety of its articles, and the graphic and admirable illustrations which adorn them, but chiefly in the editorial sagacity which assumes the popular taste to mean only that, after its long career, the Monthly enters with unflagging freshness upon its new volume. The publishers speak in agreeable and significant illustration of American character. For the Magazine which is thus foremost in public regard is of a quality which no such periodical in the world rivals. Among the promises of the new volume is a tale by GEORGE P. HARSHORNE, the author of the remarkable story of "Old Pinchbeck and the Harems. It is called "The Virginian in Texas," and will be, like "Inside," the work of one who thoroughly understands the life of which he writes, and whose power and skill in narration are established. The papers of picturesque travel, of natural history, of popular science research, with all the pleasant literary miscellany of story, poetry, biography, and criticism will be continued; and the new friends and readers of Harper will understand why its old friends and readers never tire of their cheerful and instructive monthly visitor.

THE HARPERS have published a new and convenient edition of the works of "Felix Holt, the Radical," which will enable all those who place "Adam Bede" and the "Mill on the Floss" among the best novels upon their shelves to add "Felix Holt" to make a uniform companion. The popularity of this novel is very great. It has been strictly the novel of the year, both in England and this country, and has a peculiar interest for us at this time, when the electoral question, which was the great debate of England in the time of "Felix Holt, is engaging every intelligent mind in this country.

"An American Family in Germany," by J. ROSS BROWNE, is a volume of humorous descriptive sketches just issued by the HARPERS, which are well meaning rather than of a great deal of shrewd observation and mother-wit. Mr. BROWNE is known for a vein of peculiar humor, which has found much of its subject in the American frontier life of this country; but his "Yusef"—a book of Eastern travels—is perhaps the work by which he is most generally known, except to the readers of Harper's Magazine, who know him as one of the most entertaining sources of life at the mines. The present volume treats of observations in Germany.

"Hurd through Algeria," and "Visit to the Salmines of Wieliczka," and is illustrated by the author's graphic and lively pencil. His criticisms upon life in Germany are unique and original, and the reader can be very sure that he will find something stale or wearisome in Mr. BROWNE'S pages. He have given my experiences of life and character [he says] in Germany, so that they were picked up in a reckless, harum-scarum way as the vagabond who lies down in a haystack or a stubble-field to sleep, and picks up the husks, burrs, and seeds that happen to stick to his coat." But we warn the reader not to take the author at his word, or it throws the way what is called chaff he will reject plump wheat.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MISSISSIPPI LEGISLATURE.

THE Mississippi Legislature met October 16. Governor HUMPHREYS delivered his message at the opening of the session. The Governor said in regard to the Constitutional Amendment:

"Though our voice can not be heard nor our rights respected in the adjustment of our federal relations, many questions present themselves for our consideration and action as citizens of the State that may affect our condition as citizens in the Union. Prominent among them is the amendment proposed by Congress as No. 14, which, at the request of the honorable Secretary of State, W. H. Seward, I herewith submit for your action. This amendment, adopted by a Congress of less than a quorum of the States of the Union, is palpable violation of the rights of more than one-fourth of the States, and is a gross infraction and total denial of the equal rights of so many of our worthiest citizens who have shed lustre and glory upon our section and our race, both in the forum and in the field, such a gross usurpation of the rights of the State, and such a centralization of power in the Federal Government, that I presume a mere reading of it would cause its rejection by you."

The Governor also opposed the Civil Rights bill, on the ground that it conflicted with State law. He added: "While the Civil Rights bill can not be received as a rule for our guidance, the interests of the State will be best subserved by the recognition of the rigidity of our laws, which, in order to guard society against the freedman, was and is necessary. Public justice to both races demands the admonition of severe punishment in all cases brought before the civil and criminal courts. Now that the negro has shown conclusively that he has abandoned the idea of insurrection, and a desire to engage in the pursuits of honest labor, public and private demand of us the full protection to his person and property, real and personal. Free labor is essential to the protection and prosperity of the laughing, and society should be guarded by regulations which will prevent a tolerance to crime and idleness. Hope be can always secure where his character for good conduct and honesty is known."

DEATH OF JOHN VAN BUREN.

The arrival at Boulogne, on October 16, brought the intelligence of the death of JOHN VAN BUREN, the son of President Martin Van Buren. He took passage on the Scotia in this country against the wishes of his physicians, and died October 12, three days before the steamer arrived. He had intended to take a prominent part in the political campaign in this State.

JOHN VAN BUREN was born in 1810, and was graduated at Yale in 1828, and has been for twenty-five years prominent before the public as a lawyer and a politician. In 1852 he was appointed Attorney-General of New York State by the Legislature. He has always acted with the Democratic party.

THE REPUBLICAN MAJORITY.

The Republican majority in Iowa is estimated at from 45,000 to 48,000.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives has rejected the Constitutional Amendment by a vote of 87 to 5.

DEATH OF A PIONEER.—The merchant ANSON GREEN, aged 74, to Mrs. Alice Hooper, daughter of Jonathan Mason, Esq., of Boston. The wedding ceremonies were performed by Bishop Eastburn.

Mr. CHARLES A. DANA has given $50,000 to found and endow a Museum and Professorship of American Archæology, in connection with the University of New York City. He has also donated $100,000 to Yale College, to endow a Museum of Natural History.

On the 22d October a base-ball match was played at Philadelphia between the Athletic of Brooklyn and the Athletic of Philadelphia, the latter club gaining the victory with a score of 24 against 12.

Since the fire at Portland on July 4, there have been between six and seven hundred buildings erected in that city, mostly three-story brick and granite blocks, containing stores and family dwellings. The total contributions received by Mayor Stevens of Portland for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire but $17,000 of half a million.

HURRICANE AT THE BAHAMAS.

The recent terrific West India hurricane on the Bahama Islands are thus portrayed by Lieutenant-Commander William Hargood, commanding the United States steamer Tuscarora: "The centre of the hurricane passed over the Island of New Providence on the 11th inst., and the scene of wreck and devastation is marvelous and very sad to see. More than half of Nassau is in ruins. Most of the houses are unroofed; many blown to the ground. Some second building from the foundations into the streets. Churches, warehouses, and other buildings of solid stone are shattered as if by a bombardment. The trees are destroyed, leaf and limb, as if by a conflagration. Every vessel was cast and boat is sunk or swept high and dry. On the outer Islands the loss of life is appalling. Three thousand persons are suffering is said to be dreadful. The important light at the 'Hole in the Wall' is not burning. The harbor light here is only a temporary lantern. The lights on the Great Isaac, the Northern frontier light of the country; but his "Yusef"—a book of Eastern travels—is perhaps the work by which he is most generally known, except to the readers of Harper's Magazine, who know him as one of the most entertaining sources of life at the mines. THE MISSISSIPPI LEGISLATURE.

THE Mississippi Legislature met October 16. Governor HUMPHREYS delivered his message at the opening of the session. The Governor said in regard to the Constitutional Amendment:

"Though our voice can not be heard nor our rights respected in the adjustment of our federal relations, many questions present themselves for our consideration and action as citizens of the State that may affect our condition as citizens in the Union. Prominent among them is the amendment proposed by Congress as No. 14, which, at the request of the honorable Secretary of State, W. H. Seward, I herewith submit for your action. This amendment, adopted by a Congress of less than a quorum of the States of the Union, is palpable violation of the rights of more than one-fourth of the States, and is a gross infraction and total denial of the equal rights of so many of our worthiest citizens who have shed lustre and glory upon our section and our race, both in the forum and in the field, such a gross usurpation of the rights of the State, and such a centralization of power in the Federal Government, that I presume a mere reading of it would cause its rejection by you."

The Governor also opposed the Civil Rights bill, on the ground that it conflicted with State law. He added: "While the Civil Rights bill can not be received as a rule for our guidance, the interests of the State will be best subserved by the recognition of the rigidity of our laws, which, in order to guard society against the freedman, was and is necessary. Public justice to both races demands the admonition of severe punishment in all cases brought before the civil and criminal courts. Now that the negro has shown conclusively that he has abandoned the idea of insurrection, and a desire to engage in the pursuits of honest labor, public and private demand of us the full protection to his person and property, real and personal. Free labor is essential to the protection and prosperity of the laughing, and society should be guarded by regulations which will prevent a tolerance to crime and idleness. Hope be can always secure where his character for good conduct and honesty is known."

DEATH OF JOHN VAN BUREN.

The arrival at Boulogne, on October 16, brought the intelligence of the death of JOHN VAN BUREN, the son of President Martin Van Buren. He took passage on the Scotia in this country against the wishes of his physicians, and died October 12, three days before the steamer arrived. He had intended to take a prominent part in the political campaign in this State.

JOHN VAN BUREN was born in 1810, and was graduated at Yale in 1828, and has been for twenty-five years prominent before the public as a lawyer and a politician. In 1852 he was appointed Attorney-General of New York State by the Legislature. He has always acted with the Democratic party.

THE REPUBLICAN MAJORITY.

The Republican majority in Iowa is estimated at from 45,000 to 48,000.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives has rejected the Constitutional Amendment by a vote of 87 to 5.

DEATH OF A PIONEER.—The merchant ANSON GREEN, aged 74, to Mrs. Alice Hooper, daughter of Jonathan Mason, Esq., of Boston. The wedding ceremonies were performed by Bishop Eastburn.

Mr. CHARLES A. DANA has given $50,000 to found and endow a Museum and Professorship of American Archæology, in connection with the University of New York City. He has also donated $100,000 to Yale College, to endow a Museum of Natural History.

On the 22d October a base-ball match was played at Philadelphia between the Athletic of Brooklyn and the Athletic of Philadelphia, the latter club gaining the victory with a score of 24 against 12.

Since the fire at Portland on July 4, there have been between six and seven hundred buildings erected in that city, mostly three-story brick and granite blocks, containing stores and family dwellings. The total contributions received by Mayor Stevens of Portland for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire but $17,000 of half a million.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

THERE are no particular novelties in fashion at the present moment in Paris. One would have to seek for them at Biarritz, where all the beau-monde are now congregated. The most striking toilet we have recently seen was a robe of light gray taffeta, with a train of moderate length, made without gutters in the front and trimmed at the bottom with a silk fringe. A large "biais" of gray satin, in the centre of which was an entre-deux of white cluny, ran down the entire front of the robe, half-way down each side of which was a similar ornament. A small Figaro vest, cut out at the bottom in squares and trimmed at the shoulders and cuffs with gray satin and white cluny, supplied the place of a corsage. The belt, which fastened behind, was of gray satin, and also trimmed with cluny. This robe was worn with a chemisette of plain white crape, with a frill of very fine cluny round the neck. Another toilet worthy of mention consisted of a robe of black foulard, cut round the bottom into large vandykes and lying flat upon a jupe of scarlet cashmere, except at the sides, where it was caught up by two scarlet rosettes. The casaque, also of black foulard, was very short and trimmed with a narrow scarlet piping at the shoulders, the collar, and the cuffs, and with scarlet and black silk buttons. We may mention, as an example of a quiet evening dress, a robe of brown taffeta, with black satin stripes, with a long black sash tied behind. The corsage is made extremely low. With this dress a Spanish "berthe" of black lace, closed at the front with small rose-buds, is worn.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER, 1866.

A MERE SCRATCH.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"Yes, then, is your answer?" said George Gosling, in a voice that somehow rendered almost inarticulate.

George was twenty-four. With the famed old barometer of which he was the representative, there had descended to him the state of Gosling Grange, and sixteen thousand a year. These, with himself, he had poured at the shrine of Miss Mildred Mulcaster, and, from the tone of his observation, it would appear that the young lady had decided in his disfavor.

Sir George had been taken by surprise. The like may be said of the ingenuous, single-hearted reader, when apprised that Miss Mulcaster had arrived at deliberate exaggerations with her lover, accepting a horsehad sing, supplemented with gifts demonstrative but written of, received from him, as many letters as an ordinary postman of these degenerate days could lift; in full, dozen-tempered, and otherwise circled with him at least one hundred and fifty miles; had, in effect, deported herself on all, or most occasions (for she was very much and given to teasing), as an engaged young person should.

"This, then, is your answer?"

"Yes. Take it," said Miss Mulcaster, "and," extending her white hand, "as they say in melodrama, be happy."

She was laughing. But George had not heard the ring of the bell, nor three minutes were before nothing. The laugh was a disguise. Therefore, though stricken with a miserable apprehension, he hesitated for an instant to accept his fate.

"But, Mildred—"

"Miss Mulcaster—Sir George Gosling," interrupted the young lady, as though reintroducing those parties on a new footing.

George resumed:

"You will, you must, forgive me, Miss—Miss Mulcaster—if, at the moment, I can not successfully imitate your self-possession. It is a great gift. I envy you. I will not ask—"

"Don't, if it would be useless."

"Mildred—can you justify this conduct—"

"I shall not try."

"I mean to yourself!"

"It is to myself I have already appealed—my calmer self. Flattered for being at length consulted, that extremely sensible and discreet adviser frankly discerns that the step is unpardonable—as we never, by the way, within the limits of possibility—and that its ever having seemed so is a revelation to my—my common self. I pray

A few moments, and Colonel Lugard was announced. He had been taking his evening ride, and, as was his frequent wont, dropped in for a chat with his fair neighbors.

In the course of conversation the Colonel observed:

"By-the-by I have had what I might almost call an adventure! I was cantering up to the Grains to have a word with Goulding. Good fellow, George. Rides capitally to hounds. I will back'd take them himself out of the hands of that mere horse-jockey, Sevenoye. As I was saying, I was riding up the park, when my horse made a furious swerve. It needed the old dragoon grip to sit and measuring my length on George's turf, so startled was my usually steady old hunter at what he had seen. And what do you think it was? A young lady, Miss Malcuster! Yes, Miss Lucia, a beautiful young lady! We had come suddenly upon her, rounded into view, and she stood in some surprising beauty, or else a scarlet thing that covered her head and shoulders had thrown my horse into the consternation I have described. I had managed to drop my whip in the manœuvre; but even before my groom, Will Crooke, could ride up the young lady had stepped gracefully forward and placed it in my hand. Her hood fell back as she did so, and you see I The Colonel stopped, as if quite overcome by the remembrance.

"Who upon earth could she be?" said Mrs. Mulcaster, looking at her daughters.

"Who, indeed?" resumed the Colonel. "She was plainly, my dear Mrs. Mulcaster, a friend of her cottage class, for I noticed that her hand, though well-shaped and of delicate clean, was not quite white, as if it had not disdained rough work. Her manner, however, was perfect. A precious old churl she must have thought me, for so much was I taken aback by her singular beauty that I merely clutched my whip, grunted, and jogged on. I wish I had stopped and wish I'd gone back. If Will Crooke hadn't been behind me I think I should."

"Very well, Colonel," said Mrs. Mulcaster. "I am coming to call upon Lugard to-morrow, and it will be no painful but imperative duty to place her on her guard."

"It will be a most neighborly precaution," replied the gay veteran: "and, in order to assist your admirable scheme for the promotion of domestic harmony at Bramleigh, I give you authority to say that, for my fixed resolve to find out, by hook or—more probably—by Crooke, who this damsel is."

"Did you not see Geo—Sir George Goulding?" asked the lady of the house.

"I did not see Sir George Goulding, my dear lady. They told me he had ridden over hither, and would possibly not return to dinner. I thought it quite possible," added the Colonel, with a sly glance at Ethel.

Shortly thereafter the visitor took his leave.

Mrs. Mulcaster, who had been watching her eldest born with carefully solicitude, now cut down beside her on the sofa and took her passive hand.

"How pale you look, my own darling!" she began.

"That wicked George! I declare I can not forgive him; vexing my pretty rose!"

"I am quite well," responded the flower addressed. "Come up to me, some of you, in two hours, and see if I am not blushing. Knock softly, and if I don't answer, go away."

And her majesty withdrew.

But she did not go to bed. Mildred sat looking in her glass for half an hour. It was a habit she had, holding these tête-à-tête with herself. Whenever, on this occasion the parties did not agree. She rose pettishly, went to the window, and leaned forth. Resolute and out of place as she was, for the rain fell in sheets, wearing for repose, seemed to rebuke with its severity the evil passions that swelled within her perplexed bosom. Conscience, suddenly awaking, began, in accents stern and inexorable—more distinct, as it seemed, to the keeper-bush—to accuse her of a vice that her willful heart gave way. She began, calculating, to palliate her doings.

"I was mad," she found herself murmuring, as in miserable extenuation. "I was not mistress of myself. The scoundrelism came"—from the days of temptation has always "come"—"on the sudden. If I had reflected I should not. But I never can reflect. Besides," she continued, gaining courage in her self-vindication, "I am not sure that, after all, I was so very wrong. Goulding! Lady Goulding! Don't you? Perhaps I expected that he would have resumed with me. I think I remember having spoken of Ethel. Then, to be found! Stay, though, did he threaten? Good Heaven! if she should do it! Who can this girl be, and in his way at this unhappy moment? What shall I do? What can be done? Fool that I have been! false to my word, to my peace; for now I know that I loved him, and, in resisting him and his detestable name, I have but proved myself a truer Gosling than he!"

With something between a giggle and a sob the beautiful head sank down, and the voice lost itself in genuine tears.

When the obedient Lonies, followed by a maid bearing tea and other restoratives, came, as commanded, to her sister's chamber, a startling change had come over the spoiled one. She was affable, not to say humble, thanked and caressed her sister as she had done since their school-days—sent her love and duty to dearest mamma—who received the latter comment with, at all events, with profound astonishment), declared she was well—better, in fact, than usual—and begged to be left quite alone.

CHAPTER II.

GOSLING GRAITH had been all that day since the meridian in a considerable stir. Mrs. Turnover, the cook, had received an unexpected visit from her niece, Esther Vann, a young lady holding the lucrative post of unremunerated nursery-governess in a poor but respectable family some few miles distant.

Esther was little more than seventeen, but had, like Bellairly's representative, a mind "more elder than her years." A richer rose-bud than Esther never brightened a cottage-garden. What might have been her mother's station, had she been born in a higher station, we can not say. As it was, she merely won all the hearts with which the course of a quiet, humble existence brought her in contact. She had known no schooling beyond what was attainable in her native village: all she knew besides, and that was not a little, being due to self-education and industry.

Esther was already known at the Grains, and her unlooked-for appearance at a moment, too, when the master's absence left every body more at liberty, created a complete rubicic: all the domestics, save Mrs. Mapes, the housekeeper, who was an invalid, vying with each other to make welcome their bright young visitor.

"If ever I see such a blessed creetur in my life!" said Dolly, the dairy-maid. "She have no more pride than my bold slipper!"

Certainly the object in question—frayed at the edges, cracked in the sole, and exhibiting an orifice at the toe —could have small excuse for the vice referred to.

"She's well enough for the matter of that," said Mrs. Turnover, with affected indifference.

"Excuse me, ma'am," said Gertrude Cornish, the house-maid, "but I don't think you're as proud as you justly ought to be. Being as she knows to pop her tip-top bedclothes—which I'm sure a big school boy self—why, you ought to be double proud of such a condescension."

"I done my best for to putt her in the way," said Mrs. Turnover, modestly, "but she 'ave 'elped herself wonderful since. She 'ave a good 'ead for to let her alone."

"If your shu'll marry soon and stock a dairy-farm," observed Dolly, to whom this was the very climax of ambitious hope.

"I wonder what have married a doctor," said Mrs. Turnover, "but I wouldn't hear on it. An 'ectic, sicky young man, always a-feeling his patients but himself, which, my dear, it didn't pay."

"A doctor?" cried Gertrude. "She might marry a duke! Where's Esther shu'll?"

The hardihood of this prophecy almost took away Mrs. Turnover's breath, but, recovering, she progressed that, master being absent, they should adjourn to the great hall, there to meet her niece, on the latter's return from a ramble in the park, in order to share her the family pictures adorning that apartment.

Almost as they entered the great hall, a pitch and rosy from her scamper, made her appearance and told them of her meeting with Colonel Lugard. Then there was a long discussion of the individual—of a shoe, "Hurnor's nose than nothin' at all, nowadays,"—directed like arrows at Duncans, guns, and pistils deer it; don't they, Esther?"

Miss Vann responded that, in her opinion, a gentleman provided with a fowling-piece, and not a revolver, might prove a troublesome opponent, even for a human treacher.

Mrs. Turnover, who was of full habit, though hardy, as Miss Mulcaster had affirmed, "enormous," now took a little repose in the interests of the fair-the party proceeded to inspect the pictures, Mrs. Turnover cautioning her nieces as to caution.

"Sir Tiledrand de Golding, 1432—that is, it were him, but he's rubbed out all but his dog," said the guide.

"Law! what a pity!" said Dolly.

"Which, Mrs. Mapes told me, is on'y makes him the more valuable," continued Mrs. Turnover. "Leftenant-General Sir Redered Golding, twelfth barrowknight. You's 'e a 'eroic-looken man?"

"Why is he a-turnin' of his back to the fightin's?" asked the captious critic, Dolly. "That ain't like a soldier."

Esther hinted that the artist might have experienced some difficulty in arranging the full-length portrait at one and the same time, give his attention to the face and his face to the observer.

"Sir Gilbert Golding, banker and citizen," announced their guide. "Rayther a fat 'un."

"Thick layer of padding," Esther took explains the phenomenon," said Esther, laughing, and exhibiting two dimples which lay in ambush in her rosy cheeks.

"And now comes to the ladies," resumed Mrs. Turnover. "Dame Golding, Sir Redered's wife."

"Miss Hilithes Golding!' I've heard say thesum was the beauty of the barn, when she were married, lived single all her life, and died a old maid."

Dolly sighed. The cook's way of putting it gave the saintly feeble force.

"Poor young creetur! and she so pretty! Cut off in her spring!"

"Died 1705, ætat 97," read the cook. "Well, that ain't so wonderful! But at ninety-two? Stop, though. That's a long while!"

Her niece was absorbed in contemplation of a portrait at another part of the hall; but she heard and answered the appeal.

"'Aged,' dear."

"Come, that won't so bad," said Mrs. Turnover. "If she couldn't get a husband in ninety year it wasn't worth trying no longer, so why did she?"

"It wouldn't like to be an old maid," observed Dolly. "Should you, ma'am?"

"Being a Widow I can be expected to realize any thing so frightful, you see," responded the lady addressed. "If you means to ask me, would I marry again? then I makes answer that I've turned it over in my mind—and my conclusion are, I would. It was my dear husband's last wishes and words. 'Barney,' he sez, squeedgie' my hand, 'I han't seidge, marry again —marry whesoever you're astit.' If you could make Duff men as you've made me, why make me, you know. Don't marry a baker, nor don't he' nothin' to say to a night-porter. Rise to a pleasure—but 'im dead. It makes sexegular sours. To'ave your husband breakfasting when you're at supper, and wicey-versey, is er from comfortable. I should prefer my old perfession. Adoo,' which," added the good lady, wiping her eyes, "she were a bone-feeder."

"A what, ma'am?" asked Dolly.

"Cut and dressed 'air," explained Mrs. Turnover. "Yes, sich was her own perfessional observations' (Mrs. Turnover's first remarks, as reported by his lady, might have filled a moderate volume), 'and sich, lies, is my feelins. I'm in no hurry, but if master marries any body so leet—can't be my relief—as I'm very much afraid he will—then I don't mind sayin' that I should accept the first respectful offer as is made me. Where's Esther got to?"

"What pitur's that she's looking at so long?" asked the dairy-maid.

Mrs. Turnover waddled a little way in the direction of her niece, and came back laughing.

"It's the picter of master, took by Sir Philip's orders, three year ago. It was hung in that dark corner 'cause it looked so new. She thinks it's one of them old Goslings. We won't tell her yet."

As they approached the girl started from her reveries.

"Aunt, aunt, who was this?" If ever there were a real hero Golding, here he is! Tell me, tell me quickly, something about him. Soldier? Statesman? Poet? He must have been one of these. What a brow! And oh, what expression!" continued Esther, clasping her hands in a sort or rapture. "Dear, brave eyes! you look as if every thing vile, pitiful, dishonest, must wither up before you! Aunt, look you, I would trust this man before the whole world. Look at that mouth; sweet, yet resolute. Strong will, too. I should not like to argue with you, Sir George de Gosling, if not be your name. For, in the first place, I know you would be in the right; and, in the second, that you would invariably get your way. If ever I loved man, it would be you."

"My dear, my dear!" said Mrs. Turnover, hastily. "Remember, you are talking to a young gentleman."

"To a young gentleman who flourished only five centuries ago. Oh, nonsense. Aunt, she pushed to a date '1870' scratched on the frame.

"Well, master's handled now!" said Mrs. Turnover, aside to Dolly. "I remember his saying he wouldn't be dubbed under five 'un of the lot, and I see him, one day, scratching with his knife on the picter frame."

"That's the beauty of it, aunt," said the pretty Esther, saucily. "I can say justexactly what I please to this dear darling of my heart, and not be forsworn at all! I could, should, and would have loved him if I had flourished in his time. Do you hear that, Sir? And, if he had loved me back, I could have been the most devoted wife that ever Gosling married. I do think he's smiling, as if he understood and believed it."

"What upon earth is the girl talking about?" began her perplexed aunt. But she was interrupted by an exclamation from the house-maid, who was at the window

"Here's somebody galloping up the avenue!" gasped out the latter.

Mrs. Turnover waddled up.

"Gracious me, if it ain't master! Why, he said he shouldn't be back till to-morrow. Perhaps he's only come back to dress—he do sometimes. Come along, Esther dear. Lo! how he's a-turnin' along! Where's Mr. Plumbert? Oh, he's out, I know. Gertrude, call William—go, Dolly—quick!"

William's run over to the village," said Dolly.

"Then Gertrude must stay and open the door," said the cook.

But Gertrude had disappeared.

"Dolly, Dolly! You small," said Mrs. Turnover. "I'll I himself," said the shy dairy-maid.

The horse's trampling was now heard, and presently a violent tug at the bell-bell.

"What shall I do?" cried Mrs. Turnover. "Where are we all the men?"

"We got upon the door yourself, dear?" suggested Esther, quietly.

"I can't do it, the figure," returned her aunt, struggling with some agitation. "You go, child."

"Then there was another peal." "Hark! What a flurry he be in!"

"I?" said Esther.

"Yes, you. 'Tis the 'ighteal of the very pictur you was looking at. Master himself."

"What?" ejaculated Esther, becoming scarlet. "But the—the duke?"

"That be done himself."

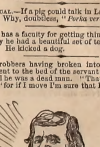
"Aunt, do you call this a joke?" said Esther, hiding her burning face in her hands.

"Nonesense, dear! Run you and open the door."

"Not if he stood there till the first grew into the stones," returned the girl, laughtily; and with the step of a queen she quitted the hall.

Mrs. Turnover opened the door.



HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SPLENDID lounge is exhibited in the Rue Montmartre, which is meant to keep poor with this age of luxury. The price is 60 francs, and a splendid piece of poetry (doggerel) describes its qualities.

CLASSICAL.—If a pig could talk in Latin what would he say? Why, Gooliusy, Porkin vorkus?

Beiges has a faculty for getting things cheap. The other day he had a beautiful set of teeth inserted for nothing. He kicked a dog.

Some robbers having broken into a gentleman's house, went to bed of the servant and told him if he moved he was a dead man. "That's a falsehood, said he, "for if I move I'm sure that I'm alive."

UNCLE SAM. "I'd like to have you fix this Coat for me, Mr. JOHNSON. I've worn it now about sixty-nine years, and it's getting rather too small. But it's a good one yet. Couldn't you fix a sort of Amendment to it?"

A. JOHNSON. "No, I'd rather not; I'm not in the Jobbing line now."

A PASSING THOUGHT.—The great difference between the young and the old is, that the young have the world before them, while the old are behind the world.

A few Sabbaths since a teacher of a Sunday-school was engaged in questioning his pupils upon the wonderful connection with their previous studies of the Holy Bible. And, turning to a young lieutenant, a member of the class, he asked, "What did Adam lose by the fall?" And the young officer, appearing at a brown study, but at last his face brightened, as he intelligently replied, "I guess I'm sure it is his wife."

A doctor who has been trying to establish a practice in Wisconsin says that the village is so extremely healthy that he is actually thinking of there recently for the purpose of starting a grave-yard.

An Edinburgh clergyman, of a rare and quaint genius, was one day crossing one of the Scottish mail coaches thundering down the bridges. "What are you thinking of?" said a reverend brother. "Why, replied this, next to preachin' the everlastin' Gospel, I would like to drive the mail."

"The password is Sure—now don't forget it, Pat," said the Colonel, just before the battle of Fontenoy, at which Sure was shot. Another: "Sweet Kate and I will not. Weren't we fitter a mile?" "Who goes there?" cried the sentinel, after the Irishman had arrived at his post. Pat was as wise as an owl, and, in a sort of whispered howl, replied, "Begor, yer Honor!"

SURPRISING INTELLIGENCE.—At the next Meeting of the Zoological Society a paper will be read "On the Tears of the Crocodile."

HOW TO MAKE GOOD JAM.—Crowd treaty fashionable-beloved ladies into one crowded car.

"A pinch of snuff,
That horrid sniff
Take from my nose," I cried.
Such, Sally, dear,
Was my idea,
Until my husband said, 'You shu'n't.'

"You shu'n't? to me!
Fiddle-de-dee!
Of course I take it on the sly.
But now, dear, dear,
For shu'n't or 'shall,'
What husband can say 'no' to my eye?"

NO FLIES LIKE THE CITY.—The Man who has a Stake in the Country writes to say that he is longing to get back to a Slop in The Town.

A Canadian newspaper contains the following plaintive advertisement: "Will the gentlemen who stole my coat on last Sabbath night please return the same to return me a few of the seeds, as the melons are a rare variety."

Thirteen objections were once given by a young lady for declining a match: the first twelve being the sufficient twelve children, and the thirteenth the sulker himself.

A newspaper editor inadvertently wrote, about a woman who had not been buried with great pomp, that the following sentence: "She was buried like a dog with two children." Next week he published, and corrected it thus: "She was buried with her clothes on like a dog." The third week, surprised with the previous blunders, he had it thus: "Like a dog with her clothes on she was buried." He gave it up.

A glutton of a fellow was dining at a hotel, who, in the course of the "battle of knives and forks," accidentally cut his mouth, which being observed by a whisker sitting near by, he hovicked out, saying, "Well, don't make that a hole in your countenance any larger, or we shall all starve to death!"

Deacon Brown lately took occasion to administer a reproof to old Joe for swearing. Joe listened attentively to his words, seemed to appreciate the admonition, and when he had concluded, replied as follows: "The fact is, deacon, I may swear a great deal, and you may pray a great deal, but neither of us mean any thing by it." The Deacon alludes to Joe as an instance of total depravity.

"Oh, I am so glad you like birds! What kind do you most admire?" said a wife to her husband.

"Well, I think a good turkey, with plenty of seasoning, about as good as any."

The young married couple who thought they could live on love and nourishment had their mistake in virtue in baked beans. For taking the romance out of young folks marriage is nearly as bad as a newspaper.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER XXIV.

CHILDREN, it will never do to tell the grown-up readers of Harper's Weekly all the work that was done that summer by our three little spades; and as I can not tell you without telling them, this must be my last chapter. Many other things that I might say about weeds, and slugs, and cutworms, and caterpillars, must be kept for "The Three Little Spades" to come out in book form, which I hope will be soon. And so, as I am not going through the summer with you just now, the best thing I can do is to jump at once to the end of the summer and finish with that.

Summer was passing softly away, like a sweet dream; vanishing silently out of sight, hiding herself before the frost should come. There had been no frost yet, and the three gardens were in full bloom; asters, and zinnias, and heart's-ease, and amaranthus—there was a splendid show. And the children thought they were as happy as they could possibly be, when suddenly an event took place which proved that when people are gardeners there is no end to their happiness; or rather, that it stretches on in such a long perspective that it is quite impossible to guess where the end is.

The event was this: Mr. Vick sent the children his Catalogue of hardy bulbs for fall planting and spring blooming. Absolutely sent it to them by themselves—a new, fresh Catalogue, with a pink cover, and with such flower pictures inside that Lily nearly screamed with delight at the sight of them. Sam had brought it from the post-office after tea, and now in the lamp-light the three young heads clustered together above its pages. "A double hyacinth!" "A parrot tulip!" "Crocuses!" "You could hear such exclamations every few minutes, but smothered and spoken softly, so as to disturb no one else. The children talked hurriedly, under their breath, even in their wonder and admiration.

"But oh dear! what's the use after all?" said Lily at last, with a long sigh of all my money! I guess Mr. Vick didn't know that."

"I'm very glad he sent it, though," said Clover; "I like to see about things. I think it was a kind of him, Lily. But what are 'hardy bulbs,' I wonder? That's on the cover."

"Hardy," said Mr. May, looking up from his paper with a quizzical face, "mean, in this case, only tulips, hyacinths, crocuses, snow-drops, and such trifles."

Such trifles! Clover and Lily looked at each other, and Primrose heaved a sigh that came from the very lowest corner of her heart.

"They're to be planted right off," put in Jack, peering over at the Catalogue "and then they stick up their heads through the first snow, and are covered with flowers immediately. That's being hardy bulbs."

"Jack Jack" remonstrated his mother. "You are certainly a hardy boy."

"They're so ungrateful and grasping, these girls, mamma," said Jack. "Here they've had flowers upon flowers all summer, and now they're crying for hardy bulbs!"

"We're not crying for hardy bulbs!" said Lily, indignantly.

"Come here, Prim," said Mr. May, throwing down his paper. "let me see your eyes."

Now Prim's eyes were certainly not tearful as she raised them for her father's inspection, but wistful they certainly were. Jack had some reason for declaring that they were full of crocuses and snow-drops.

"I don't see the drops of any sort," said Mr. May, smiling. "Prim, would a dollar's worth of hardy bulbs make your spirits happy?"

Prim laughed—there was no need to say a word more.

"Here it is, then—or rather, here they are," said her father, as he once more took three dollar bills from his pocket-book and laid one before each of the children. "And Mr. Vick happens to have an endless variety of Catalogues what will become of my purse?"

"Pete—don't!" said Clover; "I did not mean to ask for a thing more, indeed, papa! Please take these back."

"On the contrary, I please to leave them there," said Mr. May, with a laugh. "My dear, you did not ask, it's my own pleasure. I want to see what new wonders will bloom out in those fairy-land gardens."

"Well, I didn't mean to ask, either," said Lily, "but I wanted dreadfully."

"Mamma, what are bulbs?" said little Primrose.

A bulb is a kind of thick, fleshy root, shaped like an onion."

And if they're planted in the fall what do they do all winter?" continued Primrose.

"They lie in the earth and wait, Prim," said her mother, pushing back the soft locks of hair from the child's forehead. "Wait till the winter is over and gone, and then with the first soft airs of spring they begin to appear; shooting up their fresh green leaves first, and after that the glory of their blossoms."

"Oh, here are such beauties!" said Lily, from the Catalogue. "'Deep blue, and tall,' and 'white, and low;' and red, and every thing. And tulips—gold striped tulips! It's enough to make one crazy! Papa, there's nothing like you in all the world!"

"Not even a gold striped tulip?" said her father, laughing. "I'm afraid a dollar won't go far among such wonders, Lily."

And in truth it was harder work to make out these lists than those seed-lists of long ago; for many of the bulbs, as Lily said, considered themselves worth a good deal. To be sure, a dozen snow-drops might be had for twenty-five cents, and some of the tulips were but ten cents apiece; but then it was as hard for the children as for one other people quite to withstand the fascination of a higher price; and there was an irresistible attraction to them in those dignified bulbs which only two or three could be bought for a dollar.

"I dare say they think themselves cheap at that," said Lily. "but I don't. I wish I'd got a tall, blue Prince Frederick hyacinth for forty cents, and a low, red Princess Royal—"

"A low Princess Royal!" quoth Jack.

"Be quiet!" said Lily, "a low, red Princess Royal for seventy cents—no, that won't do at all."

"I shall begin with the little things first," said Primrose. "I want some snow-drops."

"Oh, well, you can have 'em," said Lily; "but if you begin with the little things, you'll have no money left for the big ones. I can tell you that."

"How would it do to get one dear thing first?" said Clover—"one of the very expensive ones, you know, just to see what it's like; and then spend the rest of the dollar in smaller ones?"

"That's a beautiful plan," said Lily. "You begin, Clover."

"I think I must have one hyacinth, and one tulip," said Clover, pressing her hands on her flushed cheeks. "I'll take this yellow hyacinth—La Prime d'Or—the rain of gold, you know; that must be splendid."

"Oh, magnificent!" said Lily. "But that's only thirty cents; you must have two more."

"But my tulip is," said Clover—"Dorothea Blanche—very beautiful new white.' It's forty-five cents."

"That makes seventy-five cents," said Lily, quite lost for the moment in Clover's arrangements. "Dear me, how much you'll get!"

"Then with them," said Clover, in the same absorbed way, "this Milton—'very purple.' That goes well with the yellow hyacinth."

"Ten cents more," said Lily—"eighty-five."

"And then one Persian iris—fifteen cents. That's it exactly. You see the iris is 'a magnificent border plant.'"

"There's no picture of it, is there?" said Lily. "Dear me, I wish I could have had a good deal. But here's one tulip at any rate—white, striped with rose—Marriage de ma Fille. I wonder if that's pretty?"

"Extremely—sometimes," said Mr. May, with a mocking tone. But Lily was deep in her Catalogue, and scarcely heard him.

"I guess I won't take that, after all," she said. "I'll have the Grand Duke of Russia, all red and yellow; then, he says, 'mixed colors,' and that's red striped, and fifteen cents—that's thirty-five; and my blue hyacinth is thirty-five more."

"Which hyacinth is that?" said Prim. "This one—A la Mode. I guess that must have grown at Grundy Castle."

"Well, that's only seventy cents," said Clover; "and you haven't taken any very expensive ones after all."

"No, let me see," said Lily, studying the Catalogue. "I guess I'll have to leave them to you and Prim—I want so many things. What shall I do with my thirty cents? Two more hyacinths, and three tulips? Here are some little ones, the earliest of all, but they've got no names. I'll tell you all I have a fancy for—"

"Oh, get this one—the Hoop Petticoat," said Primrose.

"Carb," said Lily; it costs fifty cents. I'll get Butter and Eggs—that will do just as well, and be nice when spring comes. Eighty cents—and then one of those blue grape hyacinths over here—ninety cents."

"Those blue grape hyacinths are the Blue Bells of Scotland," said Sam.

"Are they?" said Lily. "Now, ten cents more. I think I'll have a white tulip, too, among all these blue and yellow things. That's a good one—La Reine; rosy white, and just ten cents."

"Now, Prim," said her father, who had been listening with great interest to the last items, "come here and sit on my knee, and let us see what sort of a choice you will make. You can only, and I will look over your shoulder. What comes first?"

"A white lily, papa," said Prim, putting her down. "And a brave parrot tulip; and a blue flag—fifty-three cents, that makes. And I must have one hyacinth, you know," said Primrose, turning back to that part of the Catalogue. "This one, papa—rose ingenome. And then six crocuses."

"Named or unnamed? Thousand cost twice as much as the others."

"But I like 'em so much better!" said Primrose. "I want the Cloth of Gold, and the Cloth of Silver, and the dark-blue King William, and the striped Captain Cook, and the light-blue Passetout, and the white Bijou."

"How much does that come to?" said her father, smiling.

"Let me see, papa. I said fifty-three cents, and rose mignonne is thirty, that's eighty-three cents; and six crocuses are twenty cents more. Oh, papa! that's three cents too much!"

"I'll stand the three cents," said Mr. May, looking with much loving amusement at the intent, earnest little face.

"But that wouldn't be fair, papa."

"Then you shall give me some of the crocus flowers when they come out. I bespeak a dark King William and a striped Captain Cook."

Primrose laughed and looked very happy, and the three lists were at once inclosed in an envelope, ready for the next day's mail.

"I suppose," said Mr. May, standing on the rug and looking at his wife, after the young ones had gone to bed, "that you would as lieve have our hardy bulbs display their colors in the children's gardens as any where?"

"Could not be a better place," she answered, smiling.

Thereupon Mr. May sat down and wrote another order, and put it in the same envelope; and the children in their little beds never even dreamed what he had done.

In due time the bulbs arrived, beautifully packed in a little box, and at first the children did not notice how much too large the box was for their small lists. But when they began to pull out the little packages of bulbs, and loose seeds in which they were stowed, and to read new names on this one and that one, they were almost beside themselves. Each little package separately wrapped in soft paper, with a nice printed label; and when they had said a few times, "That's yours, Clover," or "That's Prim's," they began to say, "And how much is this?" and their father, standing by and laughing at them, said, "You will have to divide." But they could not. But even Mr. May was surprised, after that, by a whole package of snow-drops, for which nobody had sent, but which Mr. Vick had put in "by way of experiment," he said.

"Papa, what can he make him do it?" said Primrose. "Did you tell him I wanted 'em, and hadn't enough more money?"

"No, I did not tell him that," said her father, laughing. "But some people, you know, do more, and some less, than they are asked. Now Mr. Vick likes to do more."

"Well, I wish every body did," said Primrose "it makes people so happy!"

"But oh, papa," said Lily, "just listen to the colors of our tulips! Clover's been making a list of them. Listen, mamma, dear. Clover, read."

And Clover read:

"Gold striped purple; gold [as (whatever that is!)]; white, red, with a yellow edge; rosy white; white and red; blue; orange striped; golden yellow; striped with crimson; red striped; pure and white (what's puce, I wonder?); white, striped with rose; and copper, striped with violet."

"And then there are red and blue and yellow hyacinths, and snow-drops, and six crocuses, and a Narcissus, and a white lily, and a Persian iris. It's just like the Arabian Nights," said Lily; "and we shall be as happy as the day is long!"

"Or as the spring is," said her mother, with smiling eyes, that were yet for a minute as wistful as Prim's own.

THE END.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

On one of those delicious Indian Summer days which October brought to be last week the Committee and Trustees of Woodlawn Cemetery, with over a hundred invited guests, made an excursion to that new burial place. To accommodate this party a special train left the Harlem Depôt about half past one in the afternoon. The day was perfect for the trip, fresh air, mingled with that yellow haziness so characteristic of the season, the most charming view of the hitherto almost forest-leaves, the pleasant company, and the courteous attention paid to the guests, made the ride a very pleasant one.

Woodlawn Cemetery is situated on the line of the Harlem Railroad, four miles above Harlem Bridge, and is about an hour's ride to the city from Twenty-sixth Street. On reaching Woodlawn Station we found that a private conveyance had been made for the convenience of the party. Refreshments were served throughout the afternoon in the Lodge at the entrance, carriages were in waiting for the use of the visitors, and information on all points easily obtained.

The main avenue of the cemetery, and the first steps from the station, is by a high, wide stone bridge, planted over a ravine, and a running brook which forms a beautiful little pond below. The gate and lodge, surrounded by a grove of forest trees, are on elevated ground, a natural terrace which border the Central and Northern avenues on one side are not quite so central, but give, on entering the inclosure, an immediate sense of picturesqueness which is peculiarly appropriate. The Cemetery contains over three hundred acres of undulating ground, much of wood-land hills, overlooking the valley of the Bronx River, and commanding numerous and picturesque views. Although the Cemetery has been but less than two years ago, great progress has already been made in tasteful improvement. The introduction of roads, sents and arbors, which were scattered here and there throughout the grounds, attracted our special notice as being a very desirable feature. Many of the lots are surrounded with nourishing hedges of arbor vitæ—in fact, hedges of evergreens are to be recommended rather than iron fences—and certainly have the beauty of simplicity. There are two large receiving tombs on the Central Avenue, with Gothic entrances, with suitable arrangements for temporary use.

A drive through the principal avenues gives one a general idea of the natural advantages of the site, and of the plan of the grounds. Greenwood is an unsurpassed and beautiful cemetery. Woodlawn seems as lovely as possible in its own way—is a quiet, rural, rural-place. And for passing a couple of hours most pleasantly in Woodlawn, we returned to the city, feeling that this new cemetery, both from its beauty and convenient location, will become a favorite resort of our citizens as an appropriate spot for the resting-place of the dead.

The most extensive shatter in this country has recently been completed at Communipaw, a little over a mile from the depôt of the Central Railroad of New Jersey. This extensive work commenced about four months ago, and is a gigantic work in every sense, consisting of the main buildings, with a sufficient number of spacious feed and sale pens adjoining, and all other needful conveniences.

A Maine journal has a glowing account of two new passenger cars which have been put on the Eastern Railroad within a short time. Improvements in cars and saloons are being constantly managed with an eye to show than to comfort, but there seems to be one exception found in these cars, and that is the space there is between which are layers of saw-dust to deaden sound, and conversation can be carried on without difficulty while the cars are in motion. This is a real improvement which we should be glad to see adopted on all our railroads.

On Thursday of last week a meeting of a somewhat novel character.—"Fall Reunion" as it was termed—was held at the New England Church in West Forty-first Street, near Sixth Avenue. A few months ago a new Congregational Church was organized here—and this was, as it were, the christening of the infant enterprise. The house was well filled, and the exercises were of a social character, consisting of music by the choir of the church, assisted by friends, and addresses by the Rev. H. W. Beecher, Rev. J. T. Duryea, Rev. S. H. Tyng, Rev. Dr. Adams, and others, acting pastors of the church, and others. Mr. Beecher was greeted with spontaneous applause, and spoke in his usual happy vein on the elements needful in a true Congregational church—good nature, cheerfulness, sociality, and congregational singing being prominent ones. All the addresses were marked by a kindly welcoming spirit and were warmly applauded. The entire part of the evening the lecture-room was thrown open and refreshments were served, and the latter part was filled in social greeting and pleasant interchange of thought and feeling.

If some unseen individual could pass around from house to house about ten o'clock on a Sunday morning, he would be likely to hear a lot of excuses for not attending church, something like the following:

Overslept myself. Could not dress in time. Too cold. Too hot. Too windy. Too rainy. Too wet. Too dusty. Too muddy. Too cloudy. Don't feel disposed. No other time to myself. Expect a letter by this evening's mail. Newspapers to rights. Letters to write to my friends. Nothing to wash, starch, or iron. Have to attend to business six days in the week. No fresh air but on Sunday. Have to sleep. Can't get ready in time. Have a headache. Severe cold. Not a little chilly. Feel very lazy. Expect company to dinner. Have no bonnet nor coat nobody.

The following from Punch gives the following, which will amuse those who are fond of reading Dutch:

"Now have not I a pleasant prospect for Christmas-day? Every one down and this old wretch telling me most horrid stories. Still it is my cheery here than in my bedroom. Just poke the fire."

Wilkins got up and poked the fire.

"Oh! old fellow," he said, "I'm awfully sorry for you; keep your courage up; I shall be back the day after Christmas, and then I shall come and read Paley in your room. But here is Edwards to say how fine it is here. Good-by, good-by!"

As my friend left me I felt more desolate than I had ever before felt in my life. I was far too distant from home to think of returning for the few days I could spare from reading for my degree, so had accepted an invitation to London, where I was to have escorted two pretty cousins to all sorts of concerts and balls. I had looked forward to my visit with great pleasure, and it was a bitter disappointment. My relations lived in Cornwall, so it was quite out of the question that I should come down to see me. The weather was such as is to be seen in Cambridge; the thick fog choked up the courts, which seemed to contain the thick damp air like boxes; all the rooms were empty, and there were no lights burning to give a look of life to the ivy-covered court. The grass-plot was covered with dusty patches of thawing snow, and the university bells, which were ringing for Christmas, cease like a muffled peal ringing for a funeral through the thick atmosphere. The kitchens were the life after one o'clock, and the head cook was to be seen, for the only time in the year, clad in ordinary apparel. The streets were full of men, looking like so many degenerate class of university men. The same short, sheetig, and long Noah's Ark coats, the same hunting hats and whiskers; as Willkins said, it was like a terrible dream; you crossed the street over and over again, believing that you saw a friend, but immediately recalled back again when you found it was but his grip in his old things. The time of the university was passed, gyps and shop-boys were the ruling power, and the unfortunate undergraduate who remained up during Christmas was withered by the contemptuous glance of the servants and shop-boys, who looked upon him as an intruder, and any how as a man without a friend, and therefore to be despised.

The streets, lit by the lamps, which had to be lit before there o'clock, looked sad enough, but some of the colleges were terrible. King's College Chapel, with its four corner towers, looking like some enormous mastodon or other antediluvian animal, lying on its back, with its four legs lifted up into the thick air, and the whole running along the streets like ghastly skeletons of mysterious beasts that the huge animal now lying supine on his back had devoured and was vainly endeavoring to digest.

The big Court of Trinity was sad beyond description, vast, damp, and mysterious. The fountain, with the nibbled head with a terrible monotony, only broken by an occasional drip of snow water from its roof, and a large icicle hung and dripped from the nose of the king above the gate. But the hideous climax of desolation was on the Bridge of Sighs which joins one new court to the old buildings of St. John's. Large masses of ice floated slowly along the river, and the cold evening air sighed in the iron frames of the roof, and made the passage-way damp, cut tighter round him and quicken his pace, shuddering at the terrible gloom of the grim black buildings, dripping windows, dark mysterious river, and the abomination of desolation around him.

Perhaps the most cheerful college room in the university at Christmas-eve was mine, and the most desolate though it appeared to me. The fire burned brichtly, and the mustard-plaster which Mrs. Car had put on my chest helped to keep me warm, as the doctor had said that I must not be left alone. Mrs. Car had a party at her house, to which several bedmakers and a washer-woman had been asked, and I hear it went off very cheerfully, as my illness caused a pleasing topic of conversation.

A deputation was Mr. Maitland always, and to think of him a-rowing yesterday, which to me is madness, seeing instead of putting on great-coats on that grievous river, they strips as nobody wears their skins. An inflammation at this time in those rooms, always damp, is most dangerous, and he too in face the moral of Mr. Avis". This he'll be to me, the college funerals that any of the party remembered being talked of. Mrs. Car began with poor Avis. "Barring," she said, "the said, "poor creature, her, that X = g—g, and such like un-Christian remarks, to which I said, 'And oh, Sir, to think of you be dying,' by which he said, and I still shudders as I thinks of it—' Therefore MX = Bi, quod erat diagrammach," by them is the very words I'll be died and buried content like, that lasting as proved."

Of course I did not hear any of this, but Betsy the help, who came into my room directly after the tea was over, all of the exciting topics that had been discussed, repeated them all for my edification.

Betsy was to sit up with me, and as I could not sleep, I required her gossip, which amused me.

"And who else did here, Betsy?" I said.

"Oh, many a one, Sir. Mr. Baker, number two, took pison, as at least Mr. Cannon the coal-porter avers, but for Sir! none of 'em had such a tale as I had, but I did not tell it, seeing that modesty is a precedence over helps, and it was not my turn when I had to come to you, Sir."

"What a tale, Betsy?" I said, feeling almost inclined to laugh at the little demure woman sitting bolt upright opposite to me, her face drawn up with a look of importance and mystery I had never noticed before.

"Well, Sir," she said, and though I shall give the story word for word as she gave it to me, I shall simplify some of the sentences which were somewhat involved, and not inflict Betsy's H's and omissions on my reader.

"Well, Sir, I must tell you, though only a help myself, my family for three generations have been connected with this college, my mother being the large washer-woman, and my grandmother before, and a better one for getting up surplices there never was, at least as my poor mother used to say. In as many years ago now since my grandmother was bed-maker here; I remember her as a child, an old woman, clean and most respectable to look at, as all our family ever were, sitting in the chimney-corner at home; she was then nearly eighty, and had been pensioned off fifteen years, but had as good a memory as ever, and many was the tales she used to tell me about the gents she did for. Of course you know, Sir, college isn't now as it was then; the rooms are sitting in was part of the Master's old house, and that is the reason why the fireplace is covered over with that curious oak-carving. This room, so my grandmother used to say, was one of the bedrooms; through that panelling across the staircase was a door leading to a long passage which the Master in old times used when he went out to the college-library, which you know has been pulled down.

"Well, Sir, when my grandfather was first made bed-maker, Dr. A. was master—a great scholar by all reports, but one who bore his head rather too high.

"The young gentlemen did not like him, no more than did the college-servants; for the smallest of the gentlemen used to be sent down, and servants dismissed. Among those most liked by the servants and the young gentleman in general, was a Mr. Bond, as lived down in a many, my grandmother declared, as ever came up—over six feet two, with black curly hair, an eye like a hawk, and a laugh as did one good to hear.

"The college servants would have done any thing for him, as he spent his money like a prince, gave sixpence to all and never shut the door unseen, and had a cheery word for every one; and that is, after all, what they like better than any thing.

"There was nothing Mr. Bond couldn't do. He kept two horses, hunted in pink, rowed better than any one else, sang songs of his own writing, and made love; and this leads to the sad part of the story.

"Well, Sir, never being at lectures, and giving wine parties, when the latter used to be so great that it could be heard in the street, was not the way to make him a favorite with the Fellows and Master.

"He was brought before the grand young gentlemen, he was hated by the tutors and Master, the latter especially; for one night after having dined with royal gentlemen, his door was screwed up, and painted pea-green. Who did it, no one for certain knew; but the Master and every one believed it to be Mr. Bond.

"Dr. A. had a daughter, the loveliest girl ever seen; grandmother used never to tire of talking of her beauty, bright golden hair, and tall, slight figure; Miss Dorothy was her name.

"Her mother had died when she was a child, and her poor young lady had a solitary time of it from all accounts. The doctor was too much taken up with his books to give much attention to anything, and he (as he was well born) to let her associate much with the other young ladies in the town; and so the poor girl lived a most solitary life, always looking out of the window into the court-yard, or wandering listlessly about the old home, exploring all its corners and passages.

"There was no college chapel in those days; the young gentlemen used to go to St. Bennet's Church. The Master had a high pew there, for the Master in which was generally occupied by Miss Dorothy, who used to come (as grandmother would say) fluttering in by herself like a bird, and look all round her blushing like a rose behind the red curtains, for all the young men could not help looking at her as she came in, she was so pretty, and what is more, she knew it.

"Mr. Bond, from all accounts, was not a very religious young gentleman—indeed, my mother said he did he ever miss; and this, I believe, saved him from being sent down on several occasions, when he got into some mad scrape. But I am wandering from my story that he went to look at Miss Dorothy, but when they first spoke to each other they did not know, though seen in church, they had never met. I'll dare say, Sir, you will wonder how my grandmother came to know so much as she did; but you see, Sir, there was a great deal of time in the winter, and when Miss Dorothy was taken ill my mother acted as nurse, it being vacation-time, and so was the servant your lady's mother had lent her used to fill her every thing, and seemed happier talking to her about the sad story than at any other time.

"I told you, Sir, that grandmother thinking there was a private passage to the library; the key was kept in the Master's study, and no one was allowed to go in it but he.

"The first time Mr. Bond ever met Miss Dorothy was when the Master's door was open, and the Master sent for Mr. Bond, suspecting him, though unable to prove any thing against him. The young lady and gentleman met on the staircase. Miss Lady and gentleman met on the staircase. Dorothy had never noticed Mr. Bond from her window, and seems, Sir, to have taken such a fancy to him that every young woman would have done. Suddenly and Friday, she was at the window to see him walk through the court, looking like a prince in his red coat, and Mr. Bond looked up, I mean Edge. I remember the name, for when my father started his donkey and cart to take the clean linen home, my grandmother begged him to call at Edge too.

"Miss Dorothy, as I said before, was timid as a fawn, and never looked at Mr. Bond on the staircase. Trying to get quickly out of his way, she would have fallen, being tripped up by the red-cloth, if he had not put out his hand and caught her.

"This was the first time that a word had passed between them, and it was only an expression of regret at her clumsiness on the one side, and pleasure on the other that he had been able to save her from a fall. Still it was something to others.

"Miss Dorothy used to ride. Mr. Bond met her first as if by accident, but in time met her every day, fixing her going out hours, for he knew not to reveal that his young mistress had any other companion than himself. For some time these rides were not on well enough, Sir, for she should they meet but the Master himself. He was driving with the provost of King's in a close carriage, and prefended not to recognize the couple.

"However, when he got back he sent for the groom and dismissed him on the spot. Then he sent for Mr. Bond. Miss Dorothy was coming crying and pale as death out of her father's study when she met him.

"'Bless you, my darling,' he said, as she passed him.

"It is all my own fault; cheer up; I ought to have spoken to your father before; he can't object to me as a son-in-law. I am rich and well-born, so don't cry, my pet.' Then he went into the study, and she into her room.

"The Master was white with fury when Mr. Bond entered the room.

"'Sir,' he said, 'you are no gentleman; you are a disgrace to the university. I shall expel you.'

"'And what for?' asked Mr. Bond, doing his best to remain his passion at the insulting tones of the old man.

"'What for, Sir? why, for insulting me: it was you who fastened up my door, you who dared to ride with my daughter.'

"The first of those charges you are not in a position to prove, Sir,' Mr. Bond, politely; 'and the second, I fancy, would hardly be deemed a reasonable cause for expulsion by the university authorities, who must know the true sentence. There was truth in this, and the Master knew it. 'But,' continued Mr. Bond, 'I humbly beg your pardon. I have acted wrongly. I should have spoken to you before. Your daughter loves me: may I make her my wife?' and Indeed, Sir, you shall never rehear language committed such a jewel into my keeping. For God's sake, Sir, forgive us. You were a young man once, indeed, indeed—'

"'Quiet, young man' shouted the Master, who had set his mind on Miss Dorothy marrying a distinguished man, a man who was then undergraduate at Trinity, and had shown her considerable attention. 'Quiet! I care not for the honor you would honor me with. Leave me, Sir, and never let me hear of either of you two speaking to each other again, or it will be the worse for both of you.'

"Mr. Bond left the room in a towering passion. 'You have no right to separate us, nor shall you, by Heaven, Sir! I am in a position to support a wife, and your child is of age. Good-by for the present, Sir!'

"Good Miss Dorothy heard of the Master and the bother quarrel between them, showing Mr. Bond out. The young lady came, blushing and crying.

"'Oh, dear father, forgive us both; he loves me so much, and he is so good and noble; we did not intend to keep it secret from you any longer; do, dear, good father—it will break his heart and mine too.'

"'Child,' said the old man, savagely, 'get up at once, and no more follys. You shall never speak to Mr. Bond again. Promise me never to see him again.'

"'Oh, father, I dare not promise you that. God knows I would do any thing else to please you, but it would be death to me and to him also. Oh! have pity, he loves me.'

"'Love you, child!' said the Master, 'don't flatter yourself; a man so devoid of principle as he has has told many a girl the same story; he has been making a bet, Miss, for a bet between another. I despise the man. Get up!' Here he laid his hands roughly on her shoulders. 'Get up, child!' He rose to his feet, white, pale as a statue, without saying another word. 'Stop,' he cried, as she reached the door. 'I shall swear never to speak to that bad young man again.'

"'Never, father!' cried the girl, her eyes flashing with passion. 'Never! I cannot so speak evil of Mr. Bond. He is good and noble, and I love him. I will not promise you this.' Without waiting for an answer she rushed out of the room.

"But her self-possession did not last long; she ran up stairs and threw herself on her bed (in this very room, Sir), and when her maid came to call her, she was still crying as if her heart would break.

"'Oh, miss,' said Nancy, as she came in, 'what is the matter? you a-crying your eyes out, and the Master furious. And, oh! I'm ashamed to tell you of it, but it is true, Miss, it is cruel like; you are not to leave the house all the week till Tuesday, when you are to go to your aunt in Wales.'

"'So I am a prisoner, am I? and you are to be my jailer. My father is kind and considerate. Get me some tea.'

"Then Miss Dorothy got up, set her things straight, and determined not to show her sorrow to her maid; but Nancy told my mother it was no good, the poor young lady was wretched about her father and Mr. Bond, and never got a wink of sleep all the night.

"Next morning she thought she would try once more to overcome her father's resolution, but he was incensed at her display of temper the evening before, and refused to see her.

"Miss Dorothy was allowed to go into the little patch of garden where the stables used to stand. Once morning she went out to get a breath of air, and to look at her horse, as was her custom, she found the groom who had been dismissed packing up his little property for you.'

"'Oh, I am sorry you are going to leave, William, and I am glad I have met you to say good-by. Here's a little present for you.'

"Williams touched his hat as he took the sovereign. 'Bless your pretty face, miss, don't care about me. Master has taken me on to look after his hunters, and miss' (here he lowered his voice to a whisper, though there was none within hearing, 'my new master bade me give you this 'ere, and I am not to go till I has an answer, "No," says he, "not if your old master blows your brains out."'

"Dorothy took it trembling up into her room; it was a little letter in pencil-hand, and she had the leave of Heaven to let him see her once more. She had once told him, he wrote, that she had discovered a way from her window to the old college library, and as she was forbidden to leave the house, would she meet him there; it was their only chance.

"Dorothy left her room, and went to the study: the key was in its old position, and she took it. As she passed by the window she saw her father crossing the court-yard in his surplice. It was some time before the passage-door would open, at last the latch lifted, and, hardly daring to breathe, she walked to the library door. Not daring to open it at first, she knelt down and listened: the place was as still as death. In a few seconds' time she heard the door open, and a light footstep on the floor, then a voice humming a familiar air.

"Without waiting longer she timidly turned the key and entered the room. That passed between the two I never heard, but the interview was interrupted by the sound of some one on the stairs. Miss Dorothy started.

"'We shall be detected, George,' she said. Still he held her.

"'Dearest, love,' he said, 'or I shall die.'

"Yes, I promise; God forgive me,' answered she. Then she closed the library door, and ran back to her room, and there was there arranging a dress, and started as her young mistress entered, she looked so lovely, with her cheeks still flushed with the hot kiss her lover had imprinted on them, and the excitement of the meeting.

"As the clock struck nine Miss Dorothy stole down stairs, the hall door was open, and she was soon out of the college gates. There was no gas in the courts and streets in those days, and the porters who saw her hurry across the court took her for one of the bed-makers. 'Wrapping her cloak round her, for it was a cold November night, she hurried along the street, nor did she stop till she reached the end of Parker's Piece, where a fly with two horses was waiting.

"Williams the groom was there, but no one else.

"'He should have been here before, miss; clocks are striking nine and more. I'm afraid you will catch your death of cold.'

"'No, thank you, Williams. I shall see him soon, or if I stop here I shall die, dear! I wish I had not come. It is too late to go back?'

"'Go back! why, bless you, miss, he will be here in a minute. Look there, ain't that him? No, he was to come alone.'

"'Oh yes, alone,' said she, shivering and beginning to cry. 'How wicked I am!'

"'Quiet, miss, for Heaven's sake. Get into the fly: it's the carriers, I can see their bands, you will be suspected.'

"She sprang in, and Williams lowered the shutters. The horsemen were three in number, they had seen a woman's dress, and were suspicious.

"'Who have you there?' one asked, as he came up.

"'A lady, Sir, if you have no objection.'

"'Any one else?' asked the other, 'no member of the university, no, I hope: no, I am sure, it is a suspicious place, please to open the door.'

"The door was opened, and they looked in. Miss Dorothy sat in the corner, and pulled the veil over her face. The moon was shining brightly, and in the procter she recognized Mr. Hardy, the senior fellow of Corpus, who had been a good friend of her father's, and who might have won her heart if she had not met Mr. Bond.

"'I beg your pardon, madam,' he said, raising his hat, but not recognizing her. 'You must forgive the liberty I have taken, but we are forced to be very careful. Has he closed the door?' to the coachman.

"'Yes, Sir, but shall I see you before night?' Miss Dorothy says he spoke in a most impudent way, words to your young misuse, and then I shall see you.' But he never came, so I follers former orders and come home.' And come home they did, up, them great gates is shut, and the porters won't let him out. But what had we better do now, Sir?'

"'Oh, take me back, take me back!' she cried. 'Oh! I wish I had never come. I will ask my father to forgive me.' As she spoke impudy and cruelly of George, still I am very wicked. Oh, drive me back!'

"'If I were you, miss,' said Williams, 'I should not go back to college; there's no cause, as I sees, that the Master should know any thing about it. He thinks you are in bed, and nobody can slips in with bed-makers, and no harm comes of it.'

"'Oh, Williams, but then where can I sleep tonight?'

"This question puzzled him, and he scratched his head in silence. At last he said, 'Well, miss, I've you've seen me afore vehicle; I'll keep you on the box; eh, miss?'

"'Oh no, Williams, you know you would die of cold. I must go back; perhaps he will forgive me.'

"Williams went on faster some piece of harness prevented him starting; in a minute he returned, and lowering the window, looked in again.

"'Bless you, miss, what a fool I am not to think of it before; why, miss, you are if you goes back it must be through the porter's lodge, as the other entrance shuts early. A deal of gents may be in the court. You will not like to go by yourself; s'pose you come to my sister's, eh?'

"Oh no, Williams; I should die if I met any one in the court. Thank you for thinking of Mrs. Gifford; she was my nurse, and I know would have pity on me.'

"Well, Sir, you know my grandmother's name was Gifford, and she was sister to Williams, he being my mother's uncle. Mother was then only ten years old, but remembered the night Miss Dorothy came to our house.

"She and her father and mother slept in the same room. They had been in bed about two hours when they were awoke by a knocking at the door. My grandfather sprung up and looked out of the window.

"'Why, bless me, wife,' he said, 'if there ain't that brother of yours. What on earth is up now?

* Betsy must have meant "demonstrandum."

Coming in a minute, lad,' he said, as George again thundered at the door, 'you'll wake the whole street.'

"Grandfather threw his wife's shawl over his shoulders and ran down stairs. In less than a minute he was back again. 'For Heaven's sake, old lady, get up; here's a pretty go, your beautiful young creature, and perished with cold.' Then he turned round to my mother, who was sitting up wondering in bed, and told her to go to sleep. This my mother pretended to do, but was far too excited and curious to do more than close her eyes. Her father and mother were soon both down stairs, and the sound of a tinder-box being struck, and a fire lit, soon reached her ears. In another hour's time her father returned alone to bed, and in the next room she heard her mother trying to pacify some one who was sobbing loud enough for her to hear through the partition. After a time all was quiet again, and she did not wake till her father rose; he was one of the buttery-men at Trinity.

"Then she got out of bed and listened: there was more crying in the next room; she went to the bedroom door and looked out, and saw a tall young lady, very beautiful and pale as snow, pass hurriedly along the passage, followed by my grandmother.

"Mother says she never saw a lily of the valley without thinking of Miss Dorothy, as she looked then, so frail and trembling, with her white face bent down.

"The Master had discovered his daughter's flight, and was beside himself with passion. Grandmother knew this the night before, and was not so much surprised that Miss Dorothy had come to her house at that late hour as she would otherwise have been. She was Mr. Bond's bell-maker, and going to his rooms about chapel-time she had noticed his portmanteau locked and lying on his bed, but had seen nothing of him. He had not slept in college, and no one knew any thing about his whereabouts. There was nothing else talked of in college but the disappearance of Mr. Bond. That Miss A. had intended to run away with him, thanks to the diligentness of my grandfather and the Master's servants, was never generally known: at last, like all other wonders, it ceased to interest any one. All knew Mr. Bond was a mad young gentleman, and cared for no one: what more likely than he should have betaken himself to his home in the north for a week's change, and had not cared to consult the college authorities on the subject? Still to Miss Dorothy, my grandmother, and others, there seemed some mystery which they could not fathom. Nancy, the lady's maid, who slept in a little room out of her mistress's, had sat up till past three, waiting for her return. Twice in the middle of the night she started up, hearing something like a cry of distress coming seemingly from the college library. At first she thought it only a dream, for she was anxious and nervous about her mistress, but the next time she felt that it was more than a dream, and woke one of the maids, who sat up the rest of the night, Sir, by this very same fire here, Sir;—but there was no more sound, so Nancy believed it to be a dream, till what was discovered afterward proved it to be no fancy.

"Well, Sir, I need not tell you that the Master was furious about Miss Dorothy: at first he threatened to turn her out into the streets, but his pride prevented him doing this, as all the university would have known his disgrace, so he wrote off to his sister in Wales, begging her at once to come and take her back with her, and in the mean time strictly forbade her to leave the house. At the time of which I am speaking, the Master's house ran along the west side of the old college library, and there were two small oak-paneled rooms at the end of the east corridor, which were separated from the rest of the house. In these rooms Miss Dorothy was confined; they were well suited for the purpose, for there was but one means of escape, and that was actually through the Master's study, which had a door opening on to the further end of the passage.

"Poor child! she was miserable indeed, and Nancy her maid hardly liked to leave her alone for a minute, she was so low and nervous. One evening Nancy had to go out into the town, and Miss Dorothy was left alone.

"It was getting dusk, and the solitude of the dark old room frightened her. It seems that the library was connected with her bedroom by means of a small door opening in the panel. This door was not visible from the library, as it was covered by another thicker door, which was covered with books, and was not distinguishable from the rest of the walls. Miss Dorothy had noticed the door in her room, a door which had not been used for years, and of the existence of which I believe the Master himself was not aware. As she wandered about the room, feeling too nervous to sit still, her eyes fell upon an old-fashioned key lying in the corner of an oak cupboard. Taking it in her hand, she determined to try the door on the opposite wall that she had watched the morning before.

"Grandmother happened to be that evening in the housekeeper's room, when suddenly she heard a piercing cry—a cry, she says, she can never forget, so full of horror was it.

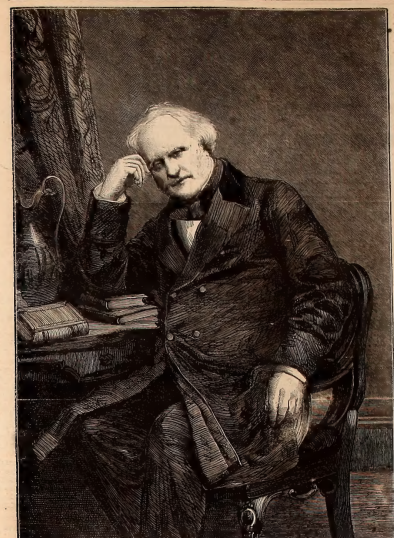
"She started to her feet, and just at that minute Nancy dashed into the room. 'Oh! did you hear it?' she cried. 'Come with me, come with me.' All three started off, pale as death, and met the Master, who had heard the scream, hurrying in the same direction. They opened the door, Mrs. Brown the housekeeper bearing a light. On the floor, pale and rigid as marble, lay Miss Dorothy, the door in the panel open, and just in front of her, and across her feet, lay Mr. Bond, his hands stretched out and clenched, rigid and cold as a statue, as if to embrace her, his once handsome eyes staring lustreless out of their sockets, and the marks of corruption already on his beautiful face.

"Miss Dorothy was taken back to her old room here, but only survived her shock two days.

"An inquest was held on the body of Mr. Bond, and the verdict returned was accidental death. It seems that the poor young gentleman, knowing that as an undergraduate he had no right in the library, after Miss Dorothy had left him, seeing one of the book-shelves swing back, had retired behind it. It was the librarian who was entering, the shelves of the door were empty, and he filled them with the large volumes that lay on the table, and then left the room.

"When the room was empty Mr. Bond no doubt tried to leave his hiding-place, but the door closed with a bang, and the heavy books that had been placed on the shelves rendered all his attempts to force it open vain, and what is more, excluded the air, for the doctors all agreed that the cause of death was suffocation. The door the young lady opened corresponded with the door in the book-case, and when the double doors were closed there was just room for a man to stand up between them. The body, which was in a standing position, fell down at the wretched lady's feet as she opened the door in the panel.

"And this, Sir, is the story as my grandmother used to tell it, and many were those among the servants who rejoiced when the old library was pulled down; unearthly noises and screams, it was said, were often heard there; and indeed, Sir, there were several who declared that they had seen Miss Dorothy herself more than once in her shroud, kneeling and lifting up a skeleton hand before the door which had made a living tomb for her love."



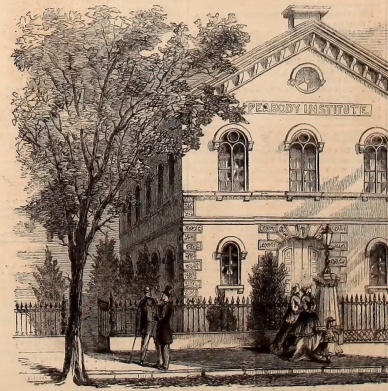
As Betsy finished her story I looked round my room, and a shiver ran through me; nor could I sleep one wink, thinking of the sweet young lady who died in the very room where I was lying, and never shall I forget that Christmas-eve and Betsy's tale.

A LEGEND OF CORPS.—"YES, I PROMISE! GOD FORGIVE ME."

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT STOCKBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.—SKETCHED BY J. IVES TEASE.—[SEE PAGE 702.]

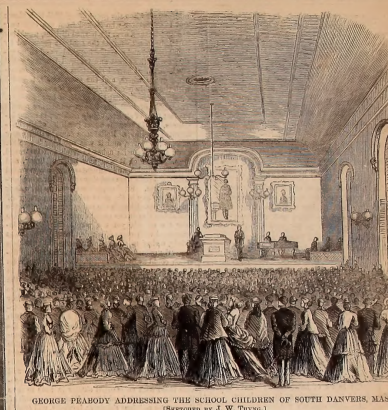
GEORGE PEABODY, Esq.

THE PEABODY INSTITUTE.



We give on this page a portrait of GEORGE PEABODY, Esq., the eminent American banker in London, and public benefactor, accompanied by a poem; also sketches of the exterior and interior of the Peabody Institute at South Danvers, Massachusetts, and of the snuff-box presented to Mr. PEABODY by the Lord Mayor and citizens of London.

The Institute is a brick building, ornamented with freestone. It was erected in 1853, and was Mr. PEABODY'S gift to his native town. It was dedicated in December, 1854. The library on the first-floor contains 12,000 volumes. On the second story is the lecture-room. In an ante-room there is an original portrait of General HARRISON, painted in 1840. The portrait of Queen VICTORIA, soon to be presented to Mr. PEABODY, will be deposited within the Institute in a fire and burglar proof vault. The gold snuff-box (about 5 inches long by 3¼ wide, and 2 deep) is kept in the library for public inspection.



On the arrival of Mr. PEABODY in this country from England last spring he was tendered a reception by the citizens of his native town, South Danvers. This at the time he declined; but in accordance with his own wish, on October 15 he met the school children of the town. The Hall of the Institute was entirely filled with children; all the schools in town, eight in number, were represented, and between eleven and twelve hundred scholars were present.

Shortly after 10 o'clock Mr. PEABODY entered the Hall, accompanied by his sister, Mrs. DANIELS, Mrs. ERZA SUTTON, and the Board of Trustees; and as he ascended the platform the children rose in a body and greeted him who had done so much for their welfare with waving handkerchiefs, to which Mr. PEABODY responded by waving his own in return; on seeing which a shout of welcome arose spontaneously from the scholars.

Mr. PEABODY delivered the following appropriate address to the children who had assembled to greet him:

THE PEABODY INSTITUTE, SOUTH DANVERS, MASSACHUSETTS.—[SKETCHED BY J. W. TRYON.]

GEORGE PEABODY ADDRESSING THE SCHOOL CHILDREN OF SOUTH DANVERS, MASS. [SKETCHED BY J. W. TRYON.]

"MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS.—Nearly two generations have passed away since I left this my native town, with probably less education than even the youngest among these I now address, and with no prospect of future success in life beyond that of any boy now before me who possesses good health, industry, and perseverance, with a heart and mind determined to make pure principles his guide.

"My course is well known, and, I fear, too much appreciated by our whole country; but praise, even but partially deserved, tends to stimulate to extra exertion, both physically and morally, particularly the young; and I hope and pray that every one who is now within the sound of my voice may experience, as I have, the truth of these remarks, and derive that profit and satisfaction which are sure to attend all those who conscientiously strive to do right and benefit their fellow-men. All of you, my young friends, should aim at a high mark in the respect, and undoubtedly many of you, members of both sexes, will arrive at distinction in society.

"But neither my regard for truth nor past experience will justify me in promising any one of you that great success which has ever attended me; scarcely one in a million attains to it; and I feel most sensibly that it is only by the guidance and blessings of my Heavenly Father from early life to my present advanced age that I have been enabled to accomplish so much for the purposes of laying the foundation for the mutual comforts of the needy, and the promotion of knowledge and morality for the present and future generations.

"As you advance in life you will find that years will appear short in comparison to those occupied by your studies at the present time. This is my second visit to my native land for thirty years, and the period appears short to me; time and generations pass most rapidly. But I was not long since, on a beautiful sabbath day, I addressed, from the front of this Institute, the scholars of the Danvers schools, numbering, I think, over seventeen hundred, and I then said to them, 'I would tell you remember that but a few years will elapse before you will occupy the same position toward your own children which your parents now hold toward you. The training you are now receiving, therefore, is a precious talent, for the use of which, on each one will be on a future day called upon to give an account.' This language, my young friends, I will apply to you now, as I then applied it to them. Where are now that assemblage of nearly two thousand scholars? In the short space of time I doubt whether fifty of them occupy the place of scholars here to-day.

"Many of them have become husbands and wives, and nearly all have entered upon the duties, the cares, and anxieties of more mature life. You have taken the places which they occupied in 1826, and by the great centennial celebration of the birth of our glorious Union, in 1876, they, your fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters, will have taken another step forward on the stage of life, and you will take the places they now fill. Be prepared for that important change while your present high privileges of learning remain open to you. On the 5th of October, 1866, I did not anticipate the pleasure of being here at this time, but God has graciously permitted me, living beyond the allotted limit of threescore years and ten, to return and enter upon the realization of hopes and plans which I have entertained for many years.

"And to endeavor to show my gratitude for His goodness and watchful care by taking further and wider action in extending to the inhabitants of my native town, of my native State, and my native country, not only for the present generation but to those who will appear and act upon the stage of existence in future ages, the means of mental culture and moral improvement.

"At my advanced age I can not expect again to meet you, collectively, and it is to me a saddening thought, for though since I addressed your predecessors at the time I have mentioned I have met many assemblies of children, and to some I have spoken, founded on a long experience, words of simple advice and caution; yet in none on either side of the Atlantic can I feel so deep an interest as in the children of the schools of South Danvers. They seem intimately associated with thoughts of my childhood and early youth; they take the same lessons, they occupy the same play-grounds, and their feet tread the same paths over which I once trudged to school.

"With such feelings, therefore, I earnestly exhort you, my dear young friends, to strive by your present advantages to prepare yourselves for a life of usefulness in the responsible positions which you are to fill, to honor, and, if necessary, protect and support your parents; to never depart from the path of honor and integrity; and, above all, remember your Creator in the days of your youth, and when you are old He will not forsake you." Farewell! Farewell!"

GEORGE PEABODY.

We mourned the old chivalric times,
Their virtues, with their glories, dead—
Life stricken wholly from romance—

"And what is left to us?" we said;
Up through the land the murmur rose:
"Oh for the days that are no more,
When love of God wrought love of man,
And all were human to the core!

"The great Arthurian days we mourn,
And all the lapsing years that wrought
Change after change, yet evermore
Some varying phase of splendor caught;
Still noble deeds, still gentle lives,
Still every knightly form grew cold,
And Valor's sunset-radiance lit
The tourney of the Cloth of Gold.

THE GOLD SNUFF-BOX.—[SKETCHED BY J. W. TRYON.]

"The poetry of earth is dead:"
What lesser grief should we bemoan,
With Science in the place of Faith,
With quicken'd brains and hearts of stone?
Our noblest triumphs mock our skill,
We link the Continents in vain—
It only tends to sordid ends,
And whets the appetite for gain."

So from our lips remonstrance fell,
When through the land a rumor went—
"The old heroic fire revives—
Its pulsing force is not spent!
The record of the glowing past
Shows in its dim and doubtful page
No deed like that which greets the eyes
Of this debased, prosaic age.

"For, lo! a Queen of sovereign sway,
Of noiseless empire, quits her throne,
Stooping to welcome one who comes
A nameless and unknown:
No comely youth in knightly guise
Shining at ruffled beauty's knees—
A silvered head, a homely form—
No more one queenly woman sees.

"No more; but in her heart there glows
The memory of a noble deed,
Of succor to her people lent,
Of purity laid in sorest need.
And gracious is her tearful smile
As forth she thrusts a trembling hand,
And bids him in her name receive
The homage of her grateful land."

Homage to Goodness! Queenly meed
Of generous thanks to simple Worth!
Thus does the old chivalric soul
Survive the lapse of time birth;
Nor doubt its promptings in the heart
Of him—his nation's noblest son—
The largest of whose liberal hand
A sovereign's thanks has rightly won.

Never did truer beauty clothe
The radiant limbs of courtly knight,
Than clothes that brow serenely smooth,
And fills those eyes with gentle light.
To latest time shall honesty form,
And that familiar, kindly face,
The holier memories of men
Will with a tender beauty grace.

Where'er that honored name is heard
The tears will gleam in woman's eyes;
The hearts of men will stir and creep,
And blessings to their lips will rise.
Though Science yield the mastery of worlds,
It needed yet what he has done—
A noble action, meekly wrought,
His knit the hearts of both in one.

Yes, and as, far above the glow,
When in the West is fierce with flame,
A faint star brightens to the night,
Deep'ning about it—so his fame,
Surviving all the transient bloom
That makes the passing present bright,
Will shine, and still resplendent shine,
An orb of ever-gathering light.

ST. ROCH, QUEBEC.

To the north of the Rock of Quebec, and in the very shadow of the steep old cliff, lies the suburb of St. Roch, which, previous to the disastrous conflagration of the 14th October, was a closely-packed agglomeration of houses, occupied by some 20,000 inhabitants. The present writer, having resided for some time at Quebec, can realize the scene of desolation presented by this district, which has been almost exclusively inhabited by French Canadians of the poorer class. Ship-carpenters, riggers, and mechanics in various branches of skilled industry connected with the ship-builders' craft here had their homes; for the River St. Charles—commonly known at Quebec as the "Little River"—winds close by the northern edge of the suburb, and it is on the banks of this narrow but deep stream that the principal ship-yards of Quebec are situated. There are few more picturesque views than that to be had from the high cliff near Mount Pleasant, where the rood winds down Sawagneau Hill to the flat, marshy tract beneath, called the Bijou. It is from this point that the sketch looking over the suburb is taken—a point just below where the marshello-tower stands upon the edge of the cliff. Here, while St. Roch is good intact, it was pleasant to stand and look down upon the dense mass of buildings that stretched away to where the "Little River" empties its waters into the great St. Lawrence. Beyond this stretches the Bay of Quebec, sweeping in deep indentations along the Beauport shore to a point where the eye rests upon a deep cleft in the precipitous bank, and a short way above the opening of this cleft the magnificent Fall of Montmorency hangs down like a silver scarf tossed against the dark-brown rock. From the point just referred to, however, Montmorency is not visible, being shut in from the spectator by the western bank of the cleft. Further away there extends a serrated ridge of blue mountains, which form the horizon beyond the beautiful Isle of Orleans, a glimpse of which, dotted with white villages, is visible in the middle distance. Nothing can be more lovely than this scene on a calm autumnal day, when the bright tints of the foliage on the nearer mountains lend the charm of color to the landscape.

Many years ago it was the fortune of the writer to view the scene just described under circumstances of a visitation similar to the one by which St. Roch has just been desolated. It was about midsummer when the great fire of 1845 took place; and the spectator who looked from the cliff near Mount Pleasant, over the burned district, would not be likely soon to forget the contrast presented by its blackened and smouldering gables and chimney-shafts with the sweet and tranquil landscape that lay beyond. Charred skeletons of timber frames work every where, and the summer air, poisoned with the sickly odors arising from the scorched carcasses of animals that had perished in the flames. Thousands of homeless beings wandering amidst the lost lines of streets, vainly seeking, in many instances, to discover the exact localities of their obliterated dwellings. Relief soon came in from other quarters, however, and it was not long before St. Roch arose from its ashes in fresh and improved form. Much of it was rebuilt again in brick, and massive churches and convents of gray stone reared their steep roofs here and there above the more lowly structures. St. Joseph Street was for a time the street than any in the more aristocratic portions of Quebec; but although the red of the brick was the prevailing hue at one time, and the bright tiles over the suburb, yet the whole quarter was interspersed with nests of wooden houses, and it was chiefly owing to these flimsy tenements that the late fire early gained such headway that no human exertion could avail to check it. The pressure upon the destitute habitans, or the upper peasantry of St. Roch, is heavier by far than it was after the calamity of 1845. Then they had much of the summer before them in which to arrange for shelter while their houses were being rebuilt. Now the inclement—nay, savage—winter of Eastern Canada is close at hand. In the midst of Quebec the elm trees are bare of their leaves already, and the summer birds have flocked away to more hospitable climes. In four weeks at farthest the river will be shrouded with snow. Tents will be of little avail then for the protection of the sufferers; and it will require almost superhuman exertions to provide them with substantial shelter in time to save them from terrible hardships. The great wealth of the various religious fabriques, however, will enable the priesthood to do much toward alleviating the sufferings of the unfortunate citizens of St. Roch.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT STOCKBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.

A very beautiful Monument of brown freestone has been erected in the public square in front of the Episcopal Church at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, to the memory of the brave soldiers who went from that town and laid down their lives in the recent war against the Rebellion. The Monument is 24 feet high (exclusive of the foundation), was built by J. G. Batterson, Esq., of Hartford, Connecticut, and cost $2000.

On the front, or south side of the Monument, are the coat-of-arms of Massachusetts and the shield of the United States; and above this, on the shaft, are a spear and flag and two wreaths crossed. The whole is surmounted by an eagle, most beautifully executed, with wings outspread, as if just taking its flight.

The inscriptions on the Monument read as follows. On the south side:

To Her Sons,
Believed and Beloved,
Who died for their Country
In the Great War of the Rebellion,
Stockbridge,
In grateful remembrance,
Has raised this Monument,
A.D. 1866.

On the north side:

To Bravery and Patriotism.

On the east and west sides are the following names of soldiers from that town who died in the war:

1st Mass. Inf.—Major William D. Sedgwick, Adj. Gen. 6th A. C., Joseph Ratshon, Michael Mullady, Thomas Hogan, John Dyer, William V. Rice.

37th Mass. Inf.—Thomas Hogan, Edward W. Newton, Charles Parsons, Cornelius Miller, Stephen Kirby, Frederic Mills.

1st Mass. Cav.—James W. Clary.

37th N. Y. N. G.—Corporal Marshall B. Brewer.

49th Mass. Inf.—Godfrey Wollinger, Wells Fuller.

54th Mass. Inf.—Joseph Ellis.

5th Mass. Bat.—Captain Elson T. Dresser, Sergeant Henry S. May, Sergeant Edward Crosby, Charles Jones, Edward Clary, Charles Hathorn.

9th Conn. Inf.—Harry H. Watson.

20th Conn. Inf.—Sergeant-Major John S. Root.

1st Conn. H. A.—Henry Bacon.

On the four sides of the shaft are also inscribed: Wilderness, Gettysburg — Antietam, Chancellorsville—Spottsylvania, Petersburg—Donaldsonville, Andersonville.

The services appropriate to the dedication of this beautiful Monument took place on Wednesday, the 17th inst., at 11 o'clock. Harry D. Sedgwick, Esq., of New York, delivered the address. William Pitt Palmer delivered a poem.

BASE-BALL MATCH IN BROOKLYN.

We publish on page 697 portraits of the "picked nine" of the two celebrated Base-Ball Clubs—the "Atlantics" of Brooklyn and the "Athletics" of Philadelphia. These Clubs played a very interesting match game in Brooklyn, on Monday, October 15, which resulted in victory for the "Atlantics," who scored 27 aglains 17. The Club is thus the Champion Base-Ball Club of America. In our illustration the position of the "Atlantics" occupy the fore-ground of the picture.

THE PRESENT NUMBER closes the Thirty-third Volume of Harper's Magazine. The Conductors believe that in variety and interest it has been exceeded by no periodical Volume, and their arrangements insure that this interest and Volume will be fully maintained in the ensuing Volume.

In the Number for December will be commenced "The Virginians in Texas," a Tale by ensconce F. Hallenden, author of "Inside: a Chronicle of Secession." This tale was written just before the breaking out of the late Civil War, but its issue was postponed in consequence of the events of that time. The Author, at the time a resident of Texas, describes the life and adventures of a Virginian Planter, who, with his family, emigrates to the "New Dominion." The tale is of special interest at the present time, setting forth what Texas was before the war, what it now must have been but for the war; and what it may yet become notwithstanding the war, when liberty is secured, law maintained, and industry restored under the Union.

General Sherman will continue his "Personal Recollections of the War;" and the various departments of the Magazine, whether furnished by the Editors or by Contributors, will be maintained in such a manner as to merit a continuance of the favor which the Magazine has received for almost Seventeen Years.

Terms for Harper's Magazine and Weekly, 1867:

Magazine, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
Weekly, One Copy for One Year.....4 00

An extra copy of either the Weekly or the Magazine will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance, or Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the Magazine, each Volume containing the Numbers for six months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, and sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each Volume containing the Numbers for one year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid.

 The Postage on the Magazine is now 24 cents a year, payable quarterly, semi-yearly, or yearly, at the office where received.

The Subscriptions from the British Provinces of North America must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, and 52 cents for the Weekly, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine and Weekly will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires, as entered on our books. In renewing a subscription it is desirable that the Number with which it is to commence should be stated. The name of the post-office, County, and State should be plainly written. State, should be distinctly written: Thus—"Renew subscription to [Magazine or Weekly] commencing with Number —. John Adams, Jackson, Pike County, Ohio."

In changing the direction, the old, as well as the new address should be given. Thus: "Change address of [Magazine or Weekly] from John Adams, Jackson, Pike County, Ohio, to Mary Adams, Franklin, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania."

The Magazine and Weekly are always stopped when the term of subscription expires. Notice is necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Subscriptions to the Weekly can commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the first Number issued after the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the Weekly commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the first week after the Number next after the receipt of his order.

 Back Numbers of both Magazine and Weekly can always be supplied.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or a Draft payable to the order of the Publishers of Harper & Brothers, is preferable to bank notes, as should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

 Those who wish to renew subscriptions, or to commence with the present Volume, are requested to notify Harper & Brothers at once, in order that the Subscription-Book may be promptly adjusted.

STARTING OF

The Great American Tea Company.

The proprietors became fully convinced, several years ago, that the consumers of Tea and Coffee were paying too many and too large profits on these articles of every-day consumption, and therefore organized Tea Grand American Tea Company to do away, as far as possible, with these enormous drains upon the Community, and to supply them with these necessaries at the smallest possible price.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the American Importer, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors

1st. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Tea.

3d. The Importer makes a profit of 10 to 20 per cent. in many cases

4th. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 100 to 500 packages, at an average profit of about 5 per cent.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade, at a profit of about 20 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

8th. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFITS HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these many profits as many brokerages, storages, cartages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than other dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, storages, cartages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for the services of our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on the whole, will not supply pay as.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently expect getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following 4 kinds from their stock, which are recommended to meet the wants of Clubs They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

Remember the Little Ones;

THE DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN OF OUR COUNTRY'S DEFENDERS.

Grand Charitable Fair AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL

IN AID OF THE

Home and School for the Maintenance and Education of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

THIS HOME ARD SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1862 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union. Its sphere of usefulness is constantly increasing, the children now numbering over 130; and daily are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied solely for want of room to accommodate them. The old and unsuitable building (on Fifty-eighth St., New York) now occupied must be removed for the erection of such a Home as necessity demands; and this call is made upon the Public with a firm belief that the Patriotism and Generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the Little Ones, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, that will be a lasting monument to the cause of charity as a fitting response to the trite assertion that "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

Mrs. General ULYSSES S. GRANT, President.
Mrs. GEN. F. DAVIS, Acting Vice-President.
Mrs. Major-Gen. J. C. FREMONT, 1st Vice-President.
Mrs. Rear-Admiral FOOTE, 2d Vice-President.
Mrs. JOHN S. FOSDICK, Treasurer.

Mrs. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.
Mrs. WM. S. HILLYER, Corresponding Secretary.
Mrs. HENRY G. LAW, Manager.
Mrs. J. J. VAN DAMM, Manager.
Mrs. JOS. H. WHITE, Manager.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

The undersigned desiring to express our sympathy and unite our efforts with the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, located in the City of New York, do most cheerfully co-operate with the Ladies composing the Managers of the Grand Festival, as a Supervisory Committee in their approaching "FAIR AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, October 6, 1866.

Whereas, Messrs. Thomas & Co., as Managing Directors of a Charitable Enterprise, have made due application to T. M. Egan, Collector of Internal Revenue for the Ninth Collection District of the State of New York, for permission to hold a "FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL," and presented to him satisfactory evidence that the proceeds of such Enterprise will be devoted to charitable uses, permission is hereby granted to Messrs. Thomas & Co., to conduct the said FAIR AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL exempt from all charge, whether from special tax, or other duty in respect of such FAIR AND FESTIVAL.

(Copy.) THOMAS HARDY, Acting Commissioner.

The following Card will be fully appreciated by the Public, as it receives the thanks of the Institution:

"To the Managing Directors of the Festival:

"Sympathizing with your object, I take pleasure in tendering you, gratuitously, my professional services on the occasion of your Festivals. EMMONS HOWARD."

The Fair will open on the 10th of December, and continue two weeks, at the PUBLIC HALL, corner of Broadway and Twenty-third Street, New York. To be concluded by the

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

I.

AN AMERICAN FAMILY IN GERMANY. By J. ROSS BROWNE, Author of "Yusef," "Crusoe's Island," "Land of Thor," &c. With illustrations by the Author. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

II.

FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," "Scenes of Clerical Life," "Romola," &c. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

III.

ALL IN THE DARK. A Novel. By J. S. LE FANU, Author of "Uncle Silas," "Guy Deverell," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

It has the charm upon the delicacy with which it suggests the natures of two loving women, one a coquette, vindictive, and cruel, and the other her young companion, Violet Dunkesell. The delicacy of the sentiments of Aunt Dinah's character is equaled by the sketch of the beauty of young love in Violet Dunkwell. This is a book which deserves to be re-printed among those in years to come.—Examiner.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above WORKS by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT. CAPITAL PRIZE, 30,000 DOLLARS.
KELLEY'S GRAND NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT will positively take place at the WABASH AVENUE RINK, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, NOVEMBER 15, 1866, when over 50,000 Prizes, valued at HALF A MILLION DOLLARS, including $100,000 in GREENBACKS, will be presented to ticket-holders.
A CARD.—We announced that the North American Prize Concert would be given on the 28th of September; but the time set we found to be too short to complete a work of such gigantic magnitude as we were compelled, in justice to ticket-holders, to extend the time to November 15, at which time it will positively take place. For fifteen years we have been engaged in the gift business, and we point with pride to the reputation we have won for honesty and integrity. Many of the prominent citizens of Chicago will bear us out in the statement that we never have made any promise to the public which we have not literally fulfilled. In spite of all opposition, we still live, and shall prove to the public that the North American Prize Concert will be given at the time advertised, and that the prizes advertised will be distributed fairly, impartially, and without reserve.
Arrangements for the drawing are completed. The checks, 500,000 in number, are ready.
The plan of drawing adopted is the following: Duplicate numbers from 1 to 500,000 are placed in a wheel; the first number drawn out secures the highest prize, the second the next highest, and so on, until the whole 250,000 prizes are drawn.
We advise all parties contemplating tickets to send for them at once. All orders for tickets up to Saturday, 10th November, will be promptly filled.

The distribution will take place, after the concert, where 20,000 persons can witness it. A committee will be appointed by ticket-holders to take charge of the same.
All agents and purchasers will be supplied with a correct list of the awards as soon as published.
Price of tickets, $1 each. Sent by mail on receipt of price and 5-cent stamp for return letter.
Special Terms, or Club Rates.—Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and sending us the money for the same, will be allowed the following commission. We will send five tickets to one address for $4 50; ten tickets to one address for $9 00; twenty tickets to one address for $17 00.
Send the name of each subscriber and their post-office address, with town, county, and state in full. Money by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, will be sent at our risk.

Read what the Chicago Press say:
From the Chicago Times.
NORTH AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT.—Among the first gift enterprises ever commenced in Chicago was that of Messrs. A. A. Kelley & Co., which has been perpetual for more than three years past, and has given the most gratifying satisfaction, if we are to judge by the numerous testimonials which they have received. They are the proprietors of the "North American Prize Concert," now so extensively advertised in this and other papers, and indorsed by some of the best men in business circles in this country. From what we know of Mr. Kelley and his firm, we feel sure that he will, "in the future as in the past," deal fairly and honorably with all who take stock in his enterprises.
From the Chicago Journal.
KELLEY & CO.'S GIFT ENTERPRISE.—The first to embark in the gift enterprise business in Chicago was the firm of A. A. Kelley & Co., located at 116 Randolph Street. Who does not remember their store, which opened two or three years ago, with many purchased bonds and other articles, and were so lucky as to find with their purchases tickets which entitled them to valuable gifts of jewelry or other prizes? Thousands of our citizens were then fortunate, and doubtless have the best evidence that Messrs. Kelley & Co. always perform all they promise; that they are honorable men, and do business honorably and on the square.
The original of Kelley & Co., who knew A. A. Kelley & Co., have nothing but words of praise and integrity, and are largely investing in their enterprise.
There are none of the enterprises of the day we feel safe in commending Kelley & Co.'s gift concert to the public.

ARKANSAS TRAVELLERS.—SKETCHED BY A. F. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 700]

ARKANSAS TRAVELERS.

IN regard to the picture of ARKANSAS TRAVELERS on our first page our artist, MR. WAUD, says:

"Being desirous of making a perfectly truthful representation, I have refrained from adding a double to the outfit of either of these gentlemen, although, out of respect to the time-honored custom of Arkansas travelers, the temptation was great. The little group is sketched just as it appeared. They are calculating the chances of crossing a bayou and cedar swamp. On what enterprise they were bound deponent hath no knowledge; what long-looking fellows, armed with the long rifle, no intimate acquaintance seemed desirable. I am not fair however, to judge from appearances, and they were probably good citizens enough as times go; certainly the presence of the bundles of provender with the owners of them carried grave evidence of their intention 'to live off the country.' If they were bound on a hunting excursion they have the artist's best wishes, out of a powerful fellow-feeling for the sport."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1866.

THE PRESIDENT'S MANIFEST.

THE most important recent political publication is the letter of Mr. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior, to some of his former constituents. Its importance is not due to its authorship, for Mr. BROWNING is not a prominent known to the country; and although he was for a time Senator in Congress, he did not succeed in making his opinions remembered by the public guidance. The significance of his letter is that it speaks for the President, who read and approved it. It is therefore a Presidential manifesto. It apprises us of the spirit in which he receives the popular judgment to which he has incessantly appealed.

Unfortunately the letter abounds in platitudes. It formally announces that our Government is worth preserving—a truth of which the people who have carried on the late war may be supposed to have some glimmering consciousness. But mere platitudes are harmless. When, however, the Secretary of the Interior proceeds to argue he is simply dogmatic and feeble. He tells us that the Legislative Department of the Government is the only one from whose encroachments serious danger is to be apprehended for our institutions. He says he differs from JEFFERSON, who considered the Judiciary the menacing department, and from the loyal people of to-day, who see in the conduct and claims of the Executive the plainest public peril. If Congress were not restrained by the Constitution, says MR. BROWNING, what might it not do? The President also is restrained by the Constitution, but what has he not done, and tried to do? If MR. BROWNING had been born a Spaniard of the thirteenth century, it has father had been his mother, there really is no knowing what would have been the present price of sweet-apples. Inasmuch as Congress is created by the Constitution, and acts in obedience to it, it is rather useless to speculate upon its possible action if there were no Constitution.

We are further instructed that our system is destroyed if the States are not respected in their appropriate spheres. That is indisputable; nor does it admit of much debate that these two make four. But the constitutional limits of State rights—the national authority in composing a prodigious war—these are our present questions. MR. BROWNING leaves us in doubt that one of the sovereign rights of a State—for like MR SEWARD he falls into the bad habit of speaking of State sovereignty, a thing which has no existence—is to exhaust every effort to destroy the Union, and upon its failure to resume all its national relations without the smallest security against a similar effort, except the fact that the first has failed.

MR. BROWNING objects to the disabling clause of the Amendment, without the slightest reference to the fact that the disability may always be removed by Congress, either in special cases or altogether, as good policy may prescribe. He says that it is an unparalleled proscription, and that it is not to be supposed that the educated—by which he means the late rebel—class of the Southern States will submit to it. This is an echo of the DOOLITTLE Philadelphia address. But the New Orleans Picayune says that there are plenty of able men at the South who are not disabled by the Amendment; and the Charleston News is of opinion that there is no way of return to national representation but by submission to the Amendment. And after all, is it cruel, despotic and inhuman provision? It is simply that those who in order to overthrow the Government have violated an oath to support it shall not hold office until Congress is satisfied that they safely may. It provides that a man caught in an attempted murder shall not have a knife presented to him with the request of the intended victim. This may be an outrage greater than any since the days of PHILIP II. of Spain. But there are minds to which the late exhibition and its Andersonville and other methods were not altogether an airy jest and gallant tournament, and to which the conditions now offered to the offenders are the most clement ever recorded. The Administration theory apparently is that there are several millions of criminals at the South who owe their lives to the law. But as it is impracticable to hang men by the hundred thousand, that the only alternative is to give them greater power as legislators.

The President, it appears from this letter which he has read and approved, does not regard the result of the elections as indicative of public opinion upon the Amendments. We are sincerely sorry that he is so deluded. He has read the speeches, platforms, and papers of the political parties very carelessly if he has not seen that the whole issue has turned upon the Amendment. Vermont, Maine, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, and Iowa have spoken to that point and no other. Even if they have not, indeed, expressed themselves upon impartial suffrage as a condition of restoration, which MR. BROWNING insists is the real question, for the question of the contest has been the policy of Congress or of the President. That of Congress has been triumphantly sustained, and that policy has been indicated not only in the Report of the Committee and the proposition of the amendments, but in the admission of Tennessee. If the President has not seen it, it is but another illustration of his blindness. The truth remains nevertheless, and if the Southern States see with him, who does not see at all, they will surely stumble to their destruction.

But we find one passage of this letter which is valuable. It is that in which the action of the President toward Congress is foreshadowed. MR. BROWNING denies that the President has ever done any thing to encourage the assertion that he would try to force rebels into Congress; and, by implication, the Administration says that Executive will not fail to treat Congress as the representatives of the people, however wrong he may consider its conduct toward the unrepresented States. This is by far the most important remark the President has made—for it is really his. It denies upon his part any intention to do any thing but protest. That is his constitutional official right, and the right of every citizen. If the Secretary's letter had been confined to that statement, and published as approved by the President, he would have been a valuable public service; and as we have no doubt it was written for the express purpose of saying that, our regret is the greater that the statement should have been drenched with such prolix fallacies and follies

HIGH PRICES.

IT is again asserted that the Government has been selling gold. MR. MCCULLOCH and his subordinates, after the most careful inquiry, have assured all inquirers that the Government would not sell any more gold. To that determination they adhered at a time when the operators of the Gold-Room had control of the market, and gold was worth one half per cent. a day. They did not depart from it at the time when gold was above 150, and the mere rumor that the Government was selling would have put down the price 5 @ 10 per cent. But now, when gold is 146 @ 147, when there is no scarcity of specie for the payment of customs, and on the eve of the disbursement of $24,000,000 in gold for interest on the public debt, the Department is understood to be a seller once more.

Explain the phenomenon as you may, all Brest is baffled, and profanely remarks that the Treasury moves in a mysterious way its wonders to perform.

It was understood among those who are supposed to enjoy the confidence of Treasury officials that MR. MCCULLOCH's newest theory was to accumulate in the Treasury a fund of specie sufficient to enable him, at some not very distant day, to resume specie payments with gold coin of the whole of his circulating obligations. For instance, if he had paid off his compound legal tenders and exchanged the bulk of the first series of Seven-Thirty notes for long bonds, he would have in the Treasury $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, resume payment on half the existing legal tenders, dividing them for the purpose into classes by date or numbers. In addition to this a still smaller accumulation of coin would enable him to retire the remainder of his legal tenders, or to issue an equivalent amount of bonds. With a large excess of specie revenue over expenditure, the scheme seemed feasible enough. But if the Treasury is going to continue to sell its surplus coin, it is clear that the scheme is never ripe.

So far as we can judge, the country is getting tired of high prices. Almost every thing which we eat or drink or wear or use in any way is dearer now than it was during the war, when gold was 250. Some portion of the advance is due to the existing heavy taxation. But by far the greater portion is the fruit of the general unsettlement of values resulting from an irredeemable paper-currency, which enables manufacturers and dealers to gradually advance their prices without check from the public. The only true standard of value being removed, all commercial values become capricious; if all the dealers in eggs should suddenly refuse to sell eggs under a dollar a piece, we should after a time submit to the extortion, and the consumption would not materially decline.

Let us take three articles of common use—beef, butter, and milch cows. Before the war we in New York used to pay 15 @ 20 cents for the best beef, 25 @ 30 cents for butter, and $35 @ $60 for the finest milch cows. When they rose in price during the war the butchers and dealers were ready with an explanation. It was mainly owing to the interruption of our trade with Texas and other Southern cattle-growing regions. The rise in butter was to a good part due to the advance in gold, which being 250, rendered butter a good article of export. Well, the war is over; we have unrestricted intercourse with Texas; gold is down to 146; and yet we are paying 30 @ 35 cents for our beef, 60 @ 65 cents for butter, and $150 @ $250 for milch cows. It can not be pretended that we consume more beef or butter than we did in 1860, or that the country produces much less than it did in that year. The increase in the demand can not be any greater than the increase in the supply. Why, then, should prices have doubled? The reason is simply that an irredeemable paper-currency has unsettled all values, and that drovers and dealers, having begun to advance prices in order to pay themselves for the taxation to which the war has now subsided, discover no obstacle to further successive advances, to which the public submit after a moderate demur. Competition, which may generally be relied on in such cases to correct any temporary extortion, fails to work in this case, because the great prosperity of the country affords a market for all; and the trade has virtually formed a syndicate—for the time—abolished the needy class.

Take the case of buildings. An authority in this trade calculates that it costs to @ 10 per cent. more to build in New York than it did when gold was 250. Iron and a few other articles which can be imported are cheaper; but lumber and labor are both higher than they were in 1864. Yet the supply of labor has been swelled by the disbandment of half a million of men, and by an unexampled immigration; and lumber is far from active. Lumber is no scarcer than it was, and we do not see that the demand for it can have increased much. It is the same story. Carpenters who used to think themselves well off when they got $4 a day now strike for an advance from $4. They tell you that the cost of living has more than doubled. The statement is false, no doubt, even in consequence of the depreciated currency and increased taxation, but much more from the increased profits demanded by dealers of all kinds; and the same reply is made to the think that when prices are rising they may just as well have an advance of 75 as 50 cents. The only true standard thrown away, there is no reason why prices should not go anywhere.

A daily journal has been looking into ladies' hats. Every fashionable reader is aware that the price of the most modern hats—which are also so diminutive and gossamer that you can hardly tell when they are on the head or off—is $60 @ $80. A sensible lady bethought herself that she would buy the materials and make her own hat. She made a very pretty one at a cost of less than $15. The modiste would have charged $50 for the same article. The difference was the extra profit which the modiste deemed it necessary to charge in order to pay the extra profit charged by the butcher and butter-dealer, with a margin enough to pay the extra profit charged them by the drover and farmer, who had to charge enough to meet the extra profit charged by the country store-keeper which had to put on something extra to defray the extra profit charged by the New York jobber and the manufacturers, and so on throughout the list. Every body, in a paper-money era, wants more than a fair profit, and charges accordingly. Nothing will check the universal rage for exorbitant profits but the competition which will follow the narrowing of money.

With these facts before him, and a country groaning audibly under oppressive taxation, it is to be presumed without permission given to it to cede certain territory to the United States.

If this is intended to affect the elections it is too late. If it means war with England the Administration has forgotten that this country does not wish war with England, and is perfectly capable of seeing the national disgrace of answering LORD STANLEY'S late Orders-in-Council by war with a throw. The British Government is by no means a model, and British opinion was steadily hostile to this country during the war. But the question of the Alabama claims is, in the present state of international law, peculiarly a subject for wise and amicable arbitration, toward which the disposition of both governments evidently inclines. It is not in the least a matter for the Captain Bobadil statesmanship which mistakes bluster for bravery and threatening for firmness. It is desirable for every nation that the principle which shall hereafter govern neutral action in such cases as that of the Alabama shall be determined in friendly council, and the Government of the United States will greatly err if it proposes to adopt any cart and offensive method of settling a point of general interest, which would mean exactly as it is even if war should be invoked.

As for MEXICO, if the proposition be that the United States shall by force of arms be indemnified by a slice of territory, the Administration must show the necessity of enlarging our present domain and the advantage of buying off LOUIS NAPOLEON. Why should we interest ourselves to secure his debts, which he has just failed in trying to settle by measures based upon jealous hostility of this country? The French-Austrian empire in MEXICO is visibly crumbling. We have never recognized any government in that country but the Republican. Let us continue to do so, and if that Government asks for a loan to pay a debt which menaces her if not paid, and offers us the security of territory, let the question be generously considered.

Upon all such questions, however, the Administration can merely propose. It is for Congress to determine—a fact which should be carefully remembered; for Congress is not likely, we believe, to permit the friendly relations of the United States to be foolishly imperiled. It is, however, always surprising and gratifying that so few of the intelligent members of Congress protest against the bold Buncombe of the resolutions often offered upon foreign subjects. At the present time the fewer foreign complications we have the more speedy and satisfactory will be the solution of our domestic questions. Any resolution tending to foreign entanglement must therefore be regarded as intended to divert the public mind from the great duty of the hour.

THE EXCISE LAW.

ONE of the chief private arguments against the Union party during the campaign, although it has not been very publicly urged, is that it is a party whose tendency is to make it difficult to get drunk. The Excise Law of the last Legislature prohibits the sale of liquor on Sundays. But that law is more liberal than we have ever had in the State, or than there is now in any other State. It is not new except in its liberality. The law of 1857, which is still in force in the State outside of the city of NEW YORK, forbade selling upon Sunday; and although the law was by its terms applicable to the city as well as the country, the protection of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners and the easiness of the Excise Commissioners and of the courts, caused it to be generally disregarded in the city.

The prohibition of the sale on Sundays was intended to preserve public order, not to promote private morals; and a very few figures will show how well it did its work. It was enforced only during May and June, and has been suspended since the 4th of July, in consequence of the decision of Judge CARDOZO that it was unconstitutional. Now the average arrests for the four weeks of May, 1865, were 503; those of 1866 were 257; those of June, 1865, were 575; in June, 1866, they were 253, being a reduction, in grouping the figures, of about one half during the months of the enforcement of the law. Since the Cardozian decree the comparative figures are these: the daily arrests in July, 1865, were 779; in July, 1866, they were 748; in August, 1865, they were 684; and in August, 1866, they were 680. If the Court of Appeals should sustain the law the sale of licenses will yield more than $1,000,000, and save so much taxation to the city. But the Ring, which delights in free rum and high taxes, is naturally opposed to a law which tends to public order and economy; and was the more willing to nominate MR. JOHN T. HOFFMAN because he had declared against the law.

It is not a pleasant thing to say, but it is the strict truth, that MR. HOFFMAN is the candidate of the "conservatism" of the grog-shops on the one hand, and on the other of the "conservative" dining-rooms in which sympathy with the rebellion was feasted during the war. He is the candidate of "Delmonicoism" which fostered slavery, the source of our troubles, and invoked the assistance of the British Minister to end them.

THE RETURN OF THE FAIRIES.

SINCE the Arabian Nights there has been no good genius to be MR. GROSVENOR PRIME. Like a meteor, he leaves a golden track behind him. He sends princely fortunes hither and thither. He buttresses colleges with gold, and with his autograph calls institutes into affluent being. He gives two millions of dollars to build houses for the poor in London. He tosses a hundred and fifty thousand to Harvard College. Before Yale can look jealous he appeases her with a like sum; and reaching Baltimore, his song of Cure Soph is a gift of half a million. How many country churches, organs, libraries, halls, he spills by the way nobody can tell. But there seems to be no limit to his liberality. What a sublime balance he must have at his banker's!

We fancy him buying apples of the old women at the street corners and paying in C greenbacks, refusing the change. He drops a thousand-dollar note into the plate at church. Indeed, nothing is extravagant when we read of this Parcelian purse of Fearony forever flowing. His benefactions gleam among the morning news like a bird of Paradise among lions. Every reader is surprised with a fine glow of expectation. It comes to the Arab on Nights when Scheherazade is about out of Job to the reporter? asks the pleased an speculating reader.

Lately reading the romance of 'Codlingby we re struck by this passage: 'She had three necklaces on, each o which would have rendered a Princess; her fingers glistened with rings to their rosy tips, and priceless bracelets, bangles, and armlets wound round an arm that was whiter than the ivory grand piano on which it leaned.——.' My lord's pipe is out,' said Mirfarm, with a smile, remarking the bewilderment of her guest, who in truth forgot to smoke; and taking up a thousand-pound note from a bundle on the piano, she lighted it at the taper, and proceeded to relume the extinguished chibouk of Lord Codlingsby." There seems to be a touch of extravagance in this passage until you read of Mr. Fearony's last in the morning or evening paper. Then it becomes commonplace literature.

Of course the good fairy who chooses now to appear as an amiable London banker, no longer young, will choose what guise she will. But she can not really conceal herself. We presume that Governor Swann and the authorities of Baltimore very perfectly well that they were receiving and honoring the fairy godmother of Cinderella, and that the Connecticut Professor were fully aware that they had not received a letter from that benign being who could make good little girls talk pearls and roses. As for the fairy mouth itself, it can not open but amply-endowed institutions of learning drop softly out. It is a touch of kindly humor that this generous spirit which is in its very nature immortally young should select the form of a venerable and respectable merchant through which to work its beneficent will. But its pleasure must be respected, and since it deigns to be known as Mr. Peabody, as George Peabody it shall be honored.

"SEZ GUV'NER OR, SEZ HE."

Governor Orr, of South Carolina, authorizes the South Carolinian newspaper to deny that he is in favor of the Amendment, or that he will recommend its passage to the Legislature. This is not surprising. Mr. Orr is a politician. He was a ringleader in the rebellion. He was a Senator in the rebel Congress. He was one of those who, despite his oath to support the United States Government, took up arms against it. And he is consequently one of those whom the Amendment would disable from holding his present office or any other. It is not surprising that he opposes it.

But he has very frankly comprehended the situation, and proposed to the South Caroline Legislature to ratify the Amendment, how long does he think it would have been before Congress removed his disability? Mr. Orr prefers to fight on—to resist the inevitable. If there, then, no one of the old leaders who will say to his neighbors: 'We believe our cause was just; we put it to the decision of the sword, and we have lost. Now, then, the Amendment is naturally disagreeable to us, but we certainly can not ask the people who have sustained the Government to believe our cause just, nor can we be surprised that they require security for the future by embodying the fair results of their victory in the organic law. Let us honorably accept the judgment we invoked, and adopt the Amendment."

We do not think this tone from the States lately in rebellion we shall have reason to believe that there is acquiescence in the result of the war. But the acquiescence which consists in demanding increased political power as the result of unsuccessful rebellion is an acquiescence which is not very likely to deceive Yankees. Governor Orr is not in favor of the Amendment, but the loyal people of the country, including General Grant, are. Which does the Governor think most likely to prevail?

Mr. LINCOLN'S POLICY.

While the loud orators of the party which opposed the war and vilified Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson are now urging the support of Mr. Johnson on the ground that he follows the policy of Mr. Lincoln, it is worth while to understand what President Lincoln's policy would have been—for, whatever his action during the war, he died before he could develop a policy of restoration.

The Hon. Charles A. Dana, Assistant Secretary of War during the latter part of the Lincoln Administration, made, in a recent speech, a most important statement, showing precisely what President Lincoln's opinion was. "I can affirm," says Mr. Dana, "that, previous to the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, the reconstruction of Virginia was considered by the Cabinet, and a printed document was prepared setting forth the plan of reconstruction to be adopted in regard to that State. That printed document never became official, but it met the hearty approval of Mr. Lincoln. That plan of reconstruction provided for the calling of a Convention to amend the Constitution of the State of Virginia, and states most positively that all loyal citizens, whether white or black, should be allowed to vote. And it further stipulated that rebels should be denied the right of suffrage. That plan was Mr. Lincoln's idea of reconstruction."

This is conclusive, even if Mr. Lincoln's letter to General Wadsworth, and his sympathy and sense of national duty toward the colored men who had borne arms for the Union were not universally known. It is, indeed, abstractly impossible that the restoration policy of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson should be the same. The dominant characteristic of Mr. Lincoln was a clear sense of justice, while it is plain that Mr. Johnson considers the colored race an impediment and a distraction. The point of view of the situation was essentially different in the two men, and their policy must inevitably have differed. It is not conceivable that Mr. Lincoln would have deserted the Union party; that he would have been supported by the Copperheads; that he would have removed from office the enemies of the Union Government during the war to make room for its bitterest enemies, as in the case of the Brooklyn Navy-Yard; that he would have espoused the slaughter of Union men in New Orleans; that he would have insisted upon abandoning the freedmen to the exclusive care of an angry population; or that he would have opposed an amendment to the Constitution so reasonable and generous as that proposed by Congress.

Mr. Seward, we are told, declares that Mr. Johnson is merely fulfilling Mr. Lincoln's policy. But a policy is public, not a private, affair; and every man who understood Mr. Lincoln's character and public views is as familiar with his acts, is as competent as Mr. Seward to form an opinion upon the subject. What that public opinion is the elections show.

Mr. SEWARD TO Sir F. BROWN.

Some months ago, when a band of marauders crossed the Canadian frontier, killed two or three Canadian citizens under pretense of making war upon England, the Government of the United States instantly and properly took the necessary measures to prevent our soil being made the base of predatory and murderous incursions upon a neighboring territory. That band was captured, tried, and duly punished, and had encouraged destructive raids upon us was a reason why honorable men should despise them, but it was no reason whatever for considering it a violation of our laws and for justifying one crime by another.

Some of the raiders have been sentenced by death, and the United States Government, by the Secretary of State, now informs the British Minister that it will make careful scrutiny into the legality and regularity and justice of the trials, and communicate its decision upon the subject. It further recommends the British Government to adopt a policy of tenderness and forgiveness and the liberal.

Every Government should doubtless see that none of its citizens are unfairly dealt with, and to urge a generous policy toward offenders is always commendable. But we think it certain that the Government does not suspect any irregularity in the Canadian trials, and does not believe the sentences will be carried into execution. The President and the Secretary are doubtless glad that an opportunity was offered before the election of appearing as the interceding friends of the Fenians. We believe, however, it is very well understood that the condemned are not to suffer, and we have no doubt that the Canadian authorities will recommend a pardon in this instance is better than punishment. But the offense of the invaders is none the less glaring, while in sentencing them to death the Canadian courts justly indicate the character of the St. Albans raid from their own side of the line.

COLD AS A CAUSE OF DISEASE.

"A GREAT Christmas makes a fat church-yard," is an old English proverb, expressing the supposed fact that a mild, open winter is of course unhealthy. But statistics show that this very common supposition is incorrect. By comparison of different winters it has been found that the colder is the weather the greater is the mortality. And this result of cold is seen most in the two extremes of life—in the young and the old—the middle-aged being best able, from their greater vitality, to resist the depressing influence. Cold is, in fact, one of the prominent causes of disease. Let us see how it operates.

If on going out in a clear, cold day we have a fine glow in the fresh air, we feel that the cold is a source of vigor to us—that it promotes health instead of impairing it. Why is this? It is because, from the circumstances of the exposure, the cold air, acting upon the sensations, awakens a reaction in the system. It is in this case a stimulant, and an agreeable one. Now, it is when this reaction does not occur that the cold is injurious to health, and it is by its depressing influence. It is simply in this way that it is so largely productive of disease.

We will suppose a very common case. A student who is obliged to be economical sits in a room that is not sufficiently warmed, and is scantily clothed when he goes out into the air, so that he is, for much of every twenty-four hours of all the cold season, chilled, though only slightly. He is suffering from a continuous depression of his vital energies, which will inevitably undermine the constitution and sow the seeds of disease. Such a course is quite as injurious as the enervating course of those who go to the other extreme, subjecting themselves continuously to too high a degree of temperature. When we are sitting still in the house we should aim at keeping such a temperature of the apartment as will make us comfortable. And when we expose ourselves to cold we should aim at maintaining the same comfortable condition, either by putting on, in the open air, enough of the cold to be a suitable amount of clothing, or by wakening a proper reaction by exercise, or by both conjoined. The robust can scorn this result with much less clothing than the feeble and delicate, who should be very careful in relation to outdoor clothing. The modes of dress of children and females have often been exceedingly faulty in this respect, and many a life has been sacrificed in obedience to the behests of fashion.

The hardening, as it is termed, which some attempt to accomplish, is always a failure. The destruction consequent upon the bearing to cold aids to the evil that it is intended to remove. So far from invigorating it renders delicate and feeble. We have known many persons who have built by an habitual use of scanty clothing, with the delusive idea of thereby hardening themselves. In one sense the system may, it is true, in this way be accustomed to bear the cold—that is, the sensations produced by it may be less painfully disagreeable in a measure by habit. But there is no real gain in this. The only true hardening is in accustoming the system to react under the invigorating influence of the cold—here our help is needed from exercise and clothing. With care on this point exposure to cold is a prominent means of invigoration.

It is often said that our well-warmed houses are far from being an improvement on the open fireplaces unwarmed except in the rooms so far as health is concerned. This is only true where ventilation is neglected, and too high a degree of temperature is maintained. With proper regulation of circumstances the diffusion of heat throughout the dwelling is decidedly promotive of health. It may bring its injury to the student in a cold room; but any such continuous exposure as the delicate and the very young to cold, when they are not in such rooms, is far more than the direct temperature of the body, must impair vigor. Discomfort is always injurious. Many a delicate female has been rendered consumptive by the depression of the daily discomfort of dressing in a pinching cold atmosphere, who would have escaped this malady if she had lived in a room of proper temperature.

A large cause of disease among the poor is the daily depression of vital power from their poorly warmed apartments and the inadequate clothing which they wear out of doors. It acts in consonance with the depressing influences of causes which operate upon them—defective ventilation, emanations from filth, scanty food, and the discouragements of life. With these facts before us we generally must clearly indicate the presence of the element of depression in the action of the causes that produce them.

But great heat will overcome the system, and so render it very susceptible to the influence of cold. If one is shut up in a small room heated by a stove, the temperature of the atmosphere may be high—far above that which is needed for comfort. This is in itself injurious, relaxing the system, and inducing debility; but besides this direct result it enhances the depressing influence of cold in the frequent exposures to it both indoors and out. The poor, and even those who are well-to-do, as it is expressed, subject themselves often indoors to changes from a high temperature to pinching cold. The liability to such alternations is very great in a difficulty with contracted accommodations. With the most careful and judicious management it is very hard to maintain properly the temperatures of small apartments; and carelessness, with the ill-proportioned and ill-adjusted arrangements that are so commonly found, makes an entire failure of it. And when you add to the alternations from overheating to shivering in the cold at least the exposures to cold without, with the scantiest clothing, you can see how largely cold must operate in inducing disease in the poorer class of people in the small apartments of the ten meest houses of our cities.

THE BOYS IN BLUE.

Leave the flag with us who loved him,
Whom the Copperheads assailed,
As he stood, our chosen leader,
When the storm of battle rose.
'Tis the flag that waved above him
As the ship of State he sailed—
Freedom's last and grandest pleader,
Struck to earth by Freedom's foes
Leave the flag with us!
We're the boys in blue,
To the Union true—
Leave the flag with us!

Leave the flag with us who saved it,
Standing close by Lincoln's chair;
Not with those whose lips defamed him
Till death hid him from their view.
He smiled on us as we waved it
Over Where its colors were denied.
For our friendship never shamed him—
We're the Country's boys in blue!
Leave the flag with us!
We're the boys in blue,
To the Union true—
Leave the flag with us!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

INDEMNITY FOR BRITISH PIRACIES.

The New York Times of October 24 has the following from its Washington correspondent: "In regard to certain claims, founded, principally, on the depredations during the late war of the privateers Alabama and Florida, Mr. Adams, our Minister to the Court of St. James, was some time since instructed to make a representation thereof for indemnity for the losses sustained by our commercial interests. To this demand Mr. Adams received a reply from Lord Stanley, who immediately instructed to repeat the demand. He did so, but the definite response has yet been received. The British Government is now putting out feelers in its various directions to ascertain the disposition in the matter. From these it appears that it is willing to embody the claims in an arbitration, or to submit to Judicial Commissioners. Our Government will accept the agreement of this way, but will insist on a prompt and full payment of the claims. This is the substance of the reply to Mr. Adams's instructions under which Mr. Adams is now acting."

Brevet Major-General George W. Getty has relinquished the command of the District of Texas, which he assumed by General Order, Major-General Hamilton, Colonel of the Seventeenth United States Infantry.

On October 26 the Semi-wool Cemetery at Winchester, Virginia, was inaugurated with imposing ceremonies, a leading feature being the re-interment of the bodies of General Ashby and his brother, Captain Ashby. Ex-Governor Letcher delivered the address. The Virginians are making systematic efforts to gather the remains of the rebel dead from the various battle-fields, to reinter them in cemeteries and burying-grounds. At Winchester 1,500 will be reposited at Fredericksburg and Petersburg.

The Democrats have been carried out in the counties of Pennsylvania, and the vote for Governor at the October election stands up: General Geary, Republican, 297,083; Hiester Clymer, Democrat, 259,496; Geary's majority, 37,587. The total vote cast for Governor last in Pennsylvania, and aggregates 556,579. At the election for the third vote was cast, Republican, 238,499, Democratic 216,749, and the Republican majority was 21,750. At the Presidential election in 1864 the total vote was 574,761—for Lincoln 6,391, for McClellan 296,370. Lincoln's majority 19,391. Since 1864 the Republicans have gained 16,004 votes and the Democrats 36,879, the aggregate increase to the State being 52,883.

Governor Lewis E. Fisk, who has taken a trip through to Montana over its Northern route, under the auspices of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, writes that more than 800 emigrants have left Minnesota for Montana this season. Fare to Yellow Stone, seventy miles on the route, and the whole distance to Virginia City, Montana, is eleven days with fresh horses. Captain Fisk had no trouble with Indians on the Northern route.

It is now said that the French troops will leave Rome in December.

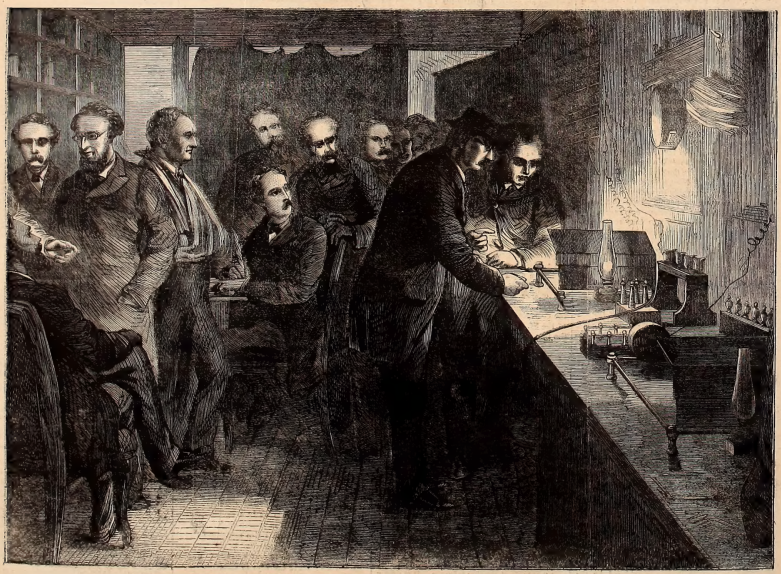
(Vienna.)—Field-Marshal Benedek, of the Austrian army, has been placed on the retired list.

October 25:

(Paris.)—The condition of the Empress Carlotta is described as being hopeless.

The Emperor Maximilian will probably return to the Austrian frigate which was recently dispatched from Trieste for the Emperor Francis Joseph.

It is said that twenty war steamers will leave for Mexico in November to bring home the entire French force now in that country.



October 27:

(London.)—The protocol submitted by France and England to the Danish Government for the settlement of the Chilian difficulty has been approved by her Queen and her Ministers.

(Florence.)—An arrival from Candia states that another great battle took place on the 17th instant. The Greek report is that the Turkish army was repulsed.

THE WIFFLES AGAIN;

OR, THE WAY OUT.

How to get out of it! That was the question with which Georgiana Wiffle occupied her days and nights. Perhaps you remember Miss Wiffle, mentioned in a late issue of Harper's Weekly, and the unprincipled stratagem by which she imposed on an unsuspecting druggist. I have been asked if she paid the druggist. Of course she did, and till that happy day arrived walked three blocks out of her way to avoid his corner. Meanwhile, as I have said, the Wiffles were ravening for a dinner, and went about broiling imaginary chops, and looking hungrily at empty platters and gridirons.

The Wiffles formed the upper half of a house. The lower part was occupied by Mrs. Kahn, the round, rosy wife of a grocer in prosperous circumstances. Mrs. Kahn broiled ham for breakfast, roasted chickens for dinner, and fried fish for supper, and these appetizing odors beset the Wiffles continually, and made their hunger more poignant. If Mrs. Kahn could ever have seen the Wiffles sitting down to their dry bread and tea would have been an excuse for sending more than the odors of her table up stairs; but Mrs. Kahn stood just a little in awe of the Wiffles, and in her veiled imaginings could never have figured those genteel women, so evidently ladies, as hungry. So she broiled and roasted and boiled, to their unspeakable misery, and set about cooking a beef-steak, unlawfully, just as Miss Wiffle set herself about four little verses on the "Drift of Life."

Miss Wiffle had not even yet received the check for "At Low Tide:" but it is necessary to take editors as well as time by the forelock. As Georgiana commenced operations Mrs. Kahn commenced also below, trotting briskly about, and humming cheerily to herself as she laid the steak on the gridiron. She smelled so deliciously that Georgiana could not write a word. The Drift of Life is a fine subject, but you can not boil it, or fry it, or pepper it, and turn it over, and move it about a little, that the fat may crisp and not brown; and Miss Wiffle knew as well what Mrs. Kahn was doing as if she had been clairvoyant. She tried to fix her attention on the slate, which served her for paper till she could buy foolscap. She wrote the word "The Drift of Life," in large capitals, with a flourish under it, and, on second thoughts, added Now at a glance, Mary Lillie, and then, glancing up, found her sister Harriet looking at her.

"I declare," said Harriet, solemnly, and laying down her work, "it is almost more than I can bear! How can people eat continually?"

I have not studied these circumstances with intention of offering an excuse for what Miss Wiffle did next. This is a photograph, not a fancy sketch, and I am responsible only for the accuracy of its statements, not for the moral make-up of my characters; neither do I believe that we have a right to make moral laws of ourselves, and go about the world seeking whom we may devour. Suppose Miss Wiffle's butcher could have fattened the guile under Miss Wiffle's quiet face! What would he have been his opinion of his fellow-mortals from that time forward? Could the dinner thus procured for the starving Wiffles have balanced the butcher's loss of confidence in his race? He never guessed, honest man! that Miss Wiffle had left her pocket-book at home because there was nothing in it, and the confiding and friendly pat with which he shut down the cover of her little basket should have smote on her heart, when that druggist leaned his on her conscience a trifle crisp.

Mrs. Wiffle, however, stood aghast, and "I do believe it is burning," declared Harriet.

"I presume it is," returned Georgiana, recklessly. "Put the steak on the fire, and I will fix another turn at it," and down she went to Mrs. Kahn.

"Can you spare a little butter, Mrs. Kahn? When I've used it—"

"Dear heart, yes!" cried Mrs. Kahn, delighted, and so the Wiffles had a dinner.

That afternoon they were thrown into a state of the wildest excitement, for Mattie, watching for Georgiana, who had gone to the post-office, announced that she was coming back with a letter in envelope, and that she had waved it as she turned the corner. Mrs. Wiffle peered out between the blinds, and came run away to Harry's mother because, she said to herself, "if we are disappointed again I know I shall cry." Harriet sat down, trembling very nervously, and pretended to be quiet when Georgie opened the door. You see it is only people who lead monotonous lives who affect serene and disengaged manners. Those who deal largely bearing; but Mattie, who was only a little mirror, and not yet arrived at feeling, on her own account, burst into a tremendous shout of, "Boots, dollar, I told you so; she has got it!" That brought Mrs. Wiffle from the bedroom. Then Georgiana opened ten dollars in triumph, for the grocer had cashed the check in one-dollar notes, and piled them in an imposing manner on the table. Mrs. Wiffle began to reckon.

"One dollar and a half for the—"

"Dear me cried Harriet, petulantly, "what could you not let us feel rich for five minutes, mother?"

"One dollar and a half to the butcher," pursued Mrs. Wiffle, calmly; half a dollar for Harry's lessons and sugar, one dollar for the druggist; and, as we have to buy butter to repay Mrs. Kahn, and matches, and salt, we may as well call it four dollars."

"Four dollars from ten leaves six," put in Georgiana, sharply, as if something had hurt her. "We must lay aside at least two dollars for Harry."

"I thought I was to have shoes," observed Mattie.

"I met Miss Gregory upstairs, and she almost asked me for that fifty cents," added Harriet.

"I used our last flour yesterday," commenced Mrs. Wiffle, "and the coal—"

"We are in worse plight than before," interrupted Georgian, sullenly. "I can not get the 'Drift of Life' in print, at the very least, before two weeks. Mrs. Duverray will not return till next month, and there is no work yet. I stopped at the shop this morning. I can not get credit as I did before, or people will suspect. What are we to do? When people are unable to live in a grove, I suppose it is a clear indication that they are to get out of it. How are we to get out of it?"

Looking over this paragraph, I see that in the heat of writing I have forgotten to mention a secret which I kept in reserve, because I was a little ashamed of it. There might be a show of gentility in the little poems, and the fact that Mrs. Duverray being very fine, and done very privately, was not wholly vulgar, though deplorable. As I proceed, however, I see that it is better to state that I should have preferred to write a story that dealt entirely with the aristocracy, if I knew anything about them; for even if I had not possessed the words shop and work how am I to get on in a domestic history that reckons up the Wiffles to their last cent, unless I frankly state at once that Georgiana earned on the average four dollars a week by sewing for a ladies' furnishing establishment, and contrived to cover their rent and fuel? And now that we understand each other, let us go back to the Wiffles discussing how to get out. Here are the methods discussed:

A Boarding-house.—Dismissed, because they had no furniture, no money to buy it, no security to pay the rent in advance, and no one who would act as security, or lend them money.

Teaching.—Dismissed, because they had no money to rent a room, buy furniture, and advertise, while teachers in public schools must be graduates of the city schools, and the vacancies were to the applicants in the proportion of one to fifty.

Governessing.—Dismissed. Georgiana, as the prop of the family, could not be spared. Harriet, besides educational deficiencies, was physically unequal for the domestic service, as Mrs. Wiffle was infirm and much of the time confined to her bed.

Other Branches of Female Employment.—Dismissed. Neither of the ladies understood mantua-making, or millinery, and Georgiana made as much money by her sewing and her verses as she could have done by operating on the machine.

Recurring to the Country.—Dismissed. No money for moving expenses, no work to when there.

The trouble evidently was with that abstraction Fate, who had given a woman a man's responsibilities.

"What a pity that we could not freeze up for a few hundred years or so, and come out on better times, when everybody has a chance to win in the world for working-women," said Georgie, sighing.

"If I were a young man, exactly as clever as I am now, there would be no trouble. I'd go to Montana, and a few years would see me a thriving merchant, or something of the sort, and the Wiffles family would take head and shoulders in the West of course, and not as a thing to be agonized about. Being women, we are doing the best possible now, and need hope for nothing better. We have many butchers and grocers there are in the city. I shall be obliged to try them all, you know, in the course of time."

"Hush," said Mrs. Wiffle, "come one at the door!" and at this juncture came Mr. Welt.

You may not know Mr. Welte, though he is a member of a firm in fair standing in Worth Street; but if you have a good-looking, middle-aged brother, or husband in your house, make no doubt that a man exactly similar visits her. He is a gentleman in little; fairly thirty. You know all about him. Where he commenced business, and what he is worth, and you mention the last item with respect. He is a republican in politics, and conservative in views. He is fine friends with your little boy, and if he wanted any body in your family he would be quite welcome, always excepting your mother-in-law Maria, to whom he offers a persistent devotion that she sarcastically tests in pieces and throws in his face. Sometimes, when the circumstances are, "That if he does not like the treatment why does he come there, she should like to know?"

Why indeed! Not an unnatural question, and Georgiana Wiffle that did not indignantly ask that question concerning Mr. Welte, partner in the firm of Welte, Hagle, & Co., was not to be trusted with your house and his horses. They, the unmarried aforesaid, would not have turned their backs on Mr. Welte, or scornfully answered his questions, or talked over his head, or pretended to fall asleep, as one entirely worn-out by the length of his visits!

Now all these things would have been notwithstanding. Mr. Welte continued to adore Miss Wiffle.

Mrs. Wiffle rose at once to welcome Mr. Welte. Georgiana stood where she was, in shock.

"Does 'a way out' ever come walking in?" she asked Harriet, in a low voice. "We were looking for one, you know," and smiling, graciously offered the new-comer her hand. Harriet looked bewildered; so did Mattie. Then Mattie's face descended to her before? Several good openings for snubbing Mr. Welte presented themselves, and when Georgiana pushed a chair forward, he began to look seriously at her daughter. Miss Wiffle looked seriously also, but not at any one in the company. She was thinking of the extremes of their extreme and hopeless poverty. How was Mattie to be educated? Harry would always be ailing. Mrs. Wiffle grew daily more helpless. She had no prospect. She prospered as well as a woman without genius and friends had a right to expect. In fact Miss Wiffle had decided already, when she flashed out that quick question at Harriet, but she pretended with herself that it was still an open question, and asked herself should she take this way out, if life would be bearable with that man? She had her romance like other girls. Her dream of a perfect love. We all have our dream of love. The romance and the dreams may under seal, and trust her own promise that the seal should never be broken?

Mr. Welte did not know why Georgie looked at him, and ever after he was certain that she was civil at all, and gathered courage to propose a walk. Mrs. Wiffle and Georgiana accepted the invitation, while Harriet staid at home with the children, and the elements were good to Mr. Welte, and got up a shower of such proportions that the ladies, being near Mr. Welte's house, were obliged to shelter there.

Bachelors' houses are apt to be damp and ghostly, and Mr. Welte's house was no exception to the rule. Leave out the kitchen and his little library, and a more dispirited set of rooms, moped in linen and darkness, never existed. Ghosts, such a house's marble mantles, and Brussels carpets. And privately lifting one of the linen covers, Mrs. Wiffle ascertained that there was brocatelle beneath; while Mr. Welte, bustling about for a slight collation, and apologizing for deficiencies, remarked that he kept his china in the bank.

Hereupon, all unconsciously, Mrs. Wiffle looked at Georgie with an unconscious appeal in her countenance that made the girl wince, and yet grew in complaisance toward the delighted Weltie.

When a young man has been elected to be won courtship becomes an easy matter. Mr. Welte wooed Georgiana with bouquets and silks, with Baltimore's and Dodsworth's, with much driving about in carriages, and continued arrival of costly packages in brown paper. The neighbors looked on envious of the Wiffles. Harriet, though they were sorely embarrassed and driven to their wit's end for flour, coal, sugar, butter, and dinners generally, to the end of Georgie's silks and purple cassock; but there was a way out, for Georgie had told Mr. Welte, with dignity, "that though she did not love him, she could respect him, and for the sake of her family was willing to marry him," and Mr. Welte had eagerly taken her at her word.

Miss Wiffle's romance had brought about Sunbeau, and Circassian girls, and hated the things Mr. Weltie brought her, and saw spots and stains on the whitest and most perfect roles, no one else was troubled by such unpractical fancies. Mrs. Wiffle looked ten years younger. Harriet grew actually gay. Harry ceased to ail. Mattie, and Mattie's rejoice in new shoes and frocks. A number of people, who had suddenly recollected the Wiffles, declared every virtue that Georgiana was a sensible girl, and would do well for herself. Shall we throw stones after their carriage, or bid them God-speed, and admit Georgie's excuse: "What other way was there out?"

A MERE SCRATCH.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

Two time occupied in the ride home had wrought no change in Georgie's resolution; but it had shown her sufficient of the danger and perplexity of the course she had determined on to suggest some slight caution-ary measure. He resolved, therefore, to proceed, without halting, straight to his own dwelling, where, admitted as usual by his own housekeeper, he would retire to his chamber or study, and enjoy a season of reflection, which, undisturbed as it will evenly, of being in a position still to exercise some liberty of choice. The idea of present security was then yet dominant in George's mind, and his thoughts opened.

"You have not hurried yourself, I hope," he began. But the fatal words were still on his lips when George became conscious that he was standing face to face with his portly cook!

The young man literally staggered, as if he had received a blow, and his face became deadly white. Collecting himself, however, he gave his horse to a groom, and came slowly, very slowly, into the house.

Mrs. Turnover, executing an apologetic bob, or courtesy, was following a hasty retreat to her master's voice recalled her.

"Mrs.—Mrs. Turnover, come with me a moment." He went into a sitting apartment and sat down. His agitated face alarmed the cook.

"You're ill, sir, indeed, Mr. George. Shall I make you any thing? Cup o' tea: little drop o' sperrets?"

"Nothing. Sit down, if you please."

"Sir!"

"Sit down."

Mrs. Turnover obeyed.

"Tur—Mrs. Turnover, by-the-by, what is your other name? I forget," said her master.

"Barbara Ann, sir."

"Barbara Ann," his voice trembled.

"Sir!" said the good lady, getting more and more anxious.

"Barbara" (Mrs. Turnover startled), "don't be surprised or scared at what I am going to say, Barbara."

"Certingly, Sir George," said the cook, getting up to courtesy, and subsiding again. "Owever, if 'is about the butter, I've—"

"It has no especial reference to butter, or any thing of that description, Barbara. Sit down, pray."

"A warning, truly," said her master, with a dismal sigh, "and a warning, Barbara, not to keep me in the dark. Listen. I am perfectly serious, perfectly resolved, and I shall presently require of you an answer to a question which, as you are perhaps unexpected question I am going to put to you. Without at present meeting your reply, I must request you—nay—or—willing, Barbara, to—become—my—ay?"

Mrs. Turnover gave utterance to a slight scream, and bent her head, which, I think, revealed, sympathetically, as though exhorting the sitter to take heart. Her master was then in the act of preserving the jovial adjective "drink," ripe for any of those little aberrations to which Georgie, from his boyish days, owing to his genuine habits, this idea specially gave place to a worse—namely, that he had gone suddenly mad.

But the good cook had both heard and read that the prevailing mode of dealing with lunacy at the present day involves a protracted coincidence in, and production of, any remarkable fancy. Demeaning herself accordingly, Mrs. Turnover, with a confidence and presence of mind highly commendable herself, returned a soothing answer.

"You're very good, Sir George" (poor creeter!), "and a merry natural thing" (George started) "it were if you to wish for to give me such a little information, you're welcome, I'm sure."

Bless—but I don't think you're quite your own quiet self this night. There, now, there! Don't, like a berceliant gentleman, hexcite yourself. P'raps you're a bit flustered like, with riding so sharp home. You feels that, too," continued Mrs. Turnover, in persuasive accents, 'and, at this wery individgial moment, I sees you wibrating to yourself—Barbary's right, I'll lay down for 'alf an hour, and 've a cup o' tea, and then enjoy any further conversation comfortably."

"Barbara you," replied Sir George, "you're a kind-hearted creature, and you mean well. But, Mrs. Tur—that is, Barbara—understand, I pray, without more words, that I am as sane, as sober, and as morally incorrect as ever I was in my life. Come, does that satisfy you?"

"Of course it do, Sir George. Unappy creeters! it's what they all says," added Mrs. Turnover, aside. "Ever I knowed a lunatic as hexpressed 'imself in a settin' there. In hearnest?—why, o' course you are. Would you please, Mr. Turnover's last words, Sir George, when sinking?"

"I don't remember—I never heard," said the bare-ned, absently. "Words?"

"Putt every confidence in the sperior sect," he see, 'meant 'em. They were them what they're about, and if they does mislead you, why, they're sometimes werry sorry, which makes,' he sez, 'all square.' Wherever, Sir George, you may be now in you, and expressly feels for your kind preference," concluded Mrs. Turnover, rising as she spoke, in the hope of putting an end to the embarrassing conference.

"Listen to me, Turnover," said the young man, grave'y. "On the supposition that I am mad, you affect to indulge what seems to you an extraordinary fancy, and to make as little sacrifice to your natural stay, to be expected! This is nonsense. Having taken the matter in its insane aspect, suppose you try it now in its reasonable one. Suppose I stand the step I appear to take in unusual, and may be judged of by the world in a manner not flattering to my discretion. Here are reasons which outweigh such considerations. I once more distinctly place before you, Barbara Ann Turnover, my position and my servant, the probability of becoming my wife."

"I thought I should ha' dropped," said Mrs. Turnover, subsequently, "when, repesting it so steadfast, as though actially seting the banns, master putt out 'is hand, and 'e took it, and 'e see 'is face were exact as angel. While I were hesitating and wiping my hand on my apron, 'e sez in the cooel formal, tender sort said: 'Come, my good Barbara, I have giv' you a unfair surprige. Go now, for the present, and think over what 've proposed. I don't want to be hurried or to hit it,' he sez, 'anyways secret. You will let me know tomorrow morning—yes, to-morrow morning.' So I wiped off my face, and 'e kissed me, and 'e kissed down again, kivering his white face with his hands. Which I courtesied," continued Mrs. Turnover, "and I left master as I were, didn't I go, as fast as ever I walked in my life! But I didn't get no further than the staircage, for there I stunned to forgit where I were, and all about it."

George had raised his eyes in time to witness that precipitate withdrawal of retiring Barbara—as he herself described. It recalled so vividly the action of a frightened goose that he could not repress a bitter smile.

"She will do justice to the name in one particular at least!" he muttered.

He was in the act of rising to go to his chamber, when a loud, singular sound, such as, if a poop eye had been at the window, one might by that animal, echoed from the staircase, followed by a well and noble accompaniment. Mrs. Turnover again was pushed out to inquire their source, and beheld the poor cook on the upper steps in high hysterics. Before he could recover the presence the disturbance had reached other ears, for somebody—it was a young person George had never seen before—was bounding from an adjacent apartment to the rescue. For a second their eyes met. George had only time to note that the girl was handsome, haughty in appearance, was of singular beauty, and father, that a crimson flush had overspread instantly as it seemed, to the stranger's brow, when other help arrived, and the young master of the house directly withdrew.

"Mrs. Turnover, what is my love! what a complexion!" was his comment. "That blush alone was perfection. Ah, but perfection, Mr. Turnover, then? Who is the girl, I wonder? Not of these parts, surely. No servant, I am sure. Perhaps a seamstress of Chatham's. Perhaps—"

He fell into a strange reverie, standing so long with one boot off and the other on a chair that he positively started when, rousing himself, he looked at his watch. Night was coming on, a fact of which he was further reminded by the appearance of Mrs. Fanshaw at the bell, bringing candles, and a request to know if he would be pleased to take dinner.

Sir George had had the superior meal, but ordered coffee to be brought in to his room, and prepared to write. Thereupon Mr. Alexander, that ex-slight gentleman, produces buzz about the room, and a wistful but stealthy look at his master, withdrew.

Mrs. Fanshaw took the look in his mirror.

"They all know it, then, by this time!" was his correct conclusion.

When Mr. Fanshaw reappeared with the coffee George forced himself to inquire for Mrs. Turnover.

"Mrs. Turnover's very badly afflicted, sir," Mr. Fanshaw was good at improvisation, for he at once replied.

"Mrs. Turnover's duty, Sir George: she 'ave laid down for a few minutes, Sir George, and feels quite unusual, Sir George."

The suitor uttered something between a cough and a groan, and turned steadily to his writing.

He was occupied with one letter full half an hour. The pen traveled swiftly, but the journey was apparently long, for at the end of that time Sir George suddenly stopped, glanced back hastily at what he had written, and tore the letter in pieces.

"To her, to-morrow," he muttered. "To-night I am distraught. Poor Clara!"

Poor George! he would be sadder. For it is no easy matter to communicate in an entirely satisfactory manner with a distant attendant of sisters especially if she be the wife of a haughty earl) that you are about to be affianced to your cook.

"It is not for the post, I suppose?" said George to the butler, who entered at the moment.

"Well if it was immediate, Sir George?" was the reply. "Dawes can take it at once, Sir George: he's at the stable gate now, Sir George, with the dog-cart, Sir George."

"The dog-cart? Why?"

"Going to Sir George."

"Who is Miss Esther?"

"Miss Vann, Sir George. Mrs. Turnover's niece, Sir George," said the butler, rather smilingly.

"Mr. Dawes does not consider it necessary to await my instructions in any one case," said the young baronet, with unwonted tartness. "Be good enough to desire him to put up the dog-cart instantly. I have se letters to-night."

"And, and the young la—, person, Sir George?" "Is too for for such a girl to walk at night, and all alone, Sir George."

"Who wants her to walk? She can sleep here if she chooses."

Mr. Fanshaw quitted the room.

"Not badly managed," thought George. "Two things gained. I must keep down this disposition in my household to be one as they please. This will be more than ever necessary now. And I shall persuade also see how the morning roses bloom. Here pretty she was!"

The butler reappeared.

"I beg pardon, Sir George: Mrs. Turnover is quite agreeable, Sir George; but Miss Esther herself insists on walking home, Sir George, nor we can't prevent her, Sir George."

"Present my compliments to Miss—what name did you say? Sweetman—and request her, as a favor, not to put me to the pain of sending a lady from Gosling Castle, even in a carriage, at this hour of night, and when twenty chanders are at her disposal. Dawes will receive her orders in the morning, at my hour she pleases."

"Yes, Sir George, very good, Sir George," said Mr. Fanshaw, vibrating approving the unended message, and went his way.

George thought of Mildred till he went to sleep. A revolution then ensued, and slumber, which is the tyranny of its own, decreed, and somehow contrived that he should dream of Esther Vaux.

CHAPTER IV.

In the mean time there had been proceeding, in the apartment occupied by Mrs. Mapes, the housekeeper, a grand council, or divan. Stretched upon a couch (for she was, as has been stated, a victim to rheumatism), Mrs. Mapes, excited by the astounding intelligence which had reached her, looked less like an invalid than she had been expected, and took an active share in the deliberations. Truth to say, there were almost exclusively of a conjectural character, and had reference to the genius present to every mind, and expressing itself there, in the simple terms "how ever" master can mean to make such a fool of herself as this comes to?"

The heroine of that eventful day—Mrs. Turnover herself—was seated in a chair of state, close beside the presidential couch, surrounded by her admiring, not to say sympathizing, friends, while Betsy Jane, pale, sad, bewildered, hardly able to believe that what she saw and heard was not a foolish dream. Compelled to yield to Sir George's proposition, she was content to let it be thought that the restraint put upon her movements on that day affected her temper, and made her disinclined to take part in the debate.

"And you are sure, my dear soul, he sin't mad?" said Mrs. Mapes, affectionately (for she didn't like her), placing her hand on the pudgy paw of Mrs. Turnover.

Some hours, it will be remembered, had now elapsed since Sir George's return, and the observant reader aware how readily the human mind adapts itself to the same circumstances and contingencies, will not be surprised to learn that Mrs. Turnover began to be a little annoyed at the circumstance of every body at once jumping to the conclusion that nothing could be so easily could explain their master's choice. She therefore replied with a little asperity, that he might have been mad, for aught she knew; but, at the same time, he evidently knew'd well enough what he was a doing on.

"Don't be angry, my dear creature," said the mild housekeeper. "We don't think it strange, we don't know your value, that you should have a handsome offer. But master's seen so little of you, so very little, hasn't he? And ever can be his reason?"

"To be sure, he's seen a good deal more of you," retorted Mrs. Turnover. "But it don't seem to have made any difference, is a matrimonial pint o' view."

"He might have heard what a hextract creature you be," said Cook, going in flattery for second battery.

"It's not a nodding thing," remarked the laundry-maid. "Depend upon it, this has been a long time shimmering in his mind. He wanted to be quite sure of his feelings, I s'pose, when a man see she he loves you, and then finds he don't. That's why master was so long speaking out."

"Well, at all events he done it effectually at last," said Mrs. Turnover, hardly knowing whether the last speech could be taken in a complimentary sense or not.

"There's no guessin' o' men. They hides their feelins so," said Gertrude, who squinted, had a snub nose, and from whom mankind in general had managed to conceal their feelings most successfully.

"Did you notice any simtims of affection at hoob times, such as when she was a-burdening master, or paying your wages, and that, ma'am?" inquired Mr. Fanshaw, whose presence in the lady's room was tolerated in consideration of the importance of the occasion, and on condition that he did not sit down.

"Come! did he never make no excuse for to sweejee your hand?"

"I—I don't remember as he ever did—no, I am positive he never did," said Mrs. Turnover, after due reflection.

"Or was you ever stittle' by him pernicious and unbecoming?"

"Never," said the lady.

"Prupe he's heard as you're "tilled to some money I'm suggested as to the distance. But this spiteful idea was scouted.

"It can't hardly be my figger," said the cook, frankly. "N' more it couldn't be my face, for I'm changed a bit since Turnover first kep company with me at Mabberly Fair. I wor pretty then."

"Why, what airs you sow, ma'am?" put in the unblushing Gertrude. "Look at your hays, and your hair. I've heard tell it used to be sot upon."

"Law!" said Mr. Fanshaw. "Is that good for the hair?"

"Turnover was as proud as a peacock of my curls, just as if they was his own," said his relict, with a sigh. "His last words to me, muttered just as his voice was failing, was these: 'Barbary,' he sez, 'give me some drops.' We giv' 'em. Then he goes on: 'French is good 'air, specially for middle-aged fronts and puffers. North German makes good working wigs: but Swish is best of all,' he sez. 'I've paid,' he sez, graspin' my hand, 'as much as three pound sivven, ay, and four pound twelve, for Swish light brown, afore baking. But into any thing like yaws, for substance, gloss, and fibre, I never yet did put a comb in.'"

"Well now, to business," said Mrs. Mapes. "What shall you say, my dear? Of course, if master's offer's serious, you accept it. The only question then is, is it serious?"

"Yes, ma'am, it is," said Mrs. Turnover, resolutely.

"Make yourself quite easy as to that. When a gentleman asks you in plain words whether you'll be his wife, I suppose he means to ask whether his wife you will be."

Mrs. Mapes admitted that the phrase might be regarded as cucurbite; but, as a final conjecture, would be glad to know the general opinion whether it were not possible that the young master's desire to retain permanently under his person so skilled in her peculiar vocation was the real source of his offer.

Mrs. Turnover thought within herself that the object might have been attained in somewhat cheaper conditions; but she made no reply.

"Well, I always fancied there was some one else under handed," said the housekeeper.

"You mean—hum—down there, the Hale," said Mr. Fanshaw, dubiously.

Mrs. Mapes nodded. Esther suddenly felt herself becoming interested in the conversation; but it was but a moment in the direction, and, feeling weary, she bade the party good-night, reminding them that she had to be stirring early.

"Master's made a mistake," said Mr. Fanshaw, in an undertone to the housekeeper, during the little movement caused by Esther's exit, "and took the wrong number of the family!"

Mrs. Mapes nodded, and the council, too much interested in their subject to think of separating at present, returned to the discussion.

"Don't feel all in a twitter, ma'am!" inquired Dolly.

Mrs. Turnover responded to the effect that "twitter" time was past, and all she was conscious of was a sort of heavy stillin' down.

"I suppose it's some of the circle that this state of things would shortly become more applicable to the other party to the matrimonial contract."

It being now universally assumed that Sir George's suit was to receive a favorable answer, the next consideration was how it should be received, and to this point Mr. Turnover, after a little coquetting, frankly owned herself at a loss, and sought counsel among.

"I should do it respectful but cordliwal," said Mr. Fanshaw.

"Sweet, qualified, by an unspoken impression that, on such a subject, Mr. Fanshaw should have permitted the latter to speak first.

"Pop upon him when he leaves his room," proposed Gertrude. "He'd take it kind."

"I think I wouldn't be too forward," said the housekeeper.

The head word you couldn't come for orders about dinner, being that you was hapset," said Dolly.

"I think I wouldn't be too backward," said Mrs. Mapes.

"Meet him promiscuous, and say you've loved him better than words can express, ever since you 'd' was the daring counsel of Martha, the kitchen-maid.

"I won't do nothin' of the sort," said the honest-hearted cook, contemptuously. "I'll not demean myself, you'd make me out to be, spooning' on a little boy in the dawn colour, and a-hanging' on his neck."

"You sout give master his answer, child," said Mrs. Mapes, in full enjoyment of the difficulty. "Come, now, no nonsense, and tell us what you mean to say to him."

"I won't say nothin'," said the cook; "I'll—I'll write."

But this craven resolution was received as it deserved, with manifest disfavor. Nevertheless the lady of the form. She would reply in writing.

"And slip it under his door," was one suggestion.

"Or pin it on to the curtain," was another.

"Or lay it in a hopen tart," was a third.

It seemed that the idea of sending such a letter at the outset was not new to Mrs. Turnover herself.

"Well, now, about the letter," said Mrs. Mapes, settling herself comfortably. "I suppose you don't want any assistance there."

In other words, "I know we shall have to do it for you." And so they did, in fact.

Mrs. Turnover declared that she would be greatly obliged for any suggestions.

"The last words Turnover ses to me, so as to be understood distinct," added the good lady, deliberately, "was these: 'Now, Betsy Jane, never be alone' having advice that's freely offered. The best of that sort generally is, that it's given for nothing. Ado?"

Far from being deterred by this last qualification, the council plunged at once into the discussion, and a long conference ensued. Mr. Fanshaw, and Mr. Fanshaw, took part at the same moment. That gentleman, remarking that the subject was becoming delicate, took his departure.

Numerous were the forms of love-letters adduced in precedents, and many interesting quotations made, but it would seem, derived from valentines—imparted a poetic character to the debate. But none of them exactly hit the point. It is not every day that a young baronet of ancient lineage, aged twenty-five, proposes to the cook. Hardly.

"This will never do," said the lady-president, getting rather weary of the long discussion. "My proposal I write down what each or any one has to propose, and we can correct the letter afterward."

The proposal was agreed to, paper and ink were produced, and Mrs. Mapes, whose right hand was helpless with rheumatism, commenced the epistle thus:

"Honored Sir—"

"I don't know about 'honored'" said Mrs. Turnover. "Dear, I think, would be better."

"I thought we were to write the letter first," said the housekeeper. "Now, Mrs. Turnover, you?"

"Being as you wished an immediate answer," suggested Gertrude, and stopped, exhausted.

"Do you remember, Betsy Jane?" said, rushing to the rescue.

"Made to your noble servant, Barbary Hann Turnover,'" prompted Martha.

"Tha'll do capital!" cried Mrs. Turnover, thinking, in the letter itself, she had got a seal!"

"I don't think that would satisfy any body," said Mrs. Mapes. "Do you, Betsy Jane, my dear?"

"Which," said the lady chiefly interested, making a great effort—"I which, if you really think it's for your good—"

"Happiness—yes!" put in Gertrude.

"Way, you know best," said the laundry-maid, timidly.

Mrs. Turnover nodded appeal.

"Shouldn't you add something about not being fully prepared—you know, unexpected—that sort of thing?" said the housekeeper.

"Took by surprise," resumed the inexhaustible Dolly.

"In my hapron and all," put in Mrs. Turnover.

"I might have simmed—have simmed," said Gertrude, and again collapsed.

"'More cooler,'" suggested Martha.

"Than suckenstances required," said the laundry-maid, timidly interrogative.

"But, for the future, you shan't—you shu'n't—have no—no—" hesitated Dolly.

"No call to complain," said Mrs. Turnover, desperately. "There, that'll do. I signe it."

"Oh, Mrs. Turnover, ma'am, there's something forgot," said Betsy.

"Forgot!"

"Why, usually, so they tells me" Dolly mushed, "sends a lock of air."

"Bless my heart, do they?" cried the lady.

"Yes, and real nice of the hair to think," said Betsy, "Let me cut off a bit. There, don't be shy, ma'am," said Gertrude, playfully.

"Well, here, hundersenth, where it ain't so gray," said Mrs. Turnover, hitching up her cap.

A tress of auburn being presently secured and tied—to avoid dangerous contrasts—with white thread.

"Now, Betsy, and the lady in the chair, to Sir here's the letter." She had made some improvements in the spelling, but retained the sense intact:

"Honored Sir,—being as you wished an immediate answer to your handsome proposal made to your humble servant, Barbara Hann Turnover, which you really think it's for your happiness, and which I dare say it will, Sir, I am sure, I am upon and duty might have seemed more cooler than circumstances required, but, for the future, being you have no call to complain.

"Yours to command,

"BARBARA HANN TURNOVER."

"Well," concluded Mrs. Mapes, "will it do?"

"I don't like 'honored Sir,'" said Mrs. Turnover, returning to her former criticism. "It reads cold, and besides, mun, you see, I'm not an immediate answer, nor I never said he did."

"Very good, my dear. I cut that out," said Mrs. Mapes.

"Now she needn't put her name there, since 'tis stated at the top of the letter," said Betsy.

"That's out," said Mrs. Mapes.

"And I think 'made to your noble ships' 'if you really thinks it's for your happiness, sweetener,'" said Gertrude. "O' course it's for his happiness, and o' course he knew'd it so he'd ha' left off immediate bundering."

"Truly, nu'am," said Mrs. Turnover.

"That's out," said Mrs. Mapes with the pen.

"Mrs. Turnover, ma'am," said the laundry-maid, humbly, "I ask for information. Don't it seem as if you must first have the wedding and then the ring?"

"Good gracious, child! Reproach! Not for any sake!" exclaimed Mrs. Mapes, much disturbed. "Out with it, please, ma'am, quick!"

"Yes out," replied the president. "Now about 'the future?'"

"If I were Mrs. Turnover, little enough I'd promige about the future," said Dolly, darkly. "Past you see how he bcyaves herself."

"Perhaps you're right, child," said the cook. "The less you promige the better for your Tur—"

"There, that's out," interrupted Mrs. Mapes, and she laid down her pen.

"Go on, if you please, 'm," said Mrs. Turnover.

"That's all."

"Why, bless me! what's gone of the letter?" ejaculated Mrs. Turnover, looking at the document in some surprise.

"There's nothing left but 'yours to command,' the name, and the hair," said Mrs. Mapes.

There was a general laugh at this assembly at this unexpected result of their labors, but Mrs. Mapes, who had become quite interested in them with the sentence that nothing in the world could be better than what still remained. The hair, and the "yours to command," it was unanimously agreed that the offer was accepted, and that Mrs. Turnover purposed to be a dutiful spouse.

This appearing satisfactory, thanks were presented to Mrs. Mapes for her "able conduct in the chair," and the meeting broke up, the ladies to their several apartments, leaving Gosling Grabe under the guardianship of the ever wakeful ancestress, who frowned and smirked below.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

In an article which recently appeared in one of our daily journals it was stated that last year, during the "dull season," at least one thousand balls were given in New York city; and that it was probable the number this year would reach two thousand during the five regular months of the coming season. This is exclusive of the innumerable soirees, private parties, and other convivial gatherings where dancing is practiced. It was also estimated that an average of one hundred and fifty persons attend each of the public balls, giving a total of 150,000 persons. An additional estimate was made as follows: that if the cost of the above number, 30,000 gentlemen attire themselves in fashion dictates, and attend half a dozen of these balls, their expenditure would amount to the enormous sum of $5,100,000; and if but 5000 ladies expend $1000 each, the amount will be regarded as a reasonable average by many fashionable ladies, we would have an additional sum of $1,125,000. This gives a total of fifty-seven millions of dollars sufficient to build more than 3500 comfortable houses for the poor, at $15,000 each, or to support something like 30,000 poor families with food and fuel during the dancing season!

Whether such considerations as these will have the effect to check the fashionable excitement seems likely to be somewhat doubtful, when we remember that the 19th century has developed a mania for dancing. Gymnastics are more fashionably practiced at other times than at the "over short" hours of night, we can hardly say. On the contrary, that a recent revolution in fashions, just reported from Paris, will prove a financial convenience to fast ladies will be received with the diminished quantity of material put into ballcostumes, and not be foolishly ambitious to add the cost of the French fashionable trains to some other portion of their dress.

We are forgetting, by-the-way, to enlarge upon the fashionable dancing mania as it will unfold on first taking our pen. For the question of dress is a very perplexing one at such a time, and fashionable ingenuity can devote undue care and thought to the subject, there are many who desire to bestow upon personal adornment only such attention as is fit and proper. Both classes, however, wish to keep somewhat "posted up" in regard to the changes of fashion.

The Paris journals state that the Court dress-maker has actually made ball-dresses with short skirts—a great innovation, since trains have so long been regarded as essential to a fashionable evening toilet. It is said that the Empress has worn them on several occasions; but that she will encourage short skirts for dancing as trains are so inconvenient.

This shortening of ball-dresses will probably lead to the same operation with dinner-dresses and evening toilets of all descriptions. Trained skirts in the streets are now absolutely suppressed in Paris.

Parisian skirts are now made very simply: they have either a plain niche or three narrow quilled flounces round the edge. A pretty addition to an evening dress is a basque cut out round the edge in six scollops. This basque is entirely closed in front, and is trimmed with buttons; it is usually made in some heavy material, and particularly in velvet. Black and white are peculiarly now fancied to be worn over rich silk, satin, and velvet evening dresses. Sleeves are worn open in evening dresses, but bodices are not cut so low as they were a few months ago.

Habits for the approaching winter season are all used, even cloth ones consequently black cloths are not used. Young girls will wear out of doors exceedingly narrow velvet sometimes, but ladies of a certain look nothing more than house-jackets. They are trimmed either with broad braid or fringe, and they never fail to have the sleeves and pockets embroidered to the back.

A graceful style of arranging the hair for evening is formed with four small rolled bandeaux which taper one above the other, and leave the ears perfectly uncovered; in order to separate these small bandeaux, either a narrow gold cord, or an equally narrow velvet ribbon is used, the cord being generally the color of the chignon in a row of thick curls placed up at the ends, which is crowned with a fine net made either of gold, silver, or hair. A bow of velvet with long flowing ends is added at the top of the chignon, but if gold cord has been used to separate the bandeaux, then gold cord and tassels are substituted for the velvet bow.

The Commissioner of Statistics in the State of Ohio reports that the number of marriages in that State in the year 1865, is full twenty per cent. above that in any previous year, making the aggregate increase in the State at thousand over any previous year. This is a pretty decided indication that the young men who served in our army were not thereby rendered unfit, or the loss of home comforts, and desired when they were discharged from service to possess a home of their own.

A Washington journal records a climax of "matrimonial celebrations." A short time ago a gentleman residing in Philadelphia celebrated his golden wedding, his eldest daughters' silver wedding, and at the same time the wedding of his youngest daughter. Relatives were present from Indiana, Ohio, and Germany. Such a triple celebration is truly remarkable.

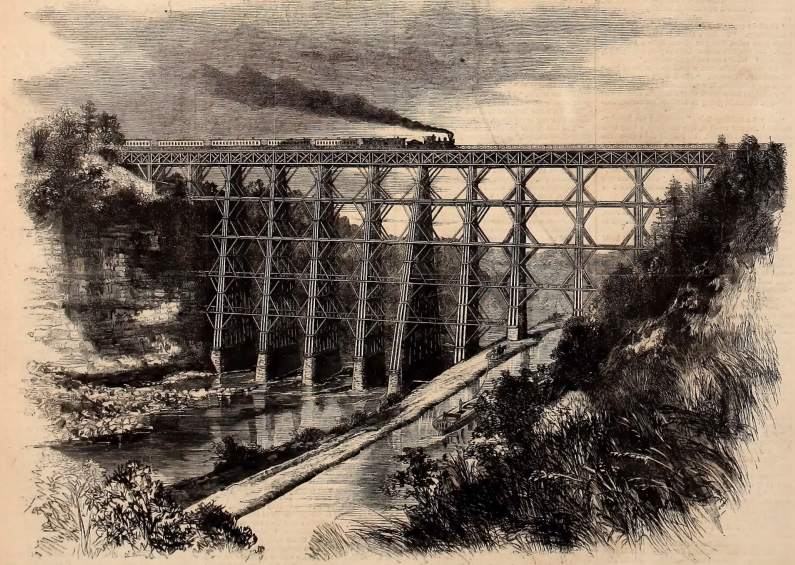
An exchange paper, comparing the days of seven-days with those of olden times, speaks of our first parents in the following antique strain:

"We fully believe Adam and Eve as having been, before the fall, in a very 'happy condition,' but one thing they missed—they had no lawn mower. They had no playedmarbles. He never played 'tuckpy.' He never played tenth-pins. He was with a single bound, around on a pond, or played 'ball,' or rode down hill on a hand-sled. They had no parlor organ to practice on. He never took tea with another little girl from the vicinity of Paradise, and drank the tea-leaves, rolled a hoop, or jumped the rope, or pieced a baby-quilt, or played 'Copenhagen.' He never played 'Authors,' or the 'game wants a corner,' or 'hurly-burly,' or any of the thousand and one other childhood diversions. How blank their age must have been, wherein no memories of early youth could come back to bring up their sweetness!"

The following extract from an English letter will afford food for thought to many a person who has cherished visits to the old country as a time when peace place where a good dinner can be served at a trifling cost. Here, moreover, his entertainment might be easily "digested" by some benevolent individual in this country.

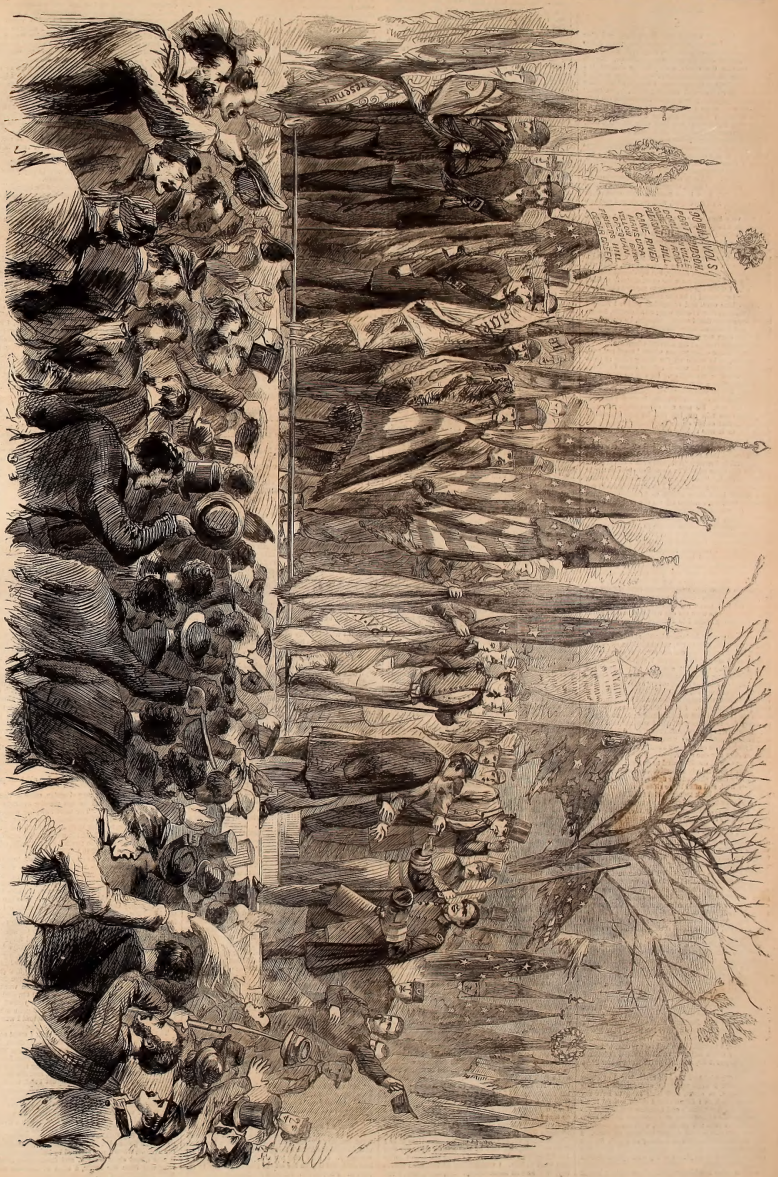
"A man of benevolence and wealth in Glasgow has opened a large number of establishments where meals, ranging but sufficient, are provided at very small cost—breakfast for seven cents, and dinner for—well, wait till I tell you. I recently, determined to obtain actual detail of the ordinary bill of fare prepared for the working-men, and found everything for the small sum of a penny-ha'penny, or three cents. Here it is: A bowl of pea-soup, well made and hot, which I ate with good relish, being fond of the dish, and a meat-pie. Corned beef and three meaty potatoes. The beef was tender and not too salt, and the potatoes such as they should be. Course third—Plum-pudding, savory and well-compounded in its solidity without being heavy. There was a dinner not to be despised by any hungry person, and it was cheap enough. Think of purchasing and cooking food in large quantities. The proprietor informed me that his daily return into the ordinary interest on his money.

A California paper, in commenting upon the great temptations to profanity in that country, gives the following incident:



"An intelligent lady of our acquaintance, whose life the writer has frequently risked with mistakes in grammar to her child her horror of profanity, hit upon the novel means of weaning him out. He started to swear, and whenever he swore. It was an effectual cure. The youngster thought himself choked by the strong grasp of an oath and the taste of soda, which together produced the desired effect."

By all means go to the Park Exhibition; especially if you like chocolate. The latest amusement is to "guess" on the quantity whatever that is to be "wholly devoted" to chocolate. In the centre will be a cocoa-tree, with the nuts ripening or ripened, and mixed with sugar and flavoring condiments. Making, boiling and eating tablets will be carried on in constant work; and, finally, visitors will be enabled to appreciate the merits of the article manufactured by Messrs. Cadbury, which will be handed around to you by young women. We deem it a matter of importance that the Cadbury tablets should be tested, and that they made public; therefore we shall try it—if a cup is handed to us.



Among the curious discoveries of modern times is one which has just been made in Milan. It seems that in one of the bathrooms of that city was a statue of St. Sebastian. The statue was covered with ornaments, by pointed its tears on infidels and heretics. After the manner of the Madonna, this revolution is universally. But at length it happened that the venerated monument needed repairs, and it was necessary to remove the statue. This, when done, revealed to contain a little reservoir of water, which was heated by means of a furnace concealed in the base. The water, in evaporating, rose to the head of the statue, where it condensed and reached to two little tubes of the eyes, when it escaped and was drop by drop over the cheeks. A very ingenious arrangement that! We wonder if the contrivance would be of weeping by steam and be introduced into society generally. It would be a great convenience sometimes to those who depend on tears to move hard-hearted papas or miserly husbands.

ESTELLE.

I.

My mother died when I was very young, and after her death, my father having no settled home, I was sent to receive my education in a convent, where I remained almost entirely till I was seventeen. My life there was on the whole, a very happy one, for, if I knew little of the pleasures of the outside world, I knew also little of its sorrows. I was very fond of the sisters, and had several bosom friends, "girl like," among the pupils. It was rather dull during the holidays, as very often I was the only one who had no home to which I might go, and I was left entirely alone with the sisters; but they were so kind, that although years have elapsed since then, I always recall with pleasure that period of my life.

My father died unexpectedly when I was about seventeen, and the information was then considered rebel. I went to live with my aunt, Mrs. Vereroft, who was my father's sister. My Aunt Vereroft was a widow, who, she had only one child, my Cousin Estelle. Estelle was then, I fancy, about five or six-and-twenty, very beautiful, with large flashing dark eyes, raven hair, tall and well developed, with the air and carriage of a princess.

I felt very lonely on first night I arrived at Gundringham, a large old-fashioned house, situated in one of the midland counties. It was built in red brick with deep mullioned windows, and was surrounded by a richly wooded park, with a river winding away in the distance, forming altogether a pretty landscape. My aunt, who seemed to be a very gentle, quiet woman, received me most kindly, but my Cousin Estelle, after the first salutations were over, scarcely noticed me at all. I think she looked upon me as a child, and I dare say I appeared to be one to her, and being delicate, with long flaxen hair and altogether pretty, I fancy I looked younger than I really was; at all events, Estelle heard me say I was a child, perhaps, but remembered pretty, but I seemed more babyish in looks and manners than my years warranted, which she supposed was the result of my convent education.

There was one other person whom I must not omit to mention, as she made up the family party at Gundringham, although he was not there when I arrived, and this was Cousin Geoffrey. He was no relation to me really, being a cousin of my aunt's husband, Mr. Vereroft, but he was always called Cousin Geoffrey, so I fell into that way of addressing him quite naturally; by with the rest. He was not engaged to live with them, my aunt told me, but that he was constantly there, and that at her death the property would become his, as he was entirely childless, and he was the next heir.

I was very glad when Cousin Geoffrey did come, for Estelle hardly took any notice of me, and my aunt was a great deal by her own room, and even when she was down stairs, she generally sat in an arm-chair working or reading a book. The real management of every thing seemed to fall to Estelle, and I think in her heart my aunt would have been afraid to interfere. Cousin Geoffrey took me quite off me the first day he arrived. He was about seven-and-twenty, tall, and very good-looking, with certain outdoor appearance about him that seemed to oblige people to let him have his own way whether they would or no: even Estelle was different with him, and not know what power he had over her, but he certainly influenced her as I did not think any one else ever done, and she delivered to his opinions and consulted his wishes in a manner that surprised me. And she was quite the same manner to him than any one else, and I noticed her eyes would follow him when she thought no one observed her. Cousin Geoffrey was very kind to me; he helped me to arrange my collection of wild flowers, and sometimes he took me out walking, and he never by an occasion seemed to overlook me as the others did.

There was a good deal more bustle at Gundringham after his arrival, and to me, who had lived so quietly all my life, it seemed an endless round of gayety; but I suppose it only seemed so, for I heard Estelle and Cousin Geoffrey say it was very stupid, and they hoped something would happen soon to enliven them. Some people or another did not know what to do next. I seldom talked myself, I enjoyed listening to the conversation about the neighborhood and whatever happened to be going on. I don't think any one thought about me at all. I had a high white dress, so I put in on every day for dinner, though I was not told to do so. Estelle was always most beautifully dressed herself, and dressed me in very much admired, but somehow I fancied she cared more about Cousin Geoffrey's opinion than any one else's.

She and Cousin Geoffrey used to go out riding. Estelle looked particularly attractive on horseback; the light-fitting habit showed her figure, and she rode exceedingly well, and after those rides it struck me that she always looked more brilliant than usual. My aunt said they had been brought up together, she and Cousin Geoffrey, and naturally they liked each other's society; at all events, they seemed very intimate.

About a fortnight after Cousin Geoffrey's arrival my aunt asked me if I should like to go to a ball, as there was to be one given in the neighborhood, and that they were invited. I hardly knew what to say. Estelle, I thought, liked it of she did not want me to accept, but it was finally settled by Cousin Geoffrey, who said, decisively, that of course I was to be introduced some time or another, and that this was a very good opportunity; and so it was arranged. A few days after the ball Miss Allington, a young lady who lives off, for Estelle to select dresses. Cousin Geoffrey went with us, and kept going into the materials, saying, gayly, that he hated seeing the raw materials, and that he could only judge of the effect when the things were made. We watched his handsome face and figure going leisurely down the street, and then we went to Madame Marie's establishment, a much smaller concern to where Estelle, and I felt quite bewildered by the variety of things she drew out of her boards and boxes for her inspection. After a great deal of trouble in choosing, a pink silk was finally lace was settled upon, and Estelle was leaving the shop without even remembering me at all, when I went to ask if I was to have a dress also. So she stopped, and told Madame Mackenzie, hurriedly, to make me something, and never she liked, only it was to be white, and quite plain. When my dress did come home I thought it looked very pretty, although it was only white tarlatan, and I felt quite childishly anxious to put it on, as I had never worn a low dress before.

At last the night o. the ball arrived, and at about eight o'clock I went up stairs and plaited my hair quite simply, as usual, and then rang to have my dress fastened, as I found that I could not do it for myself. Both my aunt's and Estelle's maids were engaged, so one of the other servants very kindly offered to do her best, and succeeded, with some difficulty on her part and a good deal of patience on mine. I had no ornament, except a string of pearls for my neck, which had belonged to my mother: but I was rather pleasantly surprised at my own appearance in the looking-glass.

Just as I was thinking of going down stairs a knock came to my door, and a hand put down upon a table close by it a beautiful bouquet and one large white rose. It was Cousin Geoffrey's hand, and a voice said, "The rose is for your hair," but before I had time to speak the door had shut again, and he was gone. I took up the rose. I don't think I have ever seen such a rose since, and the perfume of it lingers in my memory still. I felt my fingers tremble with pleasure as I fastened it in my hair, at the thought that I was not forgotten after all.

Well, I went down my aunt said we were late, and that Cousin Geoffrey had gone on. We waited some time for Estelle, who appeared at last, apologizing as to get into the carriage, as she was coming immediately. How beautiful Estelle looked that night! When she came down stairs she had forgotten her fan, so she went waiting for it, and coming to button her glove, just under the hall-lamp, so that I had a good view of her, and I thought pink silk and white lace the most becoming dress, especially when contrasted with Estelle's masses of black hair.

When we arrived at the ball we were given in the Assembly Rooms by some officers who were quartered at Lichfield, a little distance off, and by the lights and the music, and I kept close to my aunt as we passed up the grand staircase, which had a great many people upon it already. Nor did the ball-room reassure me: it all seemed like the fairy land I had read about, and I felt that I must be the enchanted visitor to some genii's palace. Presently I was startled by Cousin Geoffrey asking me to dance. I hesitated for a moment, with a kind of uneasy conviction that Estelle would not like it, but he would not take no answer, and before I could be pointed to Estelle, who was quite at the other end of the room, leading on the arm of some gentleman in uniform, I was whirling round in a uniform all covered with gold lace; so I put my hand into Cousin Geoffrey's arm, and we took our place in the middle of the room, and then he put his arm round my waist, and he seemed to float rather than walk with me, so lightly and gracefully did we tread. When he stopped he said, "You dance very well, little Mabel; are you fond of it?"

I tried to think him for his flowers, but he only laughed, and said that he was glad to see I felt no cheeks flush with pleasure, I was so unused to flattery, and I had received none since I left the convent, and I had received none since I left the convent, and I had received none since I left the convent

"You need not be afraid, little Mabel," a voice said; and in the stranger I recognized Cousin Geoffrey.

"Cousin Geoffrey!" I exclaimed, "here—and at this hour."

He took my hand, and said, gravely, "I wanted to see you. I have waited to see you all the afternoon, and I fancied you would come here this evening."

I wondered why Cousin Geoffrey wanted to see me, and I felt as if something were going to happen.

"Little Mabel," he continued, "I know I can trust you—I have trusted you, and I have come here to-night, because I want you to do something for me. Will you promise to do it, and ask no questions?"

I promised. I should have promised to do whatever Cousin Geoffrey asked me. He drew a sealed packet out of his breast-pocket.

"Will you give this to Estelle?" he said. "Will you give it to her to-night, when she is in her own room, and alone?"

I took the packet in my hand. It had no direction. "For Estelle," was simply written upon the cover.

"I dare not stay my longer," he said, "and I can offer no explanation now, but I promise you," God willing," that on some future day you shall know the reason for my strange visit here to-night. Heaven bless you, little Mabel!" And, before I had time to say another word, he was gone.

I went home directly: I felt afraid of being out alone; my life had begun to seem haunted and unnatural. Cousin Geoffrey's mysterious parting words were all trembling, and when I waited in my own room till thought flowing would have dismissed her maid, and at about twelve o'clock I went to fulfill my promise.

Estelle's room was at exactly the other side of the house to mine, hers being in one of the wings, and mine in the other. Strange as it may seem, I had never been inside it before, and I had never asked me. I knocked softly at the door, and, in answer to the "Come in," I entered. What a strange room, I thought it! Gandringham was a very old place, but in this room, more than any other, I noticed it. The walls and bed were hung with faded tapestry, and a curious oak wardrobe stood against the wall, but the strangest thing of all was a large and beautifully carved black crucifix, beneath which was a prie-dieu, the black velvet cushion of which seemed worn away by being constantly knelt upon. Estelle was sitting by the fire, in which, although it was early in autumn, the embers of a fire were smouldering. She was wrapped in an embroidered cashmere dressing-gown, with all the luxuriance of her raven hair hanging over her shoulders. She started on seeing me, and said, in a tone of great surprise:

"You, Mabel, and at this hour?"

I closed the door behind me, and bolted it.

"I have come, Estelle," I said, "because I promised to give you this letter, and to give it to you when you were alone."

She seized the packet with trembling fingers, and hurriedly broke the seal. I watched her reading it, for I did not like to go away till she had spoken. I never saw any face change so frightfully as hers did in only twenty minutes, it became absolutely gray and livid. Her teeth chattered as if from extreme cold, and when she tried to lay her eyes were dilated, as if she had been horror-stricken. She moved her hand to her head as if in confusion at times, and then for the first time she seemed to remember me.

"Who gave you this?" she said, pointing to the letter.

I told her how I had received it.

"And you know nothing of its contents?"

"Nothing," I replied.

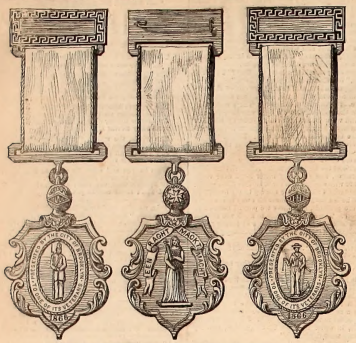
She came closer to me, and stood before me.

"Mabel, you must never mention to any living being what you have seen here to-night; do you promise me?"

I promised.

"Or even say you've been here?"

"Estelle" I exclaimed, "can I do nothing for you?"



Something in my speaking stirred some dreadful ghastly ligs as she said: "Nothing; you have done your work, Mabel, and done it well." And she kissed me, and I left the room.

I looked back as I went out: Estelle was still standing pointing to the door, and I thought her hair looked unnaturally long and black, contrasting as it did with her sad face, and involuntarily I shuddered at the undefined feeling of terror as I crept back to my own room.

I could not go to bed. I was fascinated to watch Estelle's window, which, being in the opposite wing to mine, was what I had a view. Her lamp never went out, and all night long I saw her shadow passing to and fro. What was the mysterious letter that had been so fatal in its effects? What was the mystery hanging over the Vercrofts and Gundringhams?

The next day I heard that Estelle was ill, but that no one was allowed to go near her except her own maid, who was a Frenchwoman. My Aunt Vercroft sat and cried in her arm-chair, and all the bridal preparations were suspended. I wondered and wondered till I felt my brain turn giddy, but I arrived at no conclusions. Cousin Geoffrey never came, and was never mentioned, and the other guests were admitted. The wedding-day came and went by. I supposed all the guests had been put off; but Mabel undeceived my surprise I don't know.

Every day I heard that Estelle was ill, and sometimes I thought she would die, and that unknowingly to mine, was what I wished. Her image

MEDALS PRESENTED TO THE VETERANS OF BROOKLYN.

PRESENTATION OF MEDALS IN BROOKLYN.

THE presentation of Medals to Veteran Sailors and Soldiers of King's County, at Brooklyn, October 25, was an occasion of much interest. We give an illustration of the presentation ceremonies on page 718.

Governor FENTON and Staff and a large number of invited guests were present, including Admiral BELL and Staff General NEWTON, General VERDERA, General DE LACY, and other military men. The members of the Board of Supervisors, the various judges, and many leading clergymen of Brooklyn were present.

The persons present were introduced to Governor FENTON, who cordially greeted them. At the close of this ceremony Admiral FARRAGUT was announced, and received with applause. The veteran was introduced to many of the gentlemen present.

DR. VINTON called upon Governor FENTON to make a few remarks, when the Governor said that he was glad of an opportunity to visit the prosperous city of Brooklyn, and to extend his acquaintance with her citizens. In introducing his military family among them, he was grateful for their warm reception.

Admiral FARRAGUT was called upon for a speech, and said he would follow the example of the Governor, and be brief. He had understood that the occasion was meant as a compliment to the veterans of Brooklyn. As he was not a soldier of this district he esteemed the honor of this warm reception more highly.

The procession was then formed. The avenues through which the troops moved were thronged with spectators. Flags were displayed from windows and balconies, and the veterans were greeted by the waving of handkerchiefs all along the route.

The military looked well, and the procession was very imposing in respect to numbers. There were over one hundred carriages in the line, and about eight thousand troops. The column marched from the City Hall at about twelve o'clock, moving through Remsen Street to Henry Street, through Henry Street to Atlantic Street, through Atlantic Street to Hanson Place, through Hanson Place to Fulton Avenue, through Fulton and Gates Avenues to Clinton Avenue, and through Clinton and Myrtle Avenues and Cumberland Street to the Park. On reaching the Park the Governor and Staff took a fine position in the centre of the east side of Fort Greene, where he reviewed the procession.

After passing the Governor the troops entered the Park at the northeast gate. On the centre of the hill a large platform was constructed, from which the prizes were to be delivered. The police kept a large space open in front of this platform, in the centre of which the veterans took position.

The other troops marched around the brow of the hill, and halted at various elevated points. Notwithstanding the fact that a cold wind was blowing there were from fifteen to twenty thousand spectators present, who remained until the close of the ceremonies.

The view from the platform was very imposing. It took in several thousand troops, and a greater number of citizens. The review occupied over an hour. At its close the Governor and Staff proceeded to the stand in front of which the veterans had gathered, and the medals were presented to those entitled to receive them. In order to avoid delay they had been put up so as to deliver to the respective captains under which the men had served.

The medals were presented by Mayor BOOTH, and were received by ex-Mayor WOOD on behalf of the veterans, who made an able and eloquent speech.

The members of the committee had a beautiful gold medal made for Admiral FARRAGUT, which was presented to him at the dinner.

FALL OF BUILDINGS IN CHICAGO.

WE illustrate on page 716 the terrible accident which happened at Chicago on the night of October 21. The event is thus described by the Chicago Tribune of October 22:

An appalling calamity befell a portion of the city during the violent storm of last night. Between eleven and twelve o'clock a terrific crash resounded ominously over the whole of the central portion of the city.

It proved to be the fall of a huge brick structure in process of erection near the corner of Madison and State streets. It was one of those hastily and cheaply-cobbled-together pieces of architecture which are a disgrace to any city. The gale last night, though not excessively fierce, proved too much for this fragile mass of uncompleted mason-work, and the whole edifice caved in and fell like an avalanche, carrying death and tortures worse than death, to the homes of many families who lived in the surrounding tenements.

Such a scene of devastation and misery as presented itself immediately after the edifice fell it would be difficult to describe. Almost from M'Vicker's Theatre, on Madison Street, round the corner and along State Street for some distance, making a very considerable section of a square, the frame tenements which had stood there were so completely flattened and crushed that the upper stories were on a level with the sidewalk. The sidewalks were entirely uprooted from the ground, and the outer edges stuck out in the form of an abatti. Clambering up to these swaying planks, one had to slide down an inclined plane to the horrible mass of ruins in the centre. The police were summoned, and from every station they soon began to muster in large force. The fire-bell pealed forth its alarm, and the department were speedily on hand. The citizens, too, came to the spot in crowds, attracted by the alarm from the Court-house. Then the work of excavation began in earnest. The inmates were dragged forth from their living graves, some terribly mangled, some only cut and scratched, and some entirely unscathed. Every one was of course eager to help, and the real difficulty with the police was now to keep the volunteers from overcrowding the scene of action. Body after body was carried out, most of them fortunately alive, and again the search was prosecuted, until about two o'clock it was supposed that the great majority of those who had been buried were recovered.

How so many escaped being crushed to death will seem little short of miraculous to every one who views the ruins. Yet such hair-breadth escapes are often heard of in such accidents.

The building which has been the cause of all this devastation was being erected by Mr. SWARZ as a wholesale store. It appears that the walls of the new block were but sixteen inches thick, much too thin for the great height to which they were carried up, and during Sunday they were found to have bulged out in an alarming manner—so much so that the opinion had been expressed that they would fall before morning, and the families in the adjoining buildings had retired with a considerable feeling of apprehension.

TROUTING.

SCRAMBLING over boulders,
Grumbling over "falls,"
Rambling through green meadows,
Where the May-fly calls;
Tumbling out by daybreak—
"Madam" in a pout—
Gracious! this is pleasant,
Tripping after trout!

Violets by the brook-brink,
Sweets as "Stella's" eyes;
Bluebirds flood the morning
With a glad surprise:

Off before your mother
Fairly knows you're out—
Goodness! ain't it jolly
Tramping after trout!

Tripping over mosses,
Slipping over stones,
Creeping through morasses,
Chill'd through blood and bones;
"Dipping" into spring-holes,
Ripping something out—
Goodness! but 'tis pleasant,
Whipping after trout.

Stumbling over saw-logs,
Where they've made a jam;
No one can say this stream
Isn't worth a dam:
Water, "cold as blazes,"
Foams your feet about;
Catch your death of—"Whist, man!
Did you see that trout?"

Ply him gently—kindly—
Horse-hair is but frail;
There's a speckled "beauty!"
Crook's hooks never fail.
Twenty ounces, plump, Sirs
(Heft him if you doubt);
Silver, gold, and garnets—
What can match a trout?

Lightly drops the "hackle,"
Blithely sings the stream,
Brightly burst the foam-bells
Like a poet's dream.
Splash! There goes a "luncheer!"
Whir! and he is out!
What school is so charming
As a school of trout?

Now you spread your luncheon
'Neath a spreading tree;
Never son of "Walton"
Half so glad as "we."

Berkshire skies above us,
Berkshire hills about,
All the pools a-sparkle,
Bright with speckled trout.

Clambering over cascades,
Where the senses reel;
Stonishing the "natives"
With a well-fill'd creel:
Whipping out the "said"-cre,
Who "jabbered" flout,
Maybe 'tisn't pleasant
Angling after trout!

Soon you hook your "fifty"
('Tis a fet you're on)—
Soon you join "The Colonel,"
Who declines he's one!
Soon you reach your cottage—
Kiss the Maiden's pouting
Lips (still in your dot-and-go)
And so ends your trouting!

Rattle-snakes! and 'sketers!—
Wet feet and burnt faces!—
Who says anglers' lines are
"Cast in pleasant places?"
Try it in "Green" River;
But, before you trout it,
Just ask Mr. Editor
What he thinks about it!

THE CRETAN INSURRECTION.

OUR latest news in regard to the Candian insurrection is a telegram from London of October 23, which conveys the intelligence of the defeat of the Turkish army by the Christians after four days of heavy fighting.

Four months ago the Christians of Crete demanded justice according to the laws of the Ottoman Empire, and asked for the execution of the privileges conferred on them by the Hatti Humayoun. That phase of the movement is passed. They now assert the inalienable right of nations to enjoy political liberty, and in virtue of this right they have declared Crete independent, and decreed its union with the kingdom of Greece.

A virtual declaration of war on the part of the Christians took place on the 12th of August. The population of several districts about Mount Ida published a decree establishing a "Sacred Battalion" of 400 veteran soldiers to fight for the cross, and appointed a chief to command it. Several revolutionary proclamations have been subsequently published in different parts of the island. At last, on the 24 of September, a number of leading men from the Eparchies, in the western part of Creta, met and signed a document decreeing the perpetual abolition of the Turkish authority in Crete and its dependencies, the union of the island with Greece under GEORGE I. as King of the Hellenes, and intrusting the execution of the decree to the valor of the people, the assistance of all Greeks and Philhellenes, and the intervention of the great protecting and guaranteeing Powers of Europe.

The first engagement with bloodshed took place on the 28th of August, not between Hellenes and Ottoman soldiers, but among the Cretans themselves. The Mussulmans of Selinos and the Christians had a skirmish, in which it was said that the Turkish troops took no part, but this was perhaps only the first spark to the train which has since lighted up the Greek fire for a general conflagration.

It is to the mountainous character of the Island that the insurgents probably owe their present security; for, bodies being traversed throughout the whole length by the lofty range running parallel to the south coast, there are other ranges dispersed over the whole surface. In the centre of Candia, more modestly known as Mount Psiloriti, 7690 feet high. The other loftiest summits are toward the west, the Sfakian or white mountains, where the heights are covered with snow for three parts of the year. The highest elevations there are about 8000 feet. The greater part of these mountains are clothed with forests of olive, chestnut, walnut, and pine trees, oaks, and cypresses. They contain a remarkable number of caverns and grottoes, including that famous classic labyrinth, the extensive and intricate natural excavation at the foot of Mount Ida.

Crete is unquestionably an island worth winning. If it can be won either by writing about it or even by fighting for it—which is a thing the Greeks seem less inclined to undertake. In size and population Crete is little inferior, and in fertility and position far superior to Corsica. In extent it has not yet been all destroyed by repeated conflagrations, like its trees which once covered the mountains in Greece. The population exceeds 250,000 at whom upward of 60,000 are Musulmans of the Greek race, and who speak only the Greek language.

Our illustration is taken from a sketch of an insurgent encampment in the mountains, where, with that defiance of fatigue and that indifference to luxury which are such prominent characteristics of the people in a time of national tumult, the men are waiting and watching from the mouth of a cave in a irregular army, amidst the mossy rocks of that chain from act to west, the culminating point of which is Mount Ida.

FISHING UP THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

We give on page 08 two sketches taken by Mr. ROBERT DUDLEY on board the Great Eastern the first representing the Great Eastern at the moment of raising the hole, while another shows the interior of the electricians' testing-room on board the ship, with the group of gentlemen anxiously watching the process. The following narrative, which is from Mr. DUDLEY'S own pen, will be read with much interest:

"For nearly three weeks—from August 12, when we reached the long-looking-ground in mid-Atlantic, to September 1—had hope and disappointment alternated in the heart of those who, hovering like the gulls above the quarry, watched and waited to secure the prize that so often escaped them. Again and again grapnel after grapnel had felt along the dark bed of the ocean in search of the trust rope; and on the one memorable occasion they not only secured the treasure, but held it firmly until the eyes of the eager crowd over the bow bulwarks saw the veritable cable dragged slowly out of the water, glided over the rail and given had no subsequent triumph been won than the one to secure to all the double, the redoubled, the denials, the accidentally irrefragable proofs that to expect ever to have the lost cable to be found was to look for the working of an impossibility. The cable had been found, but it had been again lost. Perhaps sadly, though under most skilful handling, and sheltered as we had proved to the directing hand of her ever-watching commander, had seen the sport of the elements, driving her ship, but not driving her was or wanted to go. The elements had been adverse, and in spite of all we had no vessel under us to receive us all efforts to continue the work, and we had Canseau and Halifax before us. Still we had hope, but a more prosy time might come than was in the nature of man to wish was, we might yet be met with calmer and brighter weather, were it but for a day or two. Winter—calm winter—was the time for hope-word. And well was their indomitable, a perseverance in that of a day or two was given us on the last day of August the sun shone out; the pulse of the ocean, grown still beating, but gradually calming down; the wind was heard; and as the grapnel was thrown, hope and grasp grew strong.

"No need to write now how during that and the following day hope trembled, disappointment became sensed, and found its climax in certainty; that days in succession on which it would be needful for any description to cover a full idea of the anxious watching of the appearance of the cable on the night of September 1. A hope almost painful in its intensity seemed to fill the air all, as from midnight until 4 o'clock the hours of the great ship were filled with earnest, eager labor, her forward bulwarks and after passers seeking to pierce the darkness as the dredging was below the sea, casualties even accompanying the rearing more of the straining grappling rope as it dragged its way. Was ever a ship ever so long? And so along over 2 wheels and past the recording dynamometer, as the huge drums ran round, well performing their Titan task, slow but very sure! It came on at last the wire grappling rope, succeeded by the strong chain upon which hung the grapnel. And so it came at last, and was long, seemed an one's month; scarce a second was heard from the experimental watchers; the quiet word of command from Captain Anderson as forward by the wheels stopped, and the chain, in the bight of which as the grapnel, holding a wire-rope group the next measure, was put more away from the ship's side. During waters, it was almost as sacred experience that the words "Stop!" was needful to speak, for to be said it is there!" We were entranced, so hope's resurrection of the cable from the sea when, on the 2d great, the sight of a small and calmed cable from a floating welcome of hands as I may be that the so long sight and the safe arrival of the consuming mystery of mourning and inconsistency and the electrician's test. And so we sing from sea to sea, even upon the cables of the sea, and our land resounds with the shouts and most accessory measures were taken for securing the cable. A piece of rope and chain passed from which strong hawsers passed over the side of wheels on the bows. At night all was secured, and the cable freed from the grapnel, which, hauled in on the port side, was carried aft past us by two sailors, though not without much examination and interest expressed for the skilful servant; and now the cable then appeared over the centre wheel. How it was marshalled at each sight as the moon and night's hour afforded. How it was followed in its course along the platform toward the drums by many feet and hands. For my own part, with others, I made my way, in accordance with an invitation from Willoughby Smith, to the electricians' room (the Test-room, to speak more technically). Here, after another hour's preparation, during which time the cable had been carefully passed round the drums of the picking-up machinery and a sufficient length drawn on board, the severed end was received. And now, In their mysterious, darkened haunt, the wizards are ready to work their spells upon the tamed lightning. Not 'unholy spells' are there, or secret, for, though the Atlantic flow is but of limited dimensions, they have not been averse to the presence of a few visitors. Mr. Gooch is looking on; Professor Thomson, be sure, is here, a worthy Wizard of the North; Fleeming Jenkin could no more be absent than the cable itself; I think, too, CANNING, first at work, as he is, beyond it in the ship, must have dropped in just for a moment; CLIFFORD, Lewis, Clifford, Halpin, Dean, Wollaston, all have in their several ways a great interest in every movement of Wilkinson Spencer and Willoughby Smith, and Bernard Oliver; and, when the core of the cable is stripped and the bare line-for-deed—the wire—placed in the instrument, and three two electricians bend over the galvanometer in patient watching for some message from that fore-of hand of home to which the great news has just been signaled; then the momentary stillness of the test-room is even deepened; the ticking of the galvanometer seems to sound as in the night's quarter of an hour has passed and still no sign! Suddenly! Whatsoever may what it is not for the British bursts from his lips, echoed by all on board with a volley of cheers, echoed from the world far having been 'bottled up' during the last three hours. Along the deck outside, over the ship, throughout the ship, the pent-up enthusiasm overflowed; and even before the test-room was cleared from the throng of our guns drowned the buzzes of the crew, and the whir of rockets was heard right high into the clear morning sky to greet our consort-ships with the glad intelligence.

"When came the effecting of the recovered cable with that rolled in one and the same time, and the delicate operation of passing the cable round from the bow to the stern of the ship, and the commencement of paying the order was given, 'Full speed ahead!' and we soon had our course of the ocean, and were steaming in the wake of the ship; and so, by eight o'clock in the morning, securely say once, I think, that the night was safely paying out again, and the ship's head was once more toward the shores of Newfoundland."

SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

The International Suspension Bridge, of which we give an illustration on page 712, is two miles below Niagara Falls. It connects the Great Western Railroad of Canada with the several railroads of New York. The bridge is a single span of 800 feet in length, elevated 230 feet above the Niagara River, which runs beneath it at the rate of 25 miles an hour, with breakers dashing from 10 to 20 feet high. During the season of travel the Maid of the Mist makes trips from the New York shore under the bridge to the foot of the Falls. It was from the deck of this vessel that General Scott took the sketch after which he celebrated painting of Niagara Falls was made. The view from this point is the most magnificent which can be obtained.

The Suspension Bridge is supported by four wire cables 9½ inches in diameter, with an ultimate capacity of sustaining 10,000 tons.

RAILROAD BRIDGE AT PORTAGE, NEW YORK.

The railroad bridge across the Genesee River at Portage, on the Erie Railroad, which we illustrate on page 712, is surrounded by as wild and picturesque of the kind in the world. It is built across a deep dell, into which the Genesee enters at this point, upon thirteen massive stone piers. At the top of the river, the stone being built sufficiently high to avoid all danger of freshets. The bridge itself is a huge mass of timber, and is 800 feet in length. It was completed in 1853, and is undoubtedly the finest wooden bridge in the world. It is said to be so constructed that any timber in the bridge can be removed and replaced at pleasure. The Genesee Valley Canal passes under the bridge.

The scenery at this point is wild and picturesque. The Genesee River enters the ravine only to seek lower and still more picturesque depths. Under the bridge, and in sight of the cars, is the first fall, a half horse-shoe, about 40 feet high and a quarter of a mile further down the river, another fall, one of the most beautiful cascades in America. The fall is 80 feet high, and when the water is low the appearance is that of a huge irregular wall of lace thrown out in front of a black rock.

BARBECUE AT AUGUSTA.

The illustration which we give on page 716 represents a scene very characteristic at the South. It has special reason now for attention which we have illustrated was a desire on the part of the citizens of Augusta, Georgia, to do honor to General Sheridan and Peyton, sent by President Johnson to investigate the Freedmen's Bureau.

Barbecues are very frequent at the South in time of political excitement. The negroes also have their barbecues, generally at the close of their labors in getting in the cotton crop.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1858 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was affected with an irritation of the throat, attended with a most distressing cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation having for its base the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the care of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure effected. Soon after the cure I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for years with a bad cough, which was occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. In a few weeks she found relief, and was more. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1858, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled."—Boston Journal.

The great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheritic affections, spitting of blood, and all bronchial affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel, and for piles and scurvy it will be found valuable.

TO THE

DEBILITATED AND THE DECREPIT.

For general debility and exhaustion of the powers of nature, whether occasioned by sickness, fast living, constitutional decay, old age, or any other physical or mental cause, the one thing needful and indispensable is HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. When the fire of life seems to be declining or dying out in the system, and the mind, sympathizing with the body, is reduced almost to a state of imbecility, the stimulative seems, as it were, to lift the sufferer out of the Slough of Despond, and recruit and reinvigorate both the frame and the intellect. An old farmer in the Valley of the Monongahela writes thus to Dr. Hostetter; "I can compare the operation of your Bitters upon me to nothing but the effect of a fine shower on a long dry spell in the fall of the year. The rain falling on the meadows starts the second crop of grass, and your wholesome medicine seems to have started a second crop of the vital spirits in me." And this is truly the effect of this grateful and powerful preparation. Ladies of weak constitution, or whose strength has been impaired by sickness or age, find it a most efficacious and delightful Tonic, and it is administered with great success, in marasmus or wasting of the body, to young children. In fact it is a much safer and surer cordial for the nursery than any thing advertised specially for that purpose.

THE PRESENT NUMBER closes the TWENTY-THIRD VOLUME OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The Conductors believe that its variety and interest it has been exceeded by no previous Volume, and their arrangements insure that this interest and value will be fully maintained in the issues of Volume.

In the Number for December will be commenced "THE VIRGINIANS OF TEXAS," A Tale by GEORGE F. HARRINGTON, Author of "Inside: A Chronicle of Secession." This tale was written just before the breaking out of the War, but its publication was postponed in consequence of the events of the time. The Author, at that time a resident of Texas, describes the life and adventures of a Virginian Planter, who, with his family, emigrated to the "New Dominion." The tale is of special interest at the present time, setting forth what Texas was before the war; what it would not have been but for the war; and what it may yet become notwithstanding the war, when liberty is secured, law maintained, and industry restored under the Union.

GENERAL STEPHENS will continue his "Personal Recollections of the War;" and the various departments of the Magazine, whether furnished by the Editors or by Contributors, will be maintained in such a manner as to merit a continuance of the favor which the Magazine has received for almost Seventeen YEARS.

Terms for Harper's Magazine and Weekly, 1867:

MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year.....4 00

An extra copy of either the Weekly or the Magazine will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance, or Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for six months, will be furnished for $3 00 per Volume, and sent by mail, postage paid. A Complete set of the Weekly, each Volume containing the Numbers for one year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid.

 The POSTAGE on the MAGAZINE is now 24 cents a year, and on the WEEKLY 20 cents a year, payable quarterly, semi-yearly, or yearly, at the office where received.

Subscriptions from the British Provinces of North America must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, and 20 cents for the Weekly, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine and Weekly will find on each paper the Number with which their subscription expires, as entered on our books. In renewing a subscription, it is desired that the Number with which it is to commence should be stated. The name of the Post-Office, County, and State should be clearly written. Names should be distinctly written: Thus—"Renew the subscription of Harper's Magazine or Weekly, commencing with Number ——, John Adams, Jackson, Pike County, Ohio."

In changing the direction, the old, as well as the new address must be given. Twelve Numbers of volumes of Magazine or Weekly from John Adams, Jackson, Pike County, Ohio, to Mary Adams, Franklin, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania."

The Magazine and Weekly are always stopped when the term of subscription expires. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for JUNE and DECEMBER of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the Number for JULY. When no time is specified, it is understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of the order.

Back Numbers of both Magazine and Weekly can always be supplied.

In remitting by mail, a POST-OFFICE ORDER or a DRAFT upon NEW YORK, payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS, is preferable to bank notes, as should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.

 Those who wish to renew subscriptions, or to commence with the present Volume, are requested to notify Harper & Brothers at once. An order for the Magazine Book may be promptly advised.

These piano-fortes are the only instruments made in this country or in Europe with the full iron frame, in which all the strings rest upon wooden bearings, and in which none of the tuning pins go through the iron plate. The advantages gained by this arrangement are the production of a more musical and refined tone with combined sweetness and great power, a more perfect equality throughout the entire scale, and the capacity of standing longer in tune, and retaining its superior quality of tone better than any other instrument. Purchasers will find the following words cast on the left-hand side of each Patent Plate: "DECKER BROTHERS' PATENT, JUNE, 1863."

A CONFEDERATE CEMETERY.

We give herewith a view of the Confederate Cemetery at Franklin, Tennessee—the scene, as our readers remember, of the battle between General SCHOFIELD and the rebels under General HOOD, a little before the great and decisive battle of Nashville. The Cemetery is beautifully situated, about a mile southeast of Franklin, on the farm of Colonel JOHN M'GAVOCK. It contains 1483 graves, and in its general appearance is an improvement upon some of the National Cemeteries which we have had occasion to illustrate.

HURRICANE IN THE BAHAMAS.

THE storm at Nassau, which we illustrate below, was but a portion of the sweeping hurricane that, on the 1st of last month, visited the Bahamas.

At Nassau the storm came on gradually. The day before its violent outburst the gale blew a fresh breeze from the sea, which increased during the night, and the next morning became a regular gale, accompanied with rain. The bar of the harbor appeared a ridge of foam, and the harbor itself, though protected against the main sea, had no shelter from a gale which was every moment increasing in violence. The ships, as far as they could be seen up the harbor, began to sway to and fro. The shipping along the wharves soon began to suffer. Small boats, lumber, and various fragments began to be scattered about on the wharves, and spacious stores and warehouses in the vicinity were unroofed, and the sheets of metal of which the roofs were made were whirled along in the wind and torn up like sheets of paper. Soon the whole thoroughfare was covered with fragments of shipping and stores. Both the violence of the wind and the missiles which it hurled recklessly about made it perilous to walk the streets, and the few foot-passengers out might be seen clinging to lamp-posts waiting for a lull.

About 1.30 or 2 P.M. it was impossible to remain abroad; it was dangerous to take shelter under walls or houses, and totally impossible to remain standing when exposed to the presence of the wind, which shook every building. The sensation within doors was like the vibrations of a railway-car attached to an express train; the noise of the wind, combined with the sound of the waves, kept up a loud bellowing roar, varied with thunder-like gusts, and were succeeded by a crashing sound which indicated destruction of some kind or other. Green seas were now breaking upon the wharves of the town and Government property, sending their spray over the tops of the houses, and, together with the heavily falling rain and hail, made the air as obscure as the thickest fog, which, as it now and again cleared partially for a few moments, shows some further damage. Houses being dismantled in all directions, and the fragments intermingled with branches of trees, swept along at an alarming pace. The trees that remained standing were being rapidly stripped of their leaves. About 2.30 fully a third of the roofing of the Officers' Quarters came off and fell with a heavy crash into Fleming Square, and shortly after the shingles began flying off the roof of the west range of the men's barracks like feathers. The pinnacles of Christ Church Cathedral had gone—the flag-staff at Government House likewise—and the roof of that building began to show signs of going; every house was in a state of commotion, the wind and rain penetrating every where, doing every kind of damage, and causing indescribable inconvenience. A lull in the storm occurred about 7.30 or 8 P.M., which fortunately enabled those who had some shelter remaining to offer a share of it to their less fortunate neighbors. Next morning the whole scene was indeed a desolation, the most familiar objects were scarcely to be recognized; some gone entirely. The fine Methodist Church had fallen, together with many minor buildings; the landscape was bleak and dreary, the leafless trees, a dull gray sky with dusky scudding clouds gave quite a wintry aspect, very unusual in a tropical climate.

The United States Consul, Mr. KIRKPATRICK, under date of Nassau, October 9, in addressing the Secretary of State, says the hurricane on the 1st inst. was one of the severest and most destructive that has occurred since 1815. "There is scarcely a house in this place," he adds, "or on the Bahamas, that has not suffered to some extent, while the destruction to the shipping in the harbor and along the coast has been alike fearful. The loss of life, although small here, has been severe on some of the out-islands. Out at sea a large number of vessels were wrecked.

THE HURRICANE ON THE BAHAMAS—SCENE AT NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE ISLAND, October 1, 1866.

A RING POSY.

Jeas and Jill are pretty girls,
Plump and full of fun to do,
In a cloud of windy curls:
Yet I know who

I'm not pretty, not a bit;
Thin and sallow-pale;
When I trudge along the street
I don't need a veil:

Yet I have one fancy hit.

Jess and Jill can trill and sing
With a flute-like voice,
Dance as light as bird on wing,
Laugh for careless joys:
Yet it's I who wear the ring.

Jess and Jill will mate some day,
Surely surely;
Ripen on to June through May,
While the sun shines make their hay,
Skeleton steps demurely:
Yet even there I lead the way.

NOTES FROM A SEA JOURNAL.

BY ROGER STARBUCK.

THE weather was cold and blustering; we had rounded Cape Horn, and were now rolling along under close-reefed topsails and jib, past the dreary Isle of Desolation. Muffled in their great pea-jackets, the men would walk the decks briskly, occasionally dancing, sparring, etc., to keep themselves warm. I used to amuse myself for hours watching their movements from my post of observation on the quarter-rail, where, rolled up in my Esquimaux coat, I loved to sit and smoke my ivory pipe, made of a whale's jaw-bone.

Not unfrequently some anxious tar would come up from the mug forecastle to take a look at his beloved clothes, recently washed, and now whipping about on the line extending across the deck.

Alas! the poor clothes, incapable of keeping themselves warm by exercise, were all frozen as stiff as pasteboard; so that their owner must carry them to the galley in his half-benumbed fingers, and thaw them by the stove if he wished to have them ready for Sunday.

The captain's wife was aboard; she was a neat little body, with hair combed very smooth, kind blue eyes, brisk manners, and a sweet voice. The rough fellows—every man of them—liked her, and I believe would have gone through fire and water to serve her; for she was always sending forward something nice for them to eat, and there was no end to the unexpected watches below which were accorded them through her influence. On pleasant days—dear me! how few of them lately—she would bring up her sewing, and sit near the binnacle chatting to the man at the wheel, and taking his part by cracking a joke and a while, gentle face, who was saved many times from the blows of a "rope's end" by his "little lady." She seemed to take quite a fancy to the boy, who hadn't a single chum aboard the ship. In fact he was so reserved, so devoted to a few old books which he had brought with him, that there was no chance for the men to cultivate his acquaintance. He seemed well disposed, however, never interfered with his shipmates' business, and was always ready to give away a part of his allowance to the man who was not satisfied with his own.

Will, as I said, the "little lady"—so we called her—was out on the lark. Not one of the officers dared to say a cross word to him when she was near. She felt for him a sort of motherly interest. I think, because he had nobody but her to watch over and protect him; for he—alas, poor boy!—he had none of the feelings of a man, young as he was, and so loved and cherished her with his whole soul.

One cold, moonlight night, while he was steering, she brought him a pair of mittens which she had made with her own pretty hands. One of these soft hands he kissed by some uncontrollable impulse as he took the mittens; but he soon had reason to repent of his temerity. The captain saw that kiss; furious with jealousy, he raved like a madman.

"What!" cried she, "jealous of poor little Derrick?—of a mere boy?"

"Hy, ay," he replied, grinding his teeth, "but I don't believe this is the first of your 'billing and cooing' with him."

"How ridiculous!" answered the little lady; and by every art in her power she endeavored to soothe her angry lord.

For the first time since her marriage she was unsuccessful. The captain ordered her into the cabin, and shut her up in her own room.

And now it fared hard with poor Derrick. Day after day, night after night, with but little intermission, he was kept hard at work by the cruel skipper. Lumber and palet grew less and every hour. I believe the absence of the woman he loved affected him fully as much as his hard tasks; for he would cast his glances toward the quarter-deck, robbed of that gentle form, and breathe heavy sighs.

Many of us remonstrated with the captain, but he heeded us not, and went on overworking the boy. Soon the sufferer was reduced to a mere skeleton—nothing shadow—and then the skipper relented a little. His victim was permitted to go below once in a while to rest himself. He kept pining, however, and was finally unable to leave his bunk. The men were not surprised one morning when the mate, entering the forecastle, looked at the sharp white face, the damp brown hair, and said that the boy was dying!

Then the captain, struck with remorse, sent for his wife.

What strange power is there in a woman's hand? The moment the little lady's touched the invalid's brow he seemed to revive.

A week later he was able to go about the decks. One evening about a month from that time, during a heavy gale, the captain's foot slipped while he was on the lee rail, and he fell into the sea, but contrived to cling to the main chains. There was his wife, half distracted, begging somebody to save her husband—endeavoring to save him herself, perling her own life for his, but without success.

It seemed as if the captain must soon let go his hold. The men were all aloft, and could do nothing in time to save him.

Derrick, who had been steering, now bounded into the waist, fastened around his body a rope, one end of which was attached to the mast, and plunging overboard, succeeded in holding his captain until both could be lifted from their perilous situation by the crew.

The skipper received his half-fainting wife in one arm, and with his disengaged hand clasped that of the boy.

"God forgive me for my jealousy!" he cried. "You are a noble lad, Derrick; and had I allowed you to die my own fate must have been scaled a moment after."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1866.

CONGRESS.

THE Congressional elections of the autumn have been another and a noble vindication of the principle of our Government, and a prodigious warning to any officer of the Government who ventures even to seem to erect the personal will above the public will and conviction. The grossest insult ever offered to the American people was the declaration of the President that he might become himself Dictator, and the most stupid political blunder was the assertion of the Postmaster-General that the officers of the United States Government were the masters of the President's bread and butter. Both of the remarks were rhetorical, doubtless; but they struck that righteous, popular indignation in which alone dwells safety in the Republic. For the first time Congress was publicly derided by the Executive. And what is Congress? It is the people of the United States representatively assembled. In the Congressional elections have been the prodigious, threefold protest of the people—first, against the assumption of the President to have a policy in a matter entirely beyond his authority; second, against the fatal incompleteness of the conditions he proposed; and third, against the Executive assault upon Congress, which dared even to hint at military subversion of the Government. The elections of 1864 were not more significant than those of 1866.

Now that the Union majority in Congress is fully determined, and that there is no question of its overpowering ascendency, it is natural to ask what Congress is likely to do. Will it impose severer conditions of restoration? Will it impeach the President? Will it pass a high tariff? Will it adopt a peremptory tone toward England upon the Alabama claims? Will it be a rash or a wise Legislature?

The Congress that meets in December is not, indeed, the Congress that has been just elected, but it is composed in great part of the present members, and the elections have been a distinct popular approval of the general Congressional policy. But we have not those who suppose that the elections have given Congress carte blanche, authorizing it to do whatever eccentricity or extravagance may propose; and we have every reason, from the character of the last session, and from the general tendency of human nature, that the policy of Congress will be neither timid nor rash, but will faithfully express the general good sense of the people, which is carrying the country swiftly and safely through its present perplexities. Those who persistently reason of the people of the United States they as if they were the French Revolutionists of 1793 will probably see nothing but a reign of terror in the assembly of "a Radical Congress." But many persons have neither faith in popular government nor in any other principle which requires confidence in the public good sense. When a New York mob hangs and burns negroes and children these persons think they see the inevitable result of a free popular system. But when the American people wages tremendous war for Union and Liberty and then expresses and see no reason to believe that the American people know what they are doing.

But they did know what they and they do know now. The new Congress will be like the late Union Convention in this State. There has never been a Convention so harmoniously radical, and never one whose action was so sagacious. It could have done any thing. It could have said any thing. To the most radical sentiment it was like tinder to the spark. The good sense was as conspicuous as its profound conviction. The very consciousness that it was unchecked by any opposition, and that it was merely acting for vast national ends, kept it in warm temper to a moderate speech, and its wisdom disappointed its sincerest enemies. It will be the same with Congress during this session as it was during the last. The President and his friends have tired the language with abuse of Congress. But what did Congress do? What Radical leader said, "Follow"? Congress completes the conditions upon which alone the President approved the restoration of the rebel States; and while it honored, as all faithful citizens must, the fidelity to liberty and justice of men like Mr. SUMNER and Mr. STEVENS, the Congressional policy was indicated by men like Mr. FESSENDEN.

Unless in the Maryland difficulty or some other matter the President shall exasperate and alarm the country, we do not believe that in the present condition of public opinion he will be impeached. Mr. BINGHAM and General BUTLER and their friends will doubtless represent that the strong feeling against the President has been in great degree placated by the elections. So long as there were doubt and fear as to the condition of the public mind and the President's opportunities and intentions there was naturally extreme bitterness toward him. But as it appeared that the public sentiment and resolution were unshaken, the Presidential chances and designs, whatever the latter may have been, dwindled so as to become mainly matters of curiosity. Nor do we anticipate at this session of Congress the proposition of any severer conditions of restoration than the adoption of the Amendment. The precedent of Tennessee will undoubtedly be followed. If any unrepresented State ratifies the Amendment she will resume her place in Congress.

The experiment of the last session in regard to the tariff will not be lost upon Congress. The Union party as such takes no ground upon the subject. It is neither a Protective nor a Free-trade party. It does, without question, favor a tariff for revenue during the present exigency. But the attempt to frame a protective tariff during the last session was direct aid and comfort to the President in his plan of demoralizing and destroying the party. The alienation of a certain portion of the party in the early summer was greatly due to the extremely unwise and inexcusable course upon this subject of some prominent representatives. The latter policy could be repeated only with the same result, and at a time when Union is the most sacred, patriotic duty of the party.

The tone of Congress in our foreign policy ought to be conciliatory and moderate. The only disturbing questions are the position of France in Mexico—a question which is conclusively answering itself, and which needs no rhetoric to invoke Monroe—and the Alabama claims, which can equally dispense with BUNCOMB in their settlement. All that is necessary is, that Congress should apply the same vigilant good sense to the foreign affairs of the country which the members individually devote to their private affairs. And it will be of the utmost service in the saving of the country, public vexation, and national honor if those members who may be classified as the sensational members should be left at home to mind their own business, and not regarded as especially representative of any body but themselves, or of any purpose but their own ambition.

The country has ratified the policy of restoration. It has expressed its confidence in Congress, and it remains for Congress to work rather than to talk.

THE END OF AUSTRIA IN ITALY.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Daily News writes from Venice, from Venice, that "There was a trampling of feet along the narrow passage beside my hotel at four o'clock this morning. At the bells grew fainter and fainter there was a hoarse word of command and a hurrying forward of the rearmost files. Then there was a dead silence again, and we had the last of the Austrians in Venice."

What a ghostly end is here of one of the most cruel tyrannies known in history! How impregnably intrenched in the very heart of the people of Italy this tyranny may be seen in the graphic pictures of the famous Quadrilateral or military square of fortified cities, published in another part of this paper. This was the point at which the iron hand of Austria clutched and held Italy. The records of the old Venetian Council of Ten can not be more tragical than those of Austrian rule. The daily and steady oppression has almost ruined a nation, and has nothing to show but a few military roads. Venice, wonder to Lombardy for that generation has never been able to escape the perception of the nightmare that brooded upon the land. The young men lounging and listless, frivolous and effeminate, the Italian Austrian eye and hand every where, and every where hated; superstition and ignorance and frivolity encouraged because they tend to enervate and demoralize; these things no observer could help seeing.

It was one of the wicked arrangements of the "Christian alliance," upon the fall of NAPOLEON, which disposed of countries according to the ambition of rulers, and not in obedience to the wishes of the people. But that settlement, so cordially hated by all lovers of national liberty in Europe, was not only overthrown by the Prussian arms at Sadowa, but in another direction by the uprising of the Italian people and by the whole mass of the population of adult age voted. The vote was enormous, and almost uniform in its result. In the city of Venice, out of 30,000, 26,180 voted, and almost all affirmatively. In Padua 8000 votes were cast. In the country district of Dolo the people marched to the polls with the priests at their head, and 7170 persons voted out of a total of 7700 electors. In the city of Verona there were 16,075 votes, and only one in the negative. At Udine there was but one negative out of 5473 votes. Chioggia and Rovigo more than 10,000 affirmative votes and no negatives were thrown. At Vicenza two negatives out of 8810 votes.

There was never so unanimous a vote, and Italy now enters with all her heart upon her new career. The Pope is the only potentially disturbing element, and surrounded by a free and constitutional Italy, it is not possible that the Pope can long sit upon his temporal throne. Whether he will choose to remain upon his old ground merely as supreme head of his Church, or emigrate to some island where he can still be political lord paramount, the event alone future will disclose. Austria can no longer defend him upon his throne, and poor old Spain, which can hardly stand, proposes to him that they shall combine their weakness and try to hold each other up. It will be a mummy trying to prop a falling statue. Meanwhile the ocean telegraph will at any moment herald the news of the entry of VICTOR EMANUEL into Venice, and then it will be for Italy to show by the energy and sagacity of her legislation that she was really worthy of the victory that has achieved her unity, but which is due to other arms than hers.

FLATTERING THE FENIANS.

IT seems to us that honorable men can have but one opinion of the Fenian foray into Canada, and consequently but one opinion of the attempt to excite hostility against the President for his action in the matter. It is, indeed, the one energetic, praiseworthy, and thoroughly American act of his administration. The laws of the United States were deliberately defied by a mob which sought to make our soil the base of treasonous and piratical assault upon a peaceful neighbor. It was not only defiance, but contemptuous defiance, and the President instantly and effectively stopped the whole enterprise. It is foolish to say that he had encouraged the Fenians before he opposed them. He received a deputation of them, and in their report they lectured JOHN BULL; but he was very careful to say no more than that the release was a compliment to the large "section of our countrymen with whom he was professionally identified." It was the usual irreverence of a Democratic politician to the Irishmen, and it was not as a Fenian that MITCHELL was released.

That the President's action was prompt and decisive the moment that overt acts were committed shows that his sense of official duty properly transcended all his inclinations as a politician. He did not hesitate to take the risk of alienating that part of Irish sympathy which is Fenian, and which Mr. SEWARD, the Head Centre, numerically estimates at 20,000. This was the course in which the President was fairly entitled to the most generous and cordial support of all lovers of the honor of the national name and of the utter immorality and indecency of party-spirit could be shown in nothing more than in the efforts of some of our political friends to turn the matter to their own ends. The most extraordinary spectacle of the late canvass was General WALBRIDGE extolling the lower wards of the city of New York as the scene of an intelligent peal, of which Mr. GREELEY and Mr. BENNETT were the fraternal Castor and Pollux—the whole being intended to obtain the same result for Mr. GREELEY that Mr. GREELEY is a true friend of the laboring man is unquestionable; but this method of electioneering must certainly strike every honest man with disgust.

Every fair means of gaining votes should be constantly and vigorously practiced; but every similar method. Certainly in any contest, an election, loses a cause. The danger of our general politics is the kind of corruption upon which the Democratic party relies in the city of New York. It is the spirit which makes a foreign ignorance and vice, and if ignorance and vice succeed the result is tremendous and disastrous. Could there be any thing more likely than the appeal to an ignorant foreigner for his vote, upon the ground that the President was his enemy because he had faithfully executed the just laws of the land? Besides the enormity of the appeal in itself, there is the perilous folly of supporting the theory that an American citizen as an Irishman, or a Fenian, against his country is a foreigner and undertakes to make war from our soil against a friendly power, the law deals with him very promptly. But if he be an American citizen his offense is even greater, and his pretense that he is acting as a citizen of some other country is an insult to all of us.

When Irishmen, or the people of any other country, leave their land and come to live among us, they must understand that they are to obey the laws. If their sympathy with the sorrows of the land they leave behind inspires them to help them strike for their liberty, let them return and help them. But an Irish Republic which establishes its head-quarters in New York, and numbers a few innocent Canadians by way of making war upon England, is not an Irish Republic which commands the respect of honorable men; and to attempt to propitiate its supporters by complaining of the President for enforcing its laws is a betrayal of the authority of law and a blow at public morality.

JOHN BRIGHT AND ENGLAND.

MACAULAY used to say that the next great convulsion in his country would be the contest between the Barons and the People, as that in 1645 it was between the Parliament and the King; and the speeches of JOHN BRIGHT seem to announce the approach of that contest. His present movement is the most significant political event in England since the revolution of 1688. It is the suggestion of an actual, although not necessarily a forcible, revolution. English statesmen and political philosophers hitherto have agreed in recognizing the balance of classes as essential to British stability. The objection of certain liberal papers, like the Spectator, to Mr. GLADSTONE'S bold claim of the suffrage, a few years since, for every innocent and intelligent man, was that it tended to throw all political power into the hands of one class, and thereby to destroy the sacred class organization. This was also the argument of Mr. LOWE, in his famous and memorable speeches which Mr. BRIGHT constantly and bitterly reviles. Mr. LOWE made his speeches offensive by declaring that the class which this controlling power was to be given was the most ignorant and vicious class in the country.

JOHN BRIGHT says that the government of the balanced classes has failed; that its historical tendency is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; to concentrate the ownership of land in a few hands, and to exclude the great body of the population from political power. He proposes that an appeal be taken from the governing class to the nation, and that the nation govern itself. This involves nothing less than the disappearance of King, Lords, and Commons—the end of a monarchy, and the erection of a republic. It needs a shiver through the kingdom, as the monarchies are erected by reason of their moss and mould, if there be nothing else to endear them. It sets all England to thinking of the Lords and the Tennis Court, and the flight to Varennes; and already one quivering letter-writer thinks that JOHN BRIGHT may yet cause the London mob to cry à la lanterne, and to take to hanging Mr. LOWE and his adherents.

The striking fact of the situation is, that the movement is conducted entirely by the laboring, unenfranchised class. The middle class holds as far aloof as the aristocracy. Indeed, the aim of the middle class in England is to amass money enough to buy land, and so to aristocratize itself. JOHN BRIGHT may be said to head this unenfranchised and landless class, which is the last assured majority against all the other classes, the political power, and the impregnable traditions of the monarchy. The foreshadowed contest is tremendous. But Mr. BRIGHT is dreaded as the forcible revolution. He asks the governing class merely to consider history and human nature, and to be warned in time. Dropped letters from the mail-coach to see is sure destruction. Yielding and yielding more and more they may indeed at last yield the very British system itself, but better that than an explosion which will shatter every thing. Shall we learn nothing? he earnestly asks. What is the part of common-sense but to see what is unavoidable, and adapt ourselves to it? And what is statesmanship but common-sense making laws?

We rank JOHN BRIGHT'S movement in England, in its ultimate sense, with the vindication of popular government in this country and the prostration of the Austrian empire.

WHY WAS THE "EVENING STAR" LOST?

A SHIP-MASTER who has had more than twenty years' experience at sea in every kind of vessel, and three years upon the Southern coast in the naval blockading service in all seasons and all weathers, writes to give us his views of preventing such accidents as that of the Evening Star. Our ships, he says, are as stanch and swift as can be built; and the Evening Star was not long. She thinks, because of her weakness. The storm was not unusual for the latitude and the season, but at the height of the gale "the rudder-chains gave way, or some accident happened to disable the ship because unmanageable." A similar entanglement of the rudder-chains was almost fatal to the Great Eastern.

The great mistake, says our sea-faring friend, is that "almost all our large steamers have no steering gear immediately connected with the rudder-head, while the chains pass at many angles, and along the length of the ship, and in many obvious ways can be entangled. An iron bar attached to the rudder-head directly over the rudder-head, and a pair of rudder-tacks ready at all times, which could be worked with a few hands, the course dictated by the officer in charge of the deck, could have been used effectively to keep the Evening Star head to the sea; or if not head to, might have kept her before it, and in either position, in all probability, she would have weathered the gale." Our correspondent says that during the blockade many vessels of all classes, which were near or intended for sea-service, rode out at anchor many of the most severe gales upon the very worst parts of the coast, and that they had been exposed "broadside to, or in the trough of the sea, many of them would have gone to the bottom." Whether the facts upon the Evening Star are correctly apprehended or not by our correspondent, he makes a very sensible suggestion, which can be very easily followed.

The fate of the Evening Star is attributed, by the report of Captain MEW, who has charge of the enforcement of the United States laws in relation to steamships, to bad management. The hull of the steamer was sound, the machinery in good condition, but she needed another engineer, and instead of her proper complement of fourteen men, she carried but ten, and some of these are reported to have been employed otherwise than as seamen. The force was not enough to handle the ship; the facilities suggested in the letter of a ship-master, were not at hand; no effort was made to get her head to the wind, though her rudder had not been most of the time, and they were the ship and two hundred passengers. The report does not say that a larger crew would have saved the ship, but it does say that she would probably have been kept afloat, and a full crew could have manned the boats, which were large enough for both crew and passengers, and in that way many more lives might have been saved.

The owners and officers of the Evening Star certainly owe some explanation to the public of a great disaster for which this report makes them partly responsible.

FIRE!

As all Americans travel more or less, we are all peculiarly interested in making travel safe. Nothing tends to that result so surely as the publication of the numerous disasters and accidents by which travelers observe; for when the officers of railroads and steamboats fully understand that any negligence will be promptly reported to the public, they will take good care to avoid all accidents that are not inevitable. The American is a pestilent mus traveler; but JOHN BULL grumbles in his discomfort or his danger is remedied. We lately described a fire upon the Plymouth Rock steamer which was promptly discovered by a vigilant and extinguished before serious harm was done. We have received a letter from the Occident of State-room 53, who was the passenger of whom we spoke, and who makes the same statement, which we commend to the attention of the Company and of all travelers by the Sound steamers.

"The boat that night was lighted by lamps having a temporary standard made of wood or pasteboard, and placed on the mantle tables without being fastened. This lamp (the occasion of the fire) being the nearest to the curtains of the berth, the passenger fell first. Suppose there had been a collision, there would have been thirty fires instead of one to put out in the darkness and fear. I was the owner of the gentleman who knew of the fire preceding night but the lamps had been taken with fire and quenched, and was unlit when he so that no more fires occurred. They are, although of only four cents each, supplied in the hands or passengers smoking cigars around the baggage (freight), which consisted in part of cotton and wool."

No one who travels by the Sound steamers but perceives the perils to which this is exposed. But does not this system of lighting foolishly multiply the perils? How grave they were felt to be in the case of which we have spoken is proved by the fact of some of the passengers forming themselves into a Vigilance Committee. It is quite time, as our correspondent suggests, that we should be on our guard against the abuses that are stealing in upon us to such an alarming extent.

BATHING.

HUFFELAND, a German physician who wrote on health at the end of the last century, said that the whole body ought to be bathed in cold water every day, and this has been constantly repeated by writers on health up to the present time. And yet there are very few, even among those who consider themselves in good health, who are that physical condition, who comply with this injunction. Are they who neglect it altogether in error? Is certainly not the case with those who are in most of them to comply with it; but still, if the means be requisite for securing the full health of the body, the inconvenience should be no bar to employment. That bathing should be used far more than it is by most people there can be no doubt; the question is, to what extent it is required, and in what ways should it be used? We will answer this briefly as well as we can.

There are two objects in bathing. One is to cleanse the skin. This organ (for it must be remembered that it is an active organ, and not a mere covering) is continually discharging a large quantity of refuse matter from the system, in the form of both insensible and sensible perspiration. For this purpose there are innumerable tubes closely set together. It is important that the outlets of those tubes, the pores of the skin, should be kept well open. They are liable to be obstructed, both by the accumulation of some of the matter which passes out of them, and by the lodgment of matter brought to the skin by the air, and in various other ways. These accumulations are removed in three ways—by becoming attached to the clothing in its friction from the motions of the body, by the application of water, and by the washing out of the tubes of the skin by the free flow of perspiration occasioned by brisk exercise.

The second object of bathing is to influence the skin as an active and sensitive organ. We see this in a marked manner when cold bathing is attended with a glow of warmth. The skin is highly endowed with nerves, and, as a sensitive organ, has an important play in the economy of the system. The impressions that the Occident of State-room 53, as attributed, by the report of Captain MEW, who has charge of the enforcement of the United States laws in relation to steamships, to bad management. Is certainly not the case with those who are in most of them to comply with it; but still, if the means be requisite for securing the full health of the body, the inconvenience should be no bar to employment. That bathing should be used far more than it is by most people there can be no doubt; the question is, to what extent it is required, and in what ways should it be used? We will answer this briefly as well as we can.

There are two objects in bathing. One is to cleanse the skin. This organ (for it must be remembered that it is an active organ, and not a mere covering) is continually discharging a large quantity of refuse matter from the system, in the form of both insensible and sensible perspiration. For this purpose there are innumerable tubes closely set together. It is important that the outlets of those tubes, the pores of the skin, should be kept well open. They are liable to be obstructed, both by the accumulation of some of the matter which passes out of them, and by the lodgment of matter brought to the skin by the air, and in various other ways. These accumulations are removed in three ways—by becoming attached to the clothing in its friction from the motions of the body, by the application of water, and by the washing out of the tubes of the skin by the free flow of perspiration occasioned by brisk exercise.

The second object of bathing is to influence the skin as an active and sensitive organ. We see this in a marked manner when cold bathing is attended with a glow of warmth. The skin is highly endowed with nerves, and, as a sensitive organ, has an important play in the economy of the system. The impressions that are received by it are conveyed, by a decided influence upon the great central organs of the body.

You see, then, that as the skin is an active secreting organ it can, to a considerable extent, take care of itself. It is not entirely dependent on bathing to clear away the refuse which is disposed to collect at the outlets of its tubes. The whole of the skin, or face and hands, need to be washed every day as a measure of cleanliness. Only the most exposed portions of it need this. The frequency with which it should be done in other parts depends much on circumstances. We had better, however, err on the side of doing it too much than too little. Not that so much time comes from doing it too much, for there is such a thing as making the organ too sensitive, and impairing its functions to too frequent bathing. Daily bathing, accompanied by friction, may necessitate too active a renewal of that very delicate covering of the skin which we call the cuticle, and so injure the true skin, from whose surface this is constantly forming. So, some portions of it being as constantly thrown off in the shape of very minute scales.

Neither is the skin wholly dependent on cold bathing, as some seem to think, to give it tone and activity. This is the case of the many means of doing this, and we may add, a subordinate one. Even exercise, as one of the most important of these means, giving vigor to all the organs, the skin as well as the rest. This can not be dispensed with. It is absolutely essential, while cold bathing is far from being so, for even a high degree of healthy vigor is often maintained without it, if there be but such brisk exercise.

Observe that it is as true of bathing with cold water as it is of exposure to cold air, that a good reaction is necessary to healthy influence. If this do not occur the effect is depressing to the vital powers, and tends to produce ill-health and even positive disease. It is from this plain fact that led to much injury, especially in the case of persons of delicate health. So popular has been cold bathing of late that it has often been to indiscriminate.

Let us look, then, at some of the points of discrimination which should be observed. The robust can use cold bathing with comparatively little precaution, because they have a reaction so readily excited; but even with them it should not be resorted to when the system is fatigued. For this reason it is generally improper in the after-part of the day. The best time for its use, in relation to the morning, is that which is toward the latter part of the forenoon, for the system is then in its most vigorous condition. But early in the morning is the most convenient time, and when the rest of the night there is sufficient vigor for a suitable reaction in most persons.

In mild cold bathing as a tonic (and it is a capital one), there is no necessity for bathing the whole body. Sometimes one part can be bathed and sometimes another, but never all the regulate tonic effect to be secured by merely putting the feet into cold water every morning. Neither is it essential that there should be immersion—sponging will do as well. What is required is simply the impression of cold upon the skin generally. The benefit that results comes from accustoming the system to thus react on receiving the impression of cold through the nerves of the skin, instead of succumbing under it into a state of depression. It is in this way that cold bathing is so serviceable in ridding one of the disposition to take cold, and in making it in the summer and continuing it on into winter.

Many persons of delicate constitution, as already hinted, have been injured of benefit from cold bathing by the failure to have a reaction. They can ordinarily succeed in obtaining this result, however, if they manage to do the right way. It may be necessary to begin with using water somewhat warm, having it cooler from day to day till they get to use the coldest. Or they can first carefully rub the water over a small portion of surface, daily enlarging the bounds of its application as the habit of reaction becomes established. Of course friction may be employed as an auxiliary in securing reaction, the exercise requisite in applying it and the stimulation of the skin both uniting to produce the effect.

THE ARTISTS' FUND WATER-COLOR EXHIBITION.

THE artists have wisely resolved to devote one of the galleries of their Annual Exhibition to paintings in water-colors; and so generous has been the response of private owners that so complete and beautiful a collection of water-colors has never been seen in this country as that which has been gathered at the National Academy rooms in which the Exhibition is held. Visitors and readers are aware that some of TURNER'S finest and most characteristic works are in water-color; and until really good works in this style have been seen it is impossible to know of what force, variety, and exquisite tenderness water-color is capable. The collection is composed of works by the most famous painters, which will be so arranged that they can be most conveniently and satisfactorily studied; and the Exhibition will unquestionably be one of the freshest and most interesting ever held in the city.

LITERARY.

A LITTLE book just published by LIPPINCOTT, in Philadelphia, "With General Sheridan in Lee's last Campaign, by a Staff Officer," is a peculiarly valuable chapter in the story of the war; for although the author assures us that General SHERIDAN will not know what is in the book until he sees it, and has in no way prompted it, yet it is clear that the writer had the General's fullest confidence, and that his views are those of SHERIDAN. The book is a luminous and graphic account of the part borne by SHERIDAN and his men in the closing campaign. It goes at a hand-gallop, and is the most brisk and breezy reading. Moreover, its frankness, truthfulness, and generosity give great weight to all its statements upon disputed points; and it is especially interesting as presenting General SHERIDAN'S view of his own action in relieving General WARREN, which has also appeared in the narratives of General WARREN'S capacity or fidelity, as was proved by his appointment to an important command immediately afterward. The portraiture of SHERIDAN in this book is very striking and satisfactory. He is evidently a clear, electric man, of marvelous energy and celerity. But his "dash" is not reckless. It is a mere gush of fine animal spirits, and not the fatal swiftness of insight and genius. If SHERIDAN is the most romantic, he is also one of the ablest heroes of the war.

VENICE AND THE QUADRILATERAL.

THE transfer of Venetia to Italy, which is now completed by treaty, and will soon be complete as a practical fact, imparts a special interest to the capital city of the province, and to the four fortified cities constituting the Quadrilateral, of which we give illustrations on pages 728 and 729.

VENICE,

for many centuries the capital of a celebrated republic, the first maritime and commercial Power of the world, and one of the finest cities in Europe, is unique, both as regards position and construction, being built entirely on piles, and occupying seventy or eighty small islands, separated by 140 canals, which are crossed by 300 bridges. The chief of the canals is the Grand Canal, 100 to 180 feet wide, and bordered by magnificent palaces and churches; it separates the city into two nearly equal portions, which are connected by the bridge of the Rialto, built of white marble, and consisting of a single arch. The streets or lanes are so narrow and intricate as to render the city a vast labyrinth, and, being fit only for foot-passengers, the place of wheel-carriages is supplied by small barges called gondolas, the peculiar form and great number of which constantly traversing the principal canals presents one of the chief characteristics of the city. The largest street, the Merceria, in which are the best shops, is only 15 feet wide; the principal promenades are the square of St. Mark, and the public gardens, which are nearly surrounded by the sea. Among its many squares, the most remarkable for extent, regularity, and beauty of situation, is the Piazza di San Marco (St. Mark), on the south side of the city, at the entrance of the Grand Canal. On the east side of this is a smaller square called the Piazzetta, and at the angle, between these, is the Church of St. Mark. Venice contains a vast number of magnificent churches and palaces, adorned with the paintings of Titian and the frescoes of Tintoretto and Paul Veronese. The chief edifices are the palace of the Procuratie Vecchie and the Procuratie Nuove, which occupy the greater part of the square of St. Mark, around which extends a vast gallery containing elegant shops and cafés. The former palace of the Doge, built by MARINO FALIERO in the fourteenth century, is remarkable for its architecture and its imposing mass; its interior is decorated with many of the finest works of the great painters. The Bridge of Sighs connects this palace with the former prisons and dungeons of the Inquisition. Among the ecclesiastical edifices the most magnificent is the Church of St. Mark, with its golden ceilings, its pavement of jasper and porphyry, its 500 columns of black, white, and veined marble, bronze, alabaster, verde antique, and serpentine.

In the Middle Ages Venice had a monopoly of the manufacture of glass; but this has greatly declined; and its manufactures are now confined to mirrors, jewelry, artificial pearls, silks, and porcelain. The imports comprise sugar, coffee, and other colonial produce; cotton and woollen fabrics, cotton yarn, and raw cotton; hardware goods. The exports, silk and silk goods, glass wares, and books.

Venetia attained the height of its prosperity in the fifteenth century. It began to decline at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and its overthrow was completed by the French in 1797. By the Treaty of Presburg, in 1805, it was made over, with the provinces of the continent, to the kingdom of Italy; and was held by the French till 1814, when it reverted to Austria. In 1848 the Venetians revolted against the Austrians, and held the city for several months. The Government of Venice comprises eight delegates, which bear the names of their capitals—Venice, Padua, Vicenza, Verona, Rovigo, Treviso, Belluno, and Udine.

Venice is not only an interesting relic of past magnificence, but a great fortress capable of holding back an army from penetrating within her ports and canals, and also able to act as a point of concentration for a force that might assemble here and threaten the rear of a southern army marching against Goritzia or the Tyrol. Around the city there are no less than eighty-two forts, fifty-eight of which are permanently armed, and the remainder would receive their guns on the first tidings of the enemy's preparing to attack. The place is provisioned for four months, and the works are capable of holding out for a still longer period, especially since Admiral TEGETHOFF took the command of the sea, and thus insured the freedom of communication with Trieste. The great high-roads and the railways to Venice approach the city through Mestre, a small unfortified town to the northwest, only important as the junction of the routes from all directions. The railway is continued over the lagunes by a bridge about two miles and a quarter long.

THE QUADRILATERAL.

The sensations with which one regards a nest of fortresses such as the Quadrilateral are very different in war and peace. When the Archduke fought the battle of Custozza was regarded as a port in a storm—a refuge in the hour of need; for his whole army might have sought shelter within the line of her forts if the fortunes of the day had turned against the Austrians, and defeat instead of victory had attended their arms. But now that Italy has achieved her long self-set task, and is only remains for diplomatists to settle the exact terms of the treaty, there is a crushing weight in the parapets, ditches, and detached forts that makes one long for the free mountain air so near in space and yet so far removed in nature from these oppressive fortifications. Josefstadt, Koniggratz, and Theresienstadt are border strong-holds: Olmütz is a great fortress: Venice is a pearl placed in an almost impregnable casket; but Verona is a fortified camp, built to contain a host, which it can shield from sudden attack, and yet suffer to go forth against the enemy without a check upon the mobility of the mass of men. The town contains some 60,000 inhabitants, yet it seems but a garrison of soldiers; none of its fine old churches are turned into hospitals, its theatres into corn stores, and the most perfect Roman amphitheatre in Europe, a contemporary of the Coliseum at Rome, was used as a prison for the Italians taken at the battle of Custozza.

VERONA

PESCHIERA, situated on the northwest corner of the square, where the Mincio leaves the Lake of Garda, is commanded by heights surrounding it, which gave it the name of the Spittoon. The town is small, containing about 2000 inhabitants, principally engaged in fishing. Peschiera is connected with Verona by a railway. A treble circle of walls and bastions, raised on the surrounding heights, enables the fortress to contain an army of at least 30,000 men, thus giving the commander the opportunity to act on the offensive as well as the defensive. The terrain of the Upper Mincio from Volta to Lonato—to which, besides Peschiera, Valeggio, and Salionzi serve as bases—is extremely favorable for the defensive. The town and barracks of Peschiera are surrounded by strong walls and bastions. These fortifications, however, are now of very secondary importance for its defence. It has been surrounded by a chain of very strong forts—nine in number, which lie at from half a mile to a mile distance from the town, and about a quarter of a mile from each other. Fort No. 1 is on the shore of the lake looking toward Lombardy. Fort No. 9, on the shore to the north of Peschiera. These forts are all very strong; they are of earth-work, with stone containing-walls, and are surrounded with moats. Peschiera, with this chain of fortresses, appears to be, like Verona, Mantua, and Venice, absolutely impregnable.

MANTUA,

at the southern point of the line of the Mincio, distant from Peschiera twenty miles, is a town of nearly 30,000 inhabitants, and is one of the few fortresses that inspired even NAPOLEON I. with respect. It is built on a flat island in the River Mincio, which forms here several small areas and a tolerably large lake, that bound Mantua on the north and east, while the river proper and a wide marsh surround it on the south and west. The fortifications of the town itself are of no great importance, and consist only of an old wall and bastions. It derives its great strength from the forts around it. The River Mincio, widening above and below Mantua, and the whole country around being extremely marshy, would render it very difficult for a besieger to construct bridges near enough to each other to secure the necessary support. The besieged, on the other hand, can change with ease from one bank to the other, and attack an enemy where he is weakest.

Legnago is a small place; about 1000 men suffice to garrison it. The fortifications are, however, very strong, and the place is of importance, as guarding the passage of the Adige, which is tolerably wide here. Immense rice-fields stretch away far to the southwest, and are traversed by but few roads.

THE IRON CROWN OF LOMBARDY, of which we give an illustration on page 725, is an interesting heir-loom, which, by special stipulation, now reverts to Italy.

This crown was used for the coronation of the kings of Italy, and was given, in 616, by THEODOLINDA, Queen of the Lombards, to the Basilica of Monza. It derives its name from the circle of iron incrusted in the interior, and supposed to have been forged out of one of the nails of the cross. The diameter of the crown is six inches, and it is two and a quarter inches wide. It is composed of a kind of jointed collar of gold, and is loaded with sapphires, emeralds, rubies, and other precious stones, uncut and interspersed with flowers of gold. Apart from its antiquity, it possesses no other merit than the richness of the materials of which it is formed, and does not manifest any great artistic talents in the Lombard or Italian goldsmiths at the end of the sixth century—the date of the crown. It served at the coronation of NAPOLEON at Milan, when he placed it on his own head, saying, "Dio mi la dette, guai a chi la tocca!" words which afterward became the motto of the Order of the Iron Crown.

PRELATES OF THE SECOND PLENARY COUNCIL.

On the 7th of October the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore commenced its session. It was a religious gathering of great importance to the Roman Catholic Church, comprising seven archbishops and thirty-nine bishops. The venerable appearance of most of the delegates, clad in robes fashioned after a model eighteen centuries old, made a striking effect. We may readily believe the Catholic Mirror when it says that "the representative character of those who composed the ecclesiastical part of the Council, their eminence of station, the collected wisdom of those present in all departments of sacred and profane lore—letters truly splendid and learned—mingled of religion—revered age and experience, united harmoniously with the strength and fire of early manhood; the splendor and richness of ecclesiastical vestments, such as our Church ritual requires, blended with the pomp of ceremony; the swelling strains of sacred music pouring forth in consonance with the Pontifical High Mass; each and all conspired to ravish the heart, and entrance the soul with the transports of divine adoration."

The State of Maryland may well be proud of her Catholic history. Her CALVERT was the great pioneer in the cause of religious liberty. "He was the first," says BANCROFT, "in the history of the Christian world to seek for religious security and peace by the practice of justice, and not by the exercise of power; to plan the establishment of popular institutions with the enjoyment of liberty of conscience; to advance the career of civilization by recognizing the rightful equality of all Christian sects. The asylum of Papists was the spot where, in a remote corner of the world, on the banks of rivers which, as yet, had hardly been explored, the mild forbearance of a Proprietary adopted religious freedom as the basis of its State."

The objects of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore were the re-establishment of discipline, and the general well-ordering of the affairs of the Church in America. It is fourteen years since the First Plenary Council met. That Council was also assembled by express direction of the Pope, who appoints a representative of his authority in the Apostolic Delegate he commissions to preside over them. In this case the Delegate was Dr. M. J. SPALDING, Archbishop of Baltimore.

Our engraving represents the archbishops and bishops assembled in front of the Cathedral, and is after a photograph by BENDANN BROTHERS, of this city. Mr. BENDANN spent two weeks in making a series of pictures—single figures and groups—of the various prelates at the archiepiscopal palace, and the results, apart from the interest attaching to them as portraits, are remarkable as works of art. These and other choice pictures are on free exhibition at the BENDANN BROTHERS' Gallery, No. 707 Fifth Avenue, corner of Seventeenth Street. The BENDANNS deserve great credit for their efforts to elevate their art, and we trust that success will crown their enterprise.

JOHN BRIGHT.

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., member of the British Parliament for Birmingham, the great agitator in the interest of manhood suffrage, and one of the warm friends of America and her institutions, is the son of JACOB BRIGHT, Esq., of Greenbank, near Rochdale, and was born in 1811. He is a partner in the firm of JOHN BRIGHT & BROTHERS, cotton-spinners and manufacturers, of Rochdale. Though he had taken part in the reform agitation of 1831-32, he first distinguished himself in political life when, in 1839, he became one of the earliest members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, which sprang out of an association formed in 1838 to obtain the repeal of the corn-laws. In April, 1843, he unsuccessfully contested the representation of the city of Durham, for which, however, he was returned in July following; and he continued to sit for Durham until 1847, when he was first returned for Manchester. He made his maiden speech in Parliament on the motion of Mr. EWART for extending the principles of free trade, August 7, 1843. During the interval between his election for Manchester and the accession of the first BERRY Ministry to power Mr. BRIGHT's activity in Parliament and on the platform was varied and continuous. In the House of Commons he proposed to apply the remedy of free-trade in land to the state of things which produced the Irish famine. He appealed, unsuccessfully, for the dispatch of a Royal commission to investigate the condition of India; and in 1849 he was appointed one of the members of the once celebrated Select Committee on the House of Commons on Public Business. At Westminster, and still more in the provinces, especially at Manchester, he co-operated with Mr. COBDEN in the movement which the latter sought to create in favor of financial reform, mainly with a view to the reduction of the naval and military establishments. In 1851 he added his vote to those of the famous Parliamentary coalition which attempted to censure LORD PALMERSTON in the Pacifico affair; and in 1852 he took a prominent part in the welcome given to KOSSUTH by the advanced Liberals of Lancashire.

On the formation of the first Derby Ministry Mr. BRIGHT aided in that temporary reorganization of the Anti-Corn-Law League which the acceptance of free-trade by the new Government afterward rendered unnecessary. He was re-elected for Manchester, after a contest, at the next general election. With the accession of LORD ABERDEEN's Ministry to power began the discussion of the Eastern question, his share in which alienated from Mr. BRIGHT many of his former supporters. Mr. BRIGHT denounced the policy of the Russian War with energy; but his protests against it were dogged by an attack of severe illness, and just as the war had been brought to a close Mr. BRIGHT was compelled to forego all public action. He withdrew eventually to the Continent, and the news of the defeat of LORD PALMERSTON on the Canton question reached him while in Italy, in March, 1857. Although he had, of course, taken no personal part in the debate or division which produced LORD PALMERSTON's appeal to the country, yet he averred his entire approval of the vote of censure which had been proposed by Mr. COBDEN and seconded by Mr. MILNER GIBSON. While offering himself for re-election at Manchester, he was forbidden by his medical attendants to appear on the hustings; and Manchester rejected both Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. GIBSON by large majorities. A few months afterward the death of Mr. MUNTZ caused a vacancy in the representation of Birmingham. The constituency invited Mr. BRIGHT to become a candidate, and he was elected in the August of 1857.

Mr. BRIGHT has sat uninterruptedly for Birmingham since, no opposition to his return having ever been attempted. He is now the acknowledged leader of the more advanced section of the Liberals, and certainly the most talked-of, and perhaps the best-abused, man in her Majesty's dominions.

A MAMMOTH JAWBONE.

Our engraving on page 725 represents the jawbone of a mammoth, recently discovered by some workmen in their excavations at Harmony Hill, in Cohoes, New York. This relic is quite perfect as regards preservation, but the fact that the other tooth, while the left has three, all in good condition. The extreme length of the jaw is 82 inches, the greatest width at the hings being 21 inches; it weighs 48 pounds.

Professor HALL of Albany, the geologist, has visited the locality for the purpose of seeing the huge jawbone of a mastodon. The excavation has now been arched over and the work of building commenced; hence we can only say that the other wonders in that great curiosity-shop of nature, the peat bed, are forever sealed from the public eye.

THE GALAGO MAHOLI.

THIS beautiful little animal is a native of South Africa. Its habits are very interesting. It sleeps chiefly upon insects and fruit. When at rest with it on the wooded mountains about Tete, on the Zambesi, and the sides of the banks of the Nyassa Lake. He says it would leap at least 6 feet in a horizontal direction, as noiselessly as an owl. Mr. FRAZER observed squirrels, or some animal allied to it, at Cape Coast, Western Africa, in a tamarind-tree, at the top of which it had its nest, composed of loose leaves in the forked branches of the tree. The quick and froglike leaps of this pretty little animal are most remarkable for the perfect manner in which the animal alights from a leap of many yards. Long-tailed, and of the size of a squirrel.

OUR MEXICAN ILLUSTRATIONS.

AMONG the various battles, sieges, captures and recaptures, executions and retaliatory executions which now diversify the military history of MEXICO, not the least interesting incident is that which is the immediate occasion of our illustrations on page 732.

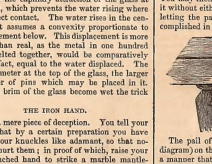
The French have for some time suffered more serious loss from their mutua. dissensions than from MAXIMILIAN's soldiers. In the anarchy which at present exists, with the prospect of an early withdrawal of the French, every ambitious Mexican chief thinks himself the Coming Man, destined to control the country and to seize the Presidency. And those leaders of factions hate each other more than they hate the French. A few weeks since Colonel CANALES usurped the control of Matamoras, and imprisoned General TAPIA, the legitimate Governor of the State of Tamaulipas. To rescue TAPIA, and restore to him his legitimate authority, was the object of an expedition undertaken on the night of September 21. The expeditionary force, under command of General FORD, was not large. It consisted of about 175 Americans and 30 Mexicans. A reinforcement of 200 TEXAN Volunteers was expected, but did not appear in season to participate in the attack. The expedition was to be supported by the gun-boat Granite, armed with a 3-inch rifle and a smooth-bore howitzer, and manned by a crew of eight men, under command of Captain B. S. OSBON, of New York. The attack was to begin at midnight. The expeditionary force was in camp on the American side of the Rio Grande, a few miles above Brownsville. The night proved stormy, and hours were wasted in collecting the force, so that it was three in the morning before the attack began. The fighting was of short duration. The troops went forward, seized the Plaza, the Department Head-quarters, the Custom-house, and were storming the Jail when, from some unaccountable cause, the order was given to fall back. Only a few shots had been exchanged; none of the advancing party injured. As soon as it was daylight the Chimeca steamed across to Brownsville, where, as CANALES threatened to open fire upon her, she was surrendered to the United States officials, leaving the United States authorities to decide a question as to who was justly entitled to her. CANALES, a usurper, or the Juarez Government. The expedition was mostly made up of Americans. It is claimed by the reports which have reached TAPIA was reduced. Since the affair of the 21st September General FORD has organized a larger force, with which he intends to make southern attack on CANALES.

Our illustrations give a view of Matamoras from the opposite side of the Rio Grande; a view of the outer defenses of Matamoras—Forts Zaragoza and Monterey—where the American-Mexican troops under General FORD were quartered previous to the attack which we have described; a sketch representing the attack on the Government House, CANALES's head-quarters, in which General TAPIA was confined; and portraits of CANALES and his right-hand man, Colonel CERDA.

PARLOR MAGIC.

THERE are a number of simple mechanical tricks which can be, and indeed often are, performed in the parlor and drawing-room, which depend on some principle of practice, as well as a reliance on some mechanical or philosophical principles. Others, known as "jugglers jokes," are simply absurd, and are occasionally introduced to vary an evening's entertainment, or to distract the attention of the audience. Among the best of these feats is

THE REGAL PROBLEM.

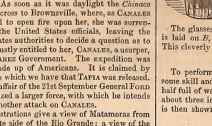


It is said that in the early days of the Royal Institution in Albemarle Street, Inquired of the learned fellows how it was that, if a pear mullet was placed in a bucket of water, full to the brim, the water would not overflow? The learned answers and explanations were given, but the Merry Monarch demanded that they should be submitted to the test of practical experiment. The fish and the vessel of water were procured; some went the fish, bestartering the astonished philosophers and laughing with the splashing water. A modification of this regal problem may be thus solved: Fill a clean, dry wine-glass with water to the brim, so that apparently a drop more would cause it to overflow. Now, in place of the gray mullet, you propose to place pins in the water. How many do you think could be dropped in without causing the water to overflow? Probably a spectator would say, "Not one; more sanguine individuals would say, "Four;" others, "Twenty;" but the most enchanted would not believe that several hundreds could be dropped in without causing one drop of water to overflow. Nay, by carefully dropping them in, one at a time, point downward, you can continue until the glass is pretty closely packed with the pins, and they are piled high above the surface. This trick depends on the capillary attraction of the glass at the margin, which prevents the water rising where it is in direct contact. The water rises in the centre until it assumes a convexity proportionate to the displacement below. This displacement is more apparent than real, as the metal in one hundred pins, if melted together, would be comparatively small—in fact, equal to the water displaced. The pins displace the water to the top of the glass, the larger the number of pins which may be placed in it. Should the brim of the glass become wet the trick will fail.

THE IRON HAND.

This is a mere piece of deception. You tell your audience that by a certain preparation you have rendered your knuckles like adamant, so that nothing can hurt them; in proof of which, raise your firmly clenched hand to strike a marble mantlepiece; but as you bring it down open your fingers suddenly and strike the marble, then close them again. If this is quickly done it will seem as if you had struck your knuckles in the most violent manner.

THE SMOKER'S TRIPOD.



This ingenious trick consists in so placing three tobacco-pipes with the bowls downward (as shown in the engraving), each stem resting upon the stem of its neighbor, close by the bowl, so that it would support a decanter of water or wine, a pot of porter, or other similar weight.

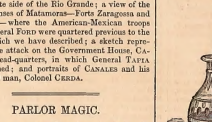
THE BRIDGE OF KNIVES.



This is a pretty feat in mechanics. Three glasses are arranged in the form of a triangle, and three knives are arranged on them so as to form a bridge, as shown in the annexed diagram:

The glasses are shown at C G G. The knife A is laid on B, and B on C, which also rests on A. This cleverly formed bridge is self-supporting.

THE FLYING KNIFE.

To perform this trick with adroitness requires some skill and no little practice. A decanter about half full of water is placed on a square dining-table, about three inches from the edge. A dessert knife is then shown, and the blade is inserted between the decanter and the table, just sufficient to keep it in a horizontal position. The problem is to introduce the knife into the decanter by one blow of the hand. To do this seemingly impossible feat the handle of the knife must be struck a sharp blow by the index finger of the right hand. This, if properly done, will cause the knife to fly upward and descend into the mouth of the decanter.

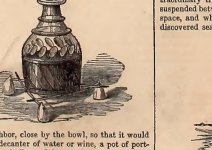
Another curious instance of mechanical force, acting in an apparently magical way, is the

MAGIC STROKE.

A stick which has been tapered off from the middle toward each end, if placed with its tapered ends resting on two wine-glasses, may be broken without injuring the wine-glasses, if struck smartly just in the centre. The stick must not be too thick. The firing of a candle through a deal board or a bullet through a glass window are parallel instances of the law of force applied in a similar manner.



SELF-BALANCING.

There are two or three feats performed which depend on the laws of gravitation. I will here briefly describe one of the simplest. A stick is laid across a table, so that one-third of its projects over its edge. You may then undertake to hang a pail of water on it without either fastening the stick on the table or letting the pail rest on any support. This is accomplished in obedience to the laws of gravitation.

The pail of water is hung (as in the foregoing diagram) on the projecting end of the stick, in such a manner that the handle passes over it in a re-clined position, with the middle of the pail within the edge of the table. To fix it in this position another stick may be applied with one of its ends against the side at the bottom of the pail, and its other end (as shown) against the first stick, where there should be a notch to retain it: this prevents either the pail or stick moving. On the same principle a pair of common fire-tongs may be hung on an ordinary tobacco-pipe, care alone being taken to let the fire-tongs incline inward under the table.

These tricks are childish, but, strange to say, they display the principles of the most astonishing tricks. Some years ago an Asiatic juggler made his appearance in London, who performed some extraordinary tricks. Among others, a shawl was suspended between him and the audience for a brief space, and when taken away the old fellow was discovered seated in the air in the following pos-

A MERE SCRATCH.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER V.

THE day was very young indeed when pretty Esther bright and fresh as the morn herself, stole out of her little chamber, and, thanks to thoughtfulness received overnight, made her way out into the beautiful garden for which Gosling Grove had long been renowned. She was to leave at eight, before which hour Sir George seldom quitted his room, and thus the young lady calculated that she might enjoy a ramble in the gardens, if not a short run in the woods, without attracting the notice of her host.

But she reckoned without that host.

She tripped gayly on, across the lawns, up one walk, down another, trying to lose her way in that, to her, enchanted labyrinth, and almost dancing in the buoyancy of spirit which a fair morning, lighting up love-things, enormously brings to the young. For a moment she sat down on a rustic seat; now she peeped into an arbor, and lingered beside a cynical sprite, and caught the liquid diamonds as they glittered forth. Passing up a path shaded with laurel and arbutus, she approached what appeared to be a garden more private than the rest. It was, however, guarded only by a light trellis-work. The gate was open, and a flow of roses beyond proved too tempting. Esther glided in. It comprised about half an acre, and was filled with rose-trees. It was the famed rose-pleasance of Gosling Grove, pride and solace of many a defunct Dame Gosling, the fruitful source of heart-burning among all gardeners of the district whose hearts were in their office.

Rose-lore was past, but a few varieties were yet in bloom, and Esther, whose passion was a rose, examined them with delight. One, just above her reach, tempted her, turned its glowing face toward her. She gathered it tenderly.

"What, Miss," she said, aloud, "may the last of God's beautiful works I see—except the dear human face—be cut off?"

"Who comes into the giant's garden at cock-crow to steal his favorite roses?" said a voice of assumed ferocity, as the speaker, looking as unlike Cormoran or Blunderbore as a handsome youth might, leaped from a trellised arbor artfully concealed in an angle of the pleasance.

Esther uttered a startled exclamation, and, in catching back her hand, scratched it somewhat smartly with a thorn.

"I am the unluckiest fellow in the world," exclaimed the giant, at once contracting into the ordinary dimensions, "in practical jokes! See, now, what I have done! My savage Khamsin, forbid-Thrumbo the Three-headed, could do no more than shed your blood. Let me assist you, Miss."

The hand had to submit, and afforded George an opportunity of noticing what we have learned already—that it was pretty hand, but one that had not spared itself in the battle of life, and now accepted the thorn-scratch with the indifference of a veteran.

Esther smiled, and murmured some excuse for her intrusion.

"My dear young lady, not a word," said the baronet. "It was by the merest chance—a fortunate one for me—that I rose so early, and wandered hither; a corner protected by a fine spinney, but which I rarely, I observe," he continued, "that you called me by my name. What has a spinney?"

"Not quite. I saw you last night, for a moment, on the stairs."

"You knew me then?"

"I—I had been looking at your picture," said Esther, hastily, "and, indeed, I might more properly ask, how do you know me?" she added, laughing to cover her embarrassment.

"I had been questioning my butler," replied Sir George, with affected hesitation. "Come, Miss Vann, since the gardens is fancy for retaining me in his den (though without, I do assure you, any culinary purpose), let him do what he may to atone for the detention, by showing you the treasures of his garden."

Sir George looked at his companion. Esther was without a bonnet, and the burnished hair, in its smooth bands, was the sole protection to the little shapely head, which rested upon a white and not too slim neck. Her countenance betrayed a rare mixture of firmness and sensibility. Her mouth and chin might have been cut in stone, so inexorable was their expression; while, on the other hand, her ready color, blossoming eye, and an occasional quick nervous movement in conversing, betrayed the excitability of a nature that must have attained the self-government by her beauty displayed.

She wore a dress of poor material, white here and there, a neat, though palpable darn, but adapting itself perfectly to her little, faultless figure, and set off with collar and wristbands like the driven snow.

It would seem that Sir George speedily forgot his promise concerning the flowers; oddly enough, Miss Vann appears to have forgotten it also. Certain it is that, without any pretense of visiting the choice parterres, the two strolled on, from walk to walk, in a state of perfect contentment. It would be difficult to say which had been the more surprised. Expecting in Esther a half-educated girl, whom a few months' tuition might, in an easy, patronising way, would more than satisfy, perhaps instruct, the baronet found himself engaged with one whose information seemed fully equal to his own, in whose taste he could detect no flaw, and whose modes of expression, singularly terse and clear, were wholly free from those conventionalities which are frequently indicative of superficial education.

As for Esther, the more she listened to her companion's discourse, the more overpowering became her amazement that a nature so refined should have been prompted to seek such an association as that which impended! Could it be that Sir George was about to be Esther's taste and judgment had long since convinced her that the gentleman was a man of mark? Indeed she might not be considered a shade below, the station to which she belonged. Could there be some unconception? Or was it an idle jest? The latter theory did not seem to harmonize with Sir George's character and bearing. What was or other of the parties used? If so, which?

"Will you look at me in that quick way?" asked George, abruptly, but with a smile.

"Did I?" said Esther, caught in the fact.

"Now, then once; and do not look at me, remember," continued George, "that my observations were, in either instance, of a strictly character, hence my curiosity. You must have discovered by this time that I am a tame and civil-spoken monster, and can have no serious apprehensions of me. Come, Miss Vann, something prompted that quick movement. Was hesitate? Then I proceed to query. You have been debating in your mind whether there is not in my family a slight taint of—of insanity—"

Esther colored.

"—and endeavoring," continued George, "to detect some evidence of it in my face?"

She blush deepened.

"An eloquent answer," said the young man, laughing. "Now, my dear Miss Vann, for it is out, in, confident on us to observe a solemn pledge—"

"How can you use it?"

"At hazard of every thing?"

"Yes, at—"

Esther paused a sudden pause. A thought, suggested she hardly knew how—most probably by a remark she had heard overnight—flashed across her mind.

"He has had a love-quarrel with—with the lady they spoke of at the Hale. This absurd proposal to my self was made in a moment of pique. Wrong—foolish—cruel to all three!"

"Do you answer me," said George.

"Or do you need the assurance of a nursery-governess," said Esther, rather spitefully, "that every promise should be kept, sacredly—"

"What?"

"—canceled by its wicked rashness."

"I should have said, a deliberate promise."

"There is a deliberation in passion itself," said Esther. "I spoke, at the moment, of that reason which wilfully blinds itself to former obligations, inconsistent with the new."

"But if the penalty of such doings attached only to one's self—"

"It would be simply what we deserve."

"Only, it rarely does," said George.

"Rarely," said Esther.

"That's the worst of it," said George.

"The worst," assented Esther.

By this time they had arrived at a few moments, following their own instinctive thoughts.

Esther's: "Poor, rich, unhappy man! A whole life of regrets, remorse, mortification, for perhaps one moment's augre! Two happy, beautiful lives spoiled, a third and a fourth blighted, possibly, and a most dear old aunt find in a position so false as this? What a fate for such! Can nothing be done? Nothing? And she girt's heart swelled with genuine compassion as she glanced at the fortunate descendant of twenty-five generations of the lords of the manor.

The musing of George: "She would have me pause. Now why? From pity? What interest can she have in my infirmities, and to overlook the advantage, to her, of the connection? Stay, now; is this possible? Can the old story—George shuddered as he checked the epithet 'is his mind)—can she have reflected on the absurd anomaly of such a union, and, by way of expiation, entered this air temptation in my way? In that case, my vow compels me to accept it. She is not a Miss Vann, but a Lady Esther in disguise. Nothing? Ah, fair, sweet, and, if I am mistaken, eruditely lovable. Not an atom of vulgarity, or its refinement, in pretense. Ah, if it be so! The good old creature's thought George, glowing with gratitude for the supposed generosity. "The child can't be sacrificed" is noble. It invests her whole fraternity with a duplicity of which one would not have conceived it susceptible. Shall I undeceive her?"

"It is time for me to return, Sir George," said Esther. "Is the sun almost stopped?"

"Our progress shall end among those myrtles," said George, pointing onward.

"There will be little trade of verbs and pronouns," returned Esther, laughing, "if I am not at home by eight o'clock, my—my—" She was going to say bank, like one accustomed to have her own way, Sir George had to yield.

They had scarcely made a step or two, when Esther, seeming to take a sudden resolution, abruptly addressed her host.

"Sir George, I wish to do you an essential service. I have heard that you have made an offer of marriage to my aunt. Do you wish to marry her cook?"

"I by no means forget that she has been. If—if she is my lawful wife," said George, "the situations are incompatible."

"You reply so frankly that I am encouraged to continue my candid task," said Esther, with a beaming smile with which she was wont to reward a promising pupil. "Do you think she will prove a better wife than cook?"

"Scarcely possible," said George, laughing.

"Do you consider her a fitting wife for yourself? How will your sister receive this news?"

"Miss Vann is my especial affair," replied the young man, in a low voice.

"You are right, Sir," said Esther. "I shall presently have finished with my impertinent questioning. Will you answer three times more?"

"According to my usual indiscretion—yes," said George.

"And you any thought, before yesterday, of making my aunt your wife?"

"None in the least," was the prompt reply.

"Was this condescending offer the only courtship you pursued yesterday?"

"No—I—yes—well, upon the whole, no," said the disconcerted.

"Last question—it will be long and somewhat circumstantial; but it is necessary, the minuter particulars, since we are at liberty to put the whole aside unanswered. Were you not yesterday paying your addresses to a lady of your own condition, whom you believed not averse to them? Had you not some difference with her, ending in grief and anger—at least on your side? And was not your proposal to my aunt the offspring of that momentary passion?"

"That may be called a triangular query," replied George, smiling. "No matter. All is true. But the story is not fully told."

"Enough is told," said Esther. "Now listen to the lecture that concludes my catechising. Whatever your motive, sir, Sir George, was all in root. It was the act of a being not wholly reasonable, but who, casting all moral guidance to the winds, wilfully commits himself to the current of wrath, not knowing—not for the moment, heeding—what wrong or peril it may entail. Because you have become indifferent to the vengeful fair who has spurned you, you would tamely cast down the barks of others? Can this folly compensate for the slight offered to be, that you have suffered at your lady's hand? Is it intended for revenge? If she does not love you, there is none. If she does, will nothing but the most complete reinstate satisfy your resentment? What can she have done to merit that? Sir George, you are a coward! Could you look her thirteen years' faithful service should be so rewarded?"

"You speak, my dear young lady, as if it were a penalty."

"It is," replied his monitress. "To be dragged up from a station in which she was contented, useful, and respected, to one in which she can only be a mark for ridicule and scorn!"

"If your aunt partakes these sentiments," said the young baronet, with affected pique, "far be it from me to press my claims. Does she?"

"I might reply, 'That alone is her especial affair,'" said Miss Vann, "but it is possible that she may not yet have fully weighed the incongruities, the endless inconveniences, the miseries, of such an ill-sorted match. See, we are at the end of our walk. The last of you will ever hear from my lips shall be honest. If not overpowered by your insult—but honored—your old servant by the preposterous offer you have made her, she will, I am confident, see it in its true light, that is a greater reflection upon your openness than her judgment. I wish you good-morning!"

"A moment," said George. "The last words I shall hear from your lips! Not so, I hope. Should the marriage take place, I—I—"

"Strangers," said Esther, almost fiercely. "May this foot wither if ever it passes the threshold of they gates!"

The young man hesitated, and the color rose to his brow.

"Had I had such a counselor before, my course might have been wiser. Even now," he added, "since it is not what I wished to hear—"

"Since what is not wholly certain?"

"Since what I have not accepted."

"Pardon me. As I have said, that is no affair of mine," said Esther, coldly.

"Pardon me," retorted George. "It may be. Condescend to hear me for an instant," he continued, noticing her impatient gesture, "and I may succeed in some severity, but not without justice. Though undeserving as such a lot, I would fain, were it possible, retain the friendship of one who has cared when my judgment is disposed to stray. Tell me, Miss Vann—Esther—if I have not been sufficiently explicit, should she—"

"When we arrive at the dominant verb," said the young governess, interrupting, "I hope, to better be better able to reply."

George was constrained to stammer at my lessons," replied Sir George. "The consciousness of having made one grievous mistake—"

"Sometimes leads to another," said Esther.

"Is it so? Have I, then, no hope?"

"Hope, Sir?"

"Let me, for Heaven's sake, make myself understood. Esther, you who have penetrated the secret of that fatal proposal, entered me, I hope, to better reason, will you—should your aunt's refusal leave me free—accept this hand? Worthy of more than I can offer—"

"Worthy of more?" interrupted Esther, turning her face upon him, and speaking in a calm, low voice. "Worthy, at least, of more than a love some minutes old—a hand pledged to one person, and offered to another—a heart that has undergone as many as I do the infatuation of supposing it a passport to the favor of any woman who chose to wrote wisdom. Good Heavens, Sir! in discarding you from the folly you were best upon committing, do you dare to imagine that I would wish to retain you? Our conference has been too long. I am obliged to you for your courtesy. Not another word, if you please. Farewell!"

She turned, and walked away.

"Another false move!" muttered George, as he gazed after her. "Fool, coward, culpable blockhead!"

He walked thoughtfully toward the house, taking, however, a circuitous route. Esther, on the hand, had made many steps when one of the under gardeners, bursting through the belt of shrubs, came running, hat in hand, toward her.

"Redditch! what now? What's the matter?" asked his master.

The man thrust his hoe into George's hand.

"Swarts—Swarts—Swarts!" he gasped, breathlessly.

"Swarts! What of him? Collect yourself, man. What do you mean?"

"He've gone mad, Sir George! Raging wild about the garden, snapping avage at every thing he come near! Here's Swarts' hand, and he!" added Mr. Redditch, with a decided disposition to take to his heels.

A large hole in the glove visible, for a moment, glancing across the flower-bed, and taking a direction which, intersecting at a right angle the path on which they stood, would lead the infuriated keeper upon Esther's track.

"Stand behind me, sir," said George. "Keep quite still. I am going to whistle. If he notices it have no fear. A mad dog never regards his master, nor turns from his prey."

Mr. Redditch did not seem to relish the experiment, but he stood behind.

The black mass came bounding into the gravelwalk, some forty yards distant. George whistled sharply, and called:

"Swarts—Swarts!"

The animal seemed to swerve, as though recognising the summons, but next moment, with a sprawling plunge, dashed himself through the opposing shrubs, and confronted the baronet.

Seriously alarmed, George set off at once in pursuit, followed by his attendant, by the time, was in sight. The servant stoke. At the place where the dog had made his blundering charge through the covert, beads and flakes of foam were plainly visible on the stems. It seemed not too plain Mr. Swarts, a powerful mastiff, had become rabid.

The alarm had already spread. Shouts and cries were heard from the vicinity of the stables, and thither the young man bent his flying steps. All was evidently in commotion.

"Where is he, boy? Where is he?" called out George, catching by the sleeve an excited stable-boy who came rushing forth.

"Oh, Sir, the gun! the gun!" cried the boy.

"Let me have. The gun! the gun! Away with you! Is—is Miss—"

But the lad was already out of hearing.

In the stable-yard a singular scene presented itself. Crowded in the stable windows, mounted on ladder, and on the roofs of coach-houses, or any other coign of position, almost the whole household of Gosling Grove were assembled, watching with intense anxiety the proceedings of the groom and a little-dog-fox-terrier, one of him who had been dispatched for the gun.

The latter animal had run the boy into a corner, and, though as yet without doing him any injury, lay on the ground within a yard of him, his great black head between his paws, howling in tone, and his bloodred eyes glaring as if each moment he were about to make a deadly spring. Why he did not, seemed to be the mystery. With the spurning of his hinder paws this animal had thrown up a regular outwork behind him, and it was manifest that his incessant movement was edging him nearer and nearer to his prisoner. As for Swarts—as that little boy about ten, and likely, even enjoying the most friendly relations with Swarts —he set up another shrill terror, his face opened to their full extent, as if fascinated by the danger from which he could not escape. Attempts to drive the dog away had as yet evidently added to his fury; it had been received to leave him alone until fire-arms were at hand.

The young master thought differently. To his generous heart the boy's danger seemed too imminent to admit of any delay. Disregarding the remonstrances of his servants, and taking no notice of a command that he insisted, as in the case of Miss Turnover, George walked steadily toward the crouching dog, and spoke to him in a tone of quiet, sharp command.

Swarts uttered a low growl, and flung the foam from his mixed jaws, but never took his eyes from his little prisoner.

"Lie—down," said George: "I am about to take off the—the—" he checked his eye in of you, use no dogs."

The boy's lips moved in assent.

"Come, Sir, to kennel," said George, and, as he spoke, struck the hoe he carried sharply on the ground close to the dog.

Quick as lightning the brute was upon him, seizing the weapon in his jaws. It was an exchange of prisoners, for hardly less swiftly, the boy had vanished from his perilous position, and was in safety. A loud cry burst from the spectators, and a total two or three, unashamed by the urgency of the occasion, were hustled down from the window by master's assistance. But he continued them back. Though held up in a vice, George's hoods had resisted the animal's teeth, and he was as yet perfectly unhurt.

But what was now to be done? A gun had been brought, and presented with swan-shot, but Swarts dared use it while man and dog retained their relative positions. Neither was it possible to convey the weapon into the hands of the boy, for all but certain death. The infuriated beast would only quit his present hold to fasten, perhaps with more fatal effect, upon him who approached him. To complete the difficulties of the situation, the iron portion of the hoe had, when wrenched from the ground, become detached by the handle, thus depriving George of all chance of dealing an effective blow at his dangerous opponent.

At this moment Esther, prepared for departure, and astonished at the sudden solitude that seemed to reign in the house, made her appearance on the terrace. A few words made her acquainted with the danger of Miss Vann, and the young creature—of the house, and the difficulty of interposition. The girl's face become scarlet, then white as snow. Without betraying the slightest hesitation, she sprang down, within a pace of the dog, and, stooping slightly, strove to engage his attention. The animal turned toward her voice, and became fixed. He ceased to shake and mouth the object on which his fangs had closed, and George was about to avail himself of the situation of his whole hold. Would he spring upon the new-comer?

"For God's sake," began George, trying a last appeal.

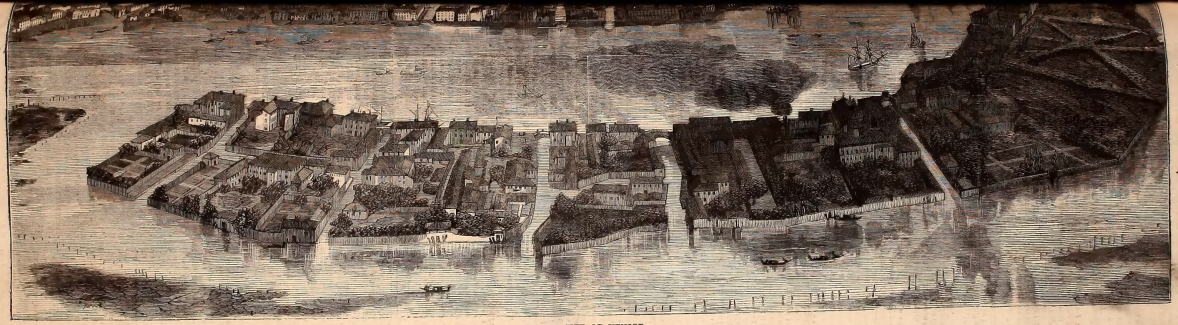
"Be silent!" was Esther's only reply, her eye never quitting that of the dog. To the amazement of everybody, Swarts now displayed evident symptoms of quailing. Gradually his mouth relaxed, he detached his teeth from George's boots. Then Esther slowly extended her hand. Swarts struck back an angry paw, which sent the foam from his jaws, and uttered a piteous whine. As if this had been a signal of surrender, her fingers grip, without hesitation, put her hand between his collar and his shaggy neck, and turned him in the direction of a vacant kennel, close at hand. Yielding to the impulse, Swarts allowed himself to be conducted thither, and secured to the chain. But the creature was not yet over. In turning, Esther's foot came in contact with the water-can placed there for the usual occupant of the kennel, and upset it. The dog, with a howl of rage, for the first time for at her; but, checked by the chain, only touched her dress, and fell sufficiently to sneeze with the unmoved fluid that fringed his jaws.

George had recognised the fatal sign—even if the truthful agony of the dog' reared on end, and snapping with convulsive fury at fancied objects around, had not made the matter indisputable. There was but one thing to do, and no time to lose in doing it. The staple that held the chain was of no great strength, and must yield before the powerful strain. He beckoned to the keeper, who put the gun into his hands.

"Farewell, my brave old boy!" he said, regretfully, and fired.

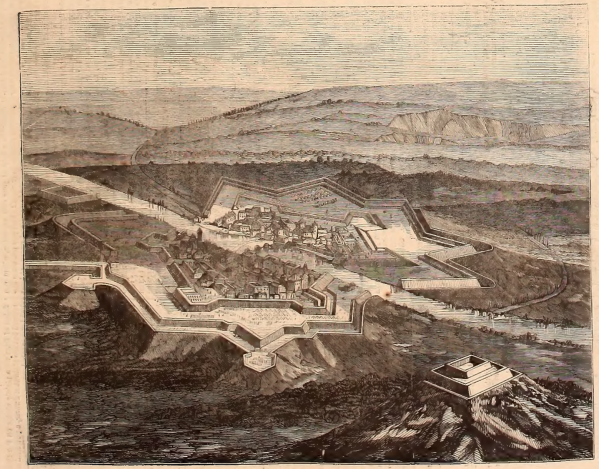
The foam changed to blood, and Swarts rolled over dead.

"Where is Miss Vann?" asked George, looking round for his young preserver.



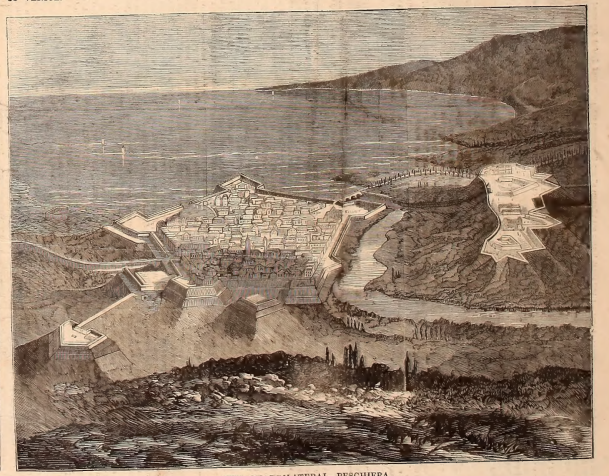
"In the house, I think, Sir George," said Mr. Frashaw. "I think she got a little faintish, Sir George. Shall I tell her you wants to see her, Sir George?"

"Do no such thing," said his master, and walked into the house.



Mr. Frashaw took a letter from his pocket, and examined it.

"There's something inside o' you, I can feel," he muttered. "Shall give it, shall give it, shall not? I ort to. But, somehow, he don't seem in good cue."



And Mr. Frashaw thoughtfully followed his master.

AUTUMN DAYS.

Adapted from the French.

Again the year throws down her golden horn
On thankful harvest field and granary floor,
And sun-decked fruits roll out, and ears of corn,
And bulbous roots sweet to the inmost core.

What wealth is here! Earth's hidden, rocky veins
Of gold, slow-curdled as the ages passed,
Are pampered where the shining harvest plains
Spread out the store her short life has amassed.

Nor wealth alone. Lest man should grasp the prize
With thankless hands, and hasten to depart,
In holy beauty his softened eyes
She passes in to sanctify his heart.

Her midwinter glory lightens on the leaves,
Her soft air folds the fields in deepest calm,
Her voice is in the rustling of the sheaves
And dropping fruits—the low, glad harvest psalm.

Her days are full of charity. The sun
Clasps warm the purple bubbles of her vines,
And dries her dusty bulbs that, one by one,
Are rolled from their damp beds in golden lines.

Perfect and pure is all the season's good,
Healthful and tranquil, unto heart and brain;
So may life's harvest draw through heated blood,
And lull to rest its weary toil and pain.

NARCISETTO.

On the afternoon of the 23d of December, 18—, a stylish cab, driven by a young gentleman, drew up at the gate of "The Limes."

The cold was of that ferocious kind which devours most sensations, and makes their loss appear supremely arid ridiculous, painting their lips indigo, and with icy flame scorching into tender wetness every part whereon it might not be. But the young gentleman in question appeared to advantage amidst frost and east wind: a light did it seem, but his temper suffered any more than his outer sun. His large green-gray eyes shone out, by will unirritated lustre, like cold and gleaming aqua-marine. He checks were deeply colored just on the right spot: his lips appeared of a crimson fresher and richer than to set off the even white teeth to best advantage, and wore a smile which told of inward content.

The small figure alighted, rang, and stationed himself under the tall iron-grip's nose. The iron-grip jingled his silver bells, fluttered his blue ribbons, paved the ground with pompous self-appreciation.

But a moment more and Narcisetto descended from his cab, showing a brief, tight figure, well-built and comfortable, made up with just carelessness enough to keep the inner fire cheerfully aglow; showing too a perfect boot, fitting, however, and all the better for unconstraint.

Narcisetto's errand to the Limes, be it known, was important; but as he walked the short space of the way to the door he looked comfortable—almost careless.

He was shown into the drawing-room, which was pretty but not pretentious, full of proofs that the average comfort was taste, if not great means. After he youth had waited as it seemed to him twenty minutes, actually three, the door opened, and a lady entered.

The lady of the house—Mrs. Arlingford, widow of the late Capt. Arlingford (lost at sea two years ago from his pretty clipper-built Sea Spray, homeward-bound from Bombay)—She was beautiful. She was thirty-six, forty, but there was no silver among the gold of her plain braided hair, no wrinkle on her blood-red cheek. Weeds had just now given place to modified mourning, which became her well.

Did she affect change color, give just a nameless hint of inward disquietude as she entered? Her visitor thought so, and wondered. But he could not reason on the subject, being a trifle flustered himself. His heart had ebbed, and now bolted off in a manner almost unusual.

And no wonder. For Narcisetto was come to the Limes, or we have not done an important matter. He was come, in fact, to make an offer.

But he certainly had not felt again into his usual amble. Narcisetto's being was wont to flow on smoothly as a stream of glycerin, and nothing could give turbulence to the easy current for any length of time.

The conversation remained for a while comfortably general and vague. But through it all, gently, both speakers were conscious that this kind of thing could not last. Narcisetto seemed, with her every look, to dive below the surface stratum of the good-humored, boyish talk. He could have her companion to him as a very special note of interrogation. For his part Narcisetto grew mildly puzzled. There was that in my lady's manner which showed (as his stupid little instance taught him) that she not only scented out the true object of his visit, but that her very, very good reason or other, was preternaturally keen on the subject.

How it came about that the conversational breeze veered from the quarter of light literature and other generalities I am not of love to do so. But so. The change was accomplished.

He offered it. Mrs. Arlingford was rehunchable. Her head sank gradually back upon the crimson chair on which she sat. Her young grave face and lower her features—the Grecian features they were—became paler, more statuesque each moment: till at last, when she heard it, but not pretty English the momentment which a strange prescience had all along told her was at hand, when she knew positively—that Mr. Harry Beresford was in love with her daughter Lucy, and that he could not help but make known his situation to the young lady herself, she seemed on the verge of fainting.

Now that Mr. Harry Beresford, sole son of a wealthy country squire, was a good match or catch for Lucy Mrs. Arlingford knew well. But—

The cause of, and what hung upon this "but" shall be placed before the reader in three pages.

We will not undertake to say how far Narcisetto was really ensnared of Lucy at this time. To what extent a good-natured gentleman's fancies may be led by a wish himself may be capable of passionate attachment to another who is not able to decide. It is enough, however, that Harry Beresford wished to marry Lucy Arlingford, and that he expected to succeed with his suit.

He was therefore surprised and disappointed at Mrs. Arlingford's reception of his declaration. The manner of that lady, in fact, became extremely embarrassing, and evinced a nervous excitement quite unintelligible to her visitor. It was plain that she struggled to repress her agitation, but her efforts were painfully unsuccessful. There was a mixture of reversity and of gentle chiding in her disjointed remarks. She did not refuse, she would not assent to, an interview with her daughter. She smiled sarcastically, then wept. She rose and resumed herself repeatedly.

Meanwhile Mr. Harry Beresford gazed upon the beautiful lady before him with a childish surprise which would have been supremely entertaining to any third person. He wondered whether he had been a fool: strove hard to be, at any rate, perfectly gentlemanly: stole glances at his shapely boyship in the mirror, and puzzled himself as to what could be the objection to him: wishing heartily at last that he were safely out in the frosty air behind his iron-gray, rolling on the open road to the music of silver bells. Love and ladies, he concluded, might go to the antipodes if they were to be so unintelligible as this.

A glass door led from the room to a conservatory, which door reversed was also curtained by a thick, crimson curtain. Presently the lady gently and scarcely perceptibly drew certain aside: but her visitor as she did so to look through.

Nothing could be more puzzlingly dramatic than this gesture. Narcisetto immediately thought of the vision displayed to Faust, and irreverently said to himself, "What can this fidi be expected to do when he sees me?"

But a glance into the conservatory made plain the lady's meaning. The vision was clearly intended to disenchant, not to arouse, the love of the beholder.

The conservatory was long, and well clothed with foliage. At its further end, near the outer door, stood Lucy Arlingford; but she was double. A tall thin boy, the cut of whose clothes and the length of whose whiskers would equally announce him as an old boy. Her face was turned from the drawing-room: she did not know, therefore, that her mother's lover had arrived. Knight, also, appeared too intent upon his suit to notice it either.

Lucy's tall figure was planted firmly; but her head was bent down, and a glossy loop of raven hair, resting upon a neck like snow, made the dainty outline see of the neighborhood of her closest face. There was no driving-the state of feeling for Narcisetto to see, but Narcisetto readily accepted the interpretation of the scene which he saw that he was intended to put upon it. He colored and looked somewhat away.

"I see," he said, with well-bred considerateness in his tone, "I see, Mrs. Arlingford, that I am wrong in making a proposal to which you can not assent. I am too late in the field, that is all. Pray, madam, that you will forgive my ignorance and blunder, and that the fortunate gentleman there—Mr. Adolphus Churchill, I dare say, a worthier of the two—may be lucky to have properly, and get over this. Will you be my friend still?"

"I will indeed—always."

The youth started at the earnestness with which this was said. Mrs. Arlingford gave him her hand—it trembled, he observed—and he left her.

Single, tramp, and gone. Narcisetto's cab had scarcely died away when Mrs. Arlingford, losing more completely her self-possession, hastened to bring herself into a chair and burst into violent sobbing.

II.

But a few minutes had passed when the crimson curtain was again drawn aside, and Lucy entered the drawing-room. She had left Adolphus Churchill before the fire of some evidently strong emotion.

"Oh, mamma, dear!" she cried, "what on earth is the matter?"

"Nothing—nothing," said the mother, fixing. "So, Lucy, you have dismissed Mr. Churchill? Well, it is your own business."

"But surely, mamma," said Lucy, throwing off her hat, and dishevelling her hair in the way which best fit its place, "you would not, could not wish it! Are you crying about this? It is unreasonable, mamma. I will not be forced to marry. I will marry whom I please."

She drew herself up; her brown eyes flashed, her whole form denied opposition.

"I do not intend to force you," said mamma, coolly. "Master Beresford has been here. You had better go now."

"I will go, mamma; and you shall not see me again if this matter is settled forever. I will write him such a letter between this and dinner as he will not forget in a hurry."

So speaking, Lucy quickly left the room, and running up stairs to her own room, locked herself in, and began to cry vehemently.

There was laid for her presently unhappy after their sudden little quarrel. Each accused herself, and longed to "make it up" and kiss the other. Lucy wondered how she could have been so cruel as to insult Mr. Adolphus Churchill, dandy though he was. Poor mamma! she had been so kind, so thoughtful, so unfounded.

But there was pride in both hearts, and each lady chose for the time being to be miserable, rather than to say a few soft, compromising words. Lucy was still determined to write that letter, and Mrs. Arlingford to her desk, and hastily penned this note:

"The Limes, December 23d, 18—.

"SIR,—When, a month ago, you made me an offer of marriage, I was in a manner which you might well have considered that, that I would not. I am sorry that you should not be the customer, however, to accept me. You have done me the honor to ask my daughter's hand. This afternoon again inflicted upon me the annoyance of refusing you. I am, madam, I am, determined, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"LUCY ARLINGFORD."

There was dash and spirit in this letter, though, and those were qualities she loved. She folded and sealed the note, then ran down with it to the kitchen, and finding there the little groom, who was generally too missive by him to Adolphus Churchill, Esquire, Beechwood Cloth, and returned to her room.

She now felt sorry and unhappy, thought that it was not quite ladylike to have left her mother in tears, understanding with your poor dear mamma: feared nervously that her mother might perhaps die that night, and leave her hopeless and friendless in the world. She kind the last thing; resolved finally that she would go instantly and have a reconciliation with her.

But somehow the "make up" did not come off. Mother and daughter met at dinner in coldness and constraint. "They stood apart, the scars remaining." The evening passed in the same way. Music, which both loved, could not bridge over the ugly chasm. Both wondered whether they were to part for the night without a reconciliation, and both feared to be the first softening the other's heart, but neither would own her heart softened.

The bedtime came. There was but a single icy kiss: no warm embrace, no "God bless you, my darling!" or "God bless my mother!" And so they went to separate rooms—for by a tacit understanding they had agreed not to sleep together to-night, as they often did.

It was long before Lucy closed her eyes; she fell thinking of the real cause (as far as she knew it) of this unpleasantness. It was this—she loved Harry Beresford. Narcisetto—she had herself given him the title—had possessed himself of her heart's key. Narcisetto, with his easy, well-bred manners; his clear, sunny intelligence; his bright, boyish good looks; his gentle care, even for her dog, Lucy. He was self-centered, something whispered; he was a trifle of a fine gentleman. Mr. Adolphus Churchill was all that, nevertheless. But for this fact she would have said "Yes" to Mr. Churchill, for any body else, to please her mother. While this was true, she would not for the world.

Lucy followed a deep woman's resolve to love Harry with whole heart and soul to life's last day. No one accepted as her husband this should be the great secret reality of her existence. Lucy had determined so far when she fell asleep.

She awoke in confusion and terror. A sound, piercing and prolonged, had traveled to her from her mother's room. She started to the floor, and met another cry—her own name was pronounced.

Mrs. Arlingford's handsome furniture all seemed out of place to the frightened girl—the distances all wrong. She had to run, to fly, to be moved. Her bare feet, half paralyzed with terror, to her mother's room.

She expected to find blood and death when she got to the door. But no! her mother fell upon her neck, mother's bed she saw that her fears had run on in the wrong direction. Mrs. Arlingford was sitting bolt upright, looking pale and bewildered, to be sure, but nothing worse. Lucy's ordinarily affectionate sense severe fright.

"Dearest mother, what is it?" cried Lucy.

"Oh, my child, come and kiss me, and don't leave me again. Such a horrible, horrible dream I have had!" sobbed Mrs. Arlingford.

"Mother, it is nothing. We have had a misunderstanding, but we will not do so again. Mamma, she said, "but never mind now; be calm. It is nothing but an unusually strong dream. You will be a lesson to me not to say any thing to grieve you again. Lie down, mamma, and I will nurse you."

Lucy observed with relief and thankfulness that her mother now wept. She did not try to restrain these tears, but with gentle words and caresses induced her as she sobbing became less convulsive laid the head upon her daughter's breast, and pettily, kissed the forehead.

"My child?" said Mrs. Arlingford, presently, "I never felt the want of your dear father as I have done this afternoon. If he were but here! If the cruel sea would but give him up alive! I can not tell you, my child—but if I could lay my head on his bosom, all my sorrows would be at an end!"

How could Lucy help crying now? Her tears fell fast upon her mother's face, and mixed with hers.

At length mother and daughter sank alike into deep and calm sleep, and did not wake until the late winter morning light had let in the frosted panes and the familiar sounds of household life banished into the room that "airy nothings" the night's strange terror and fancies.

III.

The note which Lucy had written to the "rejected clothes-wearer" was not sent. It underwent a remarkable adventure. Little garden boy, speeding with it to Beechwood Cloth, Esquire, on the way with farmer Dodd, Penfield's bull, which animal was in the habit of going, without any guiding, with his head "to be milked," and the Beechwood Road. Garden boy, having an excusable dread of being "tossed," had taken sudden refuge in Farmer Dodd's conveyance, and in the midst of his taurine majesty, and had made a quick discovery that Mr. Churchill was thereby making a visit. In the course of his rapid "strategic" movement the note had been dropped, and the growing dusk had prevented its recovery. It was, therefore, had manifestly no prudent silence on the subject.

Next day, at the office, Narcisetto's cab came gayly along that Beechwood road. The young gentleman, in high spirits, having spent yesterday's rebuff nicely for he looked just as smiling, comfortable, and ornamental as ever. Every indication was to be detected that his mercurial coat had been stroked the wrong way. He was now driving with characteristic amusement, and was on his way to Beechwood Cloth Hall, on some mission of inquiry, at the request of his calm, good employer.

At a certain point on the road Master Tyger was ordered down to adjust the curb-chain. During the pause, he suddenly saw that there something by the way-side which looked like an unopened note.

In a few minutes Narcisetto was reading Lucy's writing to Mr. Churchill, was in Narcisetto's hands. He glanced slightly at the first few lines, which were very much indeed, lifted his wide eyebrows, and then drove on. There was only one thing to be done, of course, and he resolved to do himself. He rode on. At steady-going temper plunged at the notion of his being "coming the Cupid" for any one. Still, as the reader will understand, he little guessed what was the true nature of the communication.

The silver bells jingled up toward the lodge of Beechwood Court. As Narcisetto came near to the sacred portal he observed Mr. Churchill upon a cob, walking post, scarf, and other clothes, on the top of which appeared a hat which was evidently decked handsomely with long appendages of hair. The clothes, mask, and hair combined, constituted Adolphus Churchill, Esquire.

"How d'ye do, Churchill?" said Narcisetto, in his quick, light way. "I've been met with something that belongs to you. I suppose it was accidentally dropped. Can't be the case that you've been writing to Lucy?"

"Thanks," said Sir Dandy. "What can it be?"

During the solution of this question Narcisetto moved off.

He executed his commission, drove home, and felt that he had done right. Next day he sought consolation for solace. He took a cheroot and a magazine, and lounged away the hours in his office.

But he was soon aroused. There came a knock at the door, and he was told that Mr. Adolphus Churchill wished to see him directly.

In some surprise Harry directed that the visitor might be shown into the room where he was. On his entrance Mr. Churchill gave evidence of serious disturbance. He was pale, and his whole manner had an oppressive burden of wrath. But any thing more ludicrously unlike than the exhibition of his anger could not be conceived.

Harry looked at him first in wonder; then broke out into a hearty, but not ill-natured laugh. "Why, what on earth disturbs you, old fellow?" he inquired.

"You are a snob," said Churchill, "to insult me in this manner."

Harry rose and laid down his cheroot, opened his eyes, stirred the fire, and, restraining his strong impulse to respond by a purely physical demonstration, said, quietly,

"Curse, explain. I don't understand these words at all."

"Ha! And to what limit, then, Beresford, do you expect my patience to extend?" replied Churchill, a suspicion crossing his mind for the first time that he had been in error. "You dare to assert that you knew the contents of the note you brought me just now?"

"It strikes me I won't trouble myself to deny anything," said Harry, quite cool.

But Churchill had expected to be any thing else but the arrant ass he was, he would here have drawn in his horns, acknowledged his blunder, and pitched up an understanding with his good-tempered neighbor and college friend, Harry Beresford. But the donkey element in his nature was so large that he was unable rightly to estimate his situation. He retained, probably by dying day, the belief that the note accompanied to handed to him in pure courtesy was virtually the offspring of the interest which Lucy and Harry was far too proud to make any attempt at obliterating with a belief.

"You are dealing falsely with me," continued the enlightened young dandy: "you fancy that I have no discernment, and this may impose upon me: no spirit, and that you may insult me with impunity. Learn your mistake, sir. You shall answer for your insolence."

Harry quietly rang the bell: then relighted his cheroot, and sat down perfectly silent. When the footman opened the door, he said, composedly, "Show this gentleman out. If you please, Churchill, you will see before long that you have been making a fool of yourself in this affair. I am sorry for you, therefore, and will do so by letter in civil terms. I will reply to your note to-day. Good-by, sir. Show him out."

Even now any man of common intelligence might have escaped from the fix that Churchill was in. But he had not the wit to do so. Harry's coolness, and, however, just sufficient sense to perceive that if he stuck to his point he was probably got the better of, hardening in two minutes. So he withdrew, saying, "You will hear of this again. You do not deceive me, though you fancy it."

What particular object Mr. Churchill had gained by this dignified retreat was not clear. He love had just natural instinct enough about it to lead him to suspect that Harry Beresford was the favored lover. Lucy referred in her note, and this suspicion alone had brought about his purposeless interference. Harry himself, however, had certainly acquired something. He had learned indirectly that Lucy's feeling toward Churchill could not have been such as he could wish her to suppose.

His heart fastened with strange persistency upon the truth evolved from the late visit—that Lucy was still free. And, as he rode his back, the sofa drawn near to the cozy fire, his cheroot sending through his white frame a soft, comforting calm, Master Narcisetto pondered long, rolling in the bright ocean-stream which the ceiling, till at last the eyes closed, the cheroot fell, and there came a sound of gentle, boyish breathing.

That dream, which amidst some confusion was the unassisted labor of the dreamer had, unfortunately, was rudely disturbed by the butler, who suddenly appeared, stirring the fire, and saying that dinner would be served in ten minutes.

IV.

That same afternoon Mrs. Arlingford, full of distracting thoughts, went to her own room for the sake of solitude. Lucy was out. She had driven in a cab, and hid her face in her white hands.

"A month ago," she thought, "a woman of forty years, a widow—the helpless victim of a foolish passion for a boy scarcely half her age!"

She would have sunk into the ground with shame had she been compelled to make the avowal to any human creature. She herself scarcely dare confessing the truth even to herself. And yet it was only too true that a single word from Harry would in her heart for the very man who had wished to marry her daughter.

But worse—she had rejected the young man's suit for her own sake. In act, if not in word, she had made a determination to marry him herself. Even then, she might divert his affection from her daughter. She had created a false position for herself. Even while she had encouraged Lucy's acceptance of Churchill's offer, Harry Beresford was the person she really loved.

How base, how unnatural, how unwomanly her conduct seemed! How the dolphot of her poor frail heart, wondering how such sinful emotions could grow there! How she strove with herself, setting before her hardened mind every consideration which could lead to deliver her from the horrid thraldom.

Oh, if she could only be her one true love and hero! How the sight of his sun-face would dispel this unwelcome mist, and lay the ghost of the foolish, amazing passion! But he was silent forever in his "vast and wandering grave." Alas, alas for him!

Soon the mother's thoughts turned to the world spring up again athwart the lady's bolder thoughts. Was she wrong in what her daughter believed? that beauty was still left to her, measuring her chances of success with that dear fascinating boy? Then she would win back Harry's love all again, by the flowing gold, and jewel eyes, and lips of coral, walking by his side, admired by all, and the envy of all women.

Again, with a start, she would wake from the debasing dream. Lucy's future happiness, her marrying over darling Lucy, her precious lost husband's child, she would resolve, God helping her, never to let so mad dream be more than a dream, however brief.

It was a weary, miserable struggle. We can not already fathom the workings of these strong, thoughtful, or minutely anatomize that morbid soul. Certain it is, however, that when Lucy came back in the afternoon, to ask for a solution of her mother's long self-banishment from the drawing-room, Mrs. Arlingford's temptation had been met with victory. The true and dreadful nature of which she scarcely realized.

At the moment when Lucy opened the door attended Mrs. Arlingford held in her hand a small vial. It contained a strong solution of the drug laudanum, and often thankfully taken by the restless and suffering in those small doses. But the lady had now taken up the bottle with feelings of a very different kind, which she had ever done so before.

"Why, child," she said, thought, "end the wretched conflict in a sleep? Better to die than to live so as to degrade one's self. None would know. Lucy would only be the better off for my death."

In the midst of these thoughts the mother replied to her daughter that she would come down stairs shortly. She scarcely knew what she said, and certainly at the moment of Lucy's entrance no decision she made.

But the vial proved to be empty. Presently, therefore, Mrs. Arlingford did leave her room, and found she had written a note to a chemist at Galsford, a town two miles off; which note, upon going down stairs, she left in the kitchen to be sent by the old errand-woman next day.

This evening passed almost as sadly as the last. The mother was sometimes absent, sometimes irritable and excited. Lucy began to be seriously apprehensive about her, but she did not express her fears.

Next day was Christmas-eve. The dear old season came reverably in, bearded with icicles and snow. As Lovee, she thought, sadly, that she did not promise to be a cheerful Christmas for her. Her love, as far as she knew, was unrepaired. Her mother's state was unsettling and alarming. Love, then, she had not brought for her, she fancied, no pleasant gifts this year.

But as cheerfully as she could she went through the Christmas-eve duties. Parlors prepared, or overlooked the preparation of, little comforts for the poor; wove nasty decorations of holly, mistletoe, and ivy; said every word and then would come incidentally to pale mother's side, who sat alone, strange, gloomy, and abstracted.

"We should not be dining by ourselves to-day, mamma," said Lucy, as the hour for tea drew approached. "Even two years ago, amidst all our sorrow, some one was with us on Christmas-eve."

The mother scarcely noticed the remark.

"Has the errand-woman brought any thing for me?" she inquired of a servant, who entered at the moment with candles.

"Nothing ma'am. She passed half an hour back."

"What did my mother expect?" asked Lucy. "Had she ordered herself some little Christmas present?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Arlingford, covering her pale face.

At this point a ring was heard at the front gate. Immediately after the admission of the carter to the house, the servant came to the drawing-room door. Her face was materially flushed and excited as she approached. "Some one from Mr. Arnold's, the chemist's, ma'am. He wishes to see you himself."

Mrs. Arlingford swept into the hall with her usual calm dignity, and observed, at the open front door, the figure of a tall large man, muffled in snow-cloth, his black eyes bent eagerly upon her.

"Are you Mr. Arnold?" she asked, hardly able to see the stranger's face distinctly.

"It is only me," said a full bass voice, "that your errand-woman dropped, a small packet from the chemist's. I accidentally learned her omission, and, as I was coming this way, undertook to bring it. Here is your physic."

Something in the speaker's tone had arrested Mrs. Arlingford's attention. She turned a searching glance upon him, clasped her hands, uttered an indescribable cry of joy, and was rushed to his arms.

Heaven! it was her long-lost sailor! It was the husband whose reported death she had mourned for two weary years!

She fell, weak and trembling, upon his bosom; and there fed upon his life-restoring kisses, like the dying desert traveler who meets with unhoped-for luscious fruits beside his arid path: there she received the truth that in her dire extremity God had helped her in the way most direct effectual, that He had answered in mighty happiness until the moment when it would bring with it the fullest cup of bliss.

What an evening that was! Think of it, reader. To find a two years' sorrow a fiction; to awaken all of a sudden from accident experiences, and to know they were but dreams! To the size of such vast joy no human words will stretch.

For a time the excitement of delight was extravagant, but the flavor or two subsided into a composed the bliss. When they had seen him rest, heard him explain, then they grew calmer, and rested happily content on the broad basis of unquestioned joy.

But ere long a new thought sprang up in the mother's heart. She filled it with wrongful, deeply wronged, darling daughter. With her generous, loving soul restored, as it now was, to perfect vigor, it could not sleep, she knew, until that wrong had been righted.

She hastily wrote and dispatched the following note:

"MY DEAR SIR.—Will you do me the kindness to let me have a few words with you here at once on a subject of which we spoke at our last meeting? I then misled you entirely. Pray come, I implore, instantly.

"You will probably have heard of our wonderful happiness before this reaches you. I am sure you rejoice with us.

"Yours very faithfully,

"HARRIET ARLINGFORD.

"HENRY BERESFORD, ESQ." "MARY ARLINGFORD.

Narcissite lost no time in obeying this abrupt summons. He was shown privately into the dining-room, where Mrs. Arlingford first saw him alone. Here was no constraint or awkwardness now. The foolish fuzy had fled like a Will-o'-the-wisp from the woman's now happy heart. Her glorious lover was real enough to her, and her late passion had dwindled to a myth and a phantom. She could speak now of the past to each other to her son. She did not tell him of the motive which had led to her late strange conduct, but she made it clear to him as day that no obstacle now lay between him and Lucy.

It was not unreasonable that he should ask for an interview with the young lady then and there. He asked and obtained it.

She came to him in a glow of girlish beauty. Her mourning had been hastily set aside, and she came into the room in a dress of queenly purple, with a diamond lustre in her eyes, and berries peering bright from amidst her hair, which seemed to be all flame.

He did not speak a word. His volubility all failed him at this strange moment. It was so new, so overpowering—his sense of total absorption into the life of another. In some nameless, inarticulate language she told her that he loved her; and she, scarcely better able to express herself, made to him the same confession.

He was unworthy of her. He knew it. He had hitherto been a self-centred, frivolous creature; but he felt that a new life was now infused into his soul—or rather, that his life was drawn into that of another. All Arachne had sucked his being into her own, and the cold, butterfly, "Narcissite" nature had fallen, like an silken toils—fallen clattering down to dust—an empty, shriveled shell!

What a wonderful Christmas-day followed! Lucy said that it was like the last page of the overture to "Der Freischütz." It was all joy; joy unalloyed by a snow upon the lawn; deep, as the ocean which had yielded up the long-lost pearls; substantial, as turkey and sausages.

The general merriment was increased when a report (intended to have the air of casualty, but clearly meant by design) reached the Limes, that Mr. Adolphus Chesshill, of Beechwood Court, was not coming. Miss Fenella Fotheringay—the best dresser in the county.

Of her design in ordering the "physic," and of her late wild fancy, the now happy wife never spoke—not even to her husband. And surely she was right to be silent. Some phantoms of our foolish brains, some frailties of our poor, fond hearts, are better unnamed by the tongue or whispered into any human ear. The lovers, now happy in mutually-valued affection, did not care to inquire into the cause of that strangeness of manner which Mrs. Arlingford, before their engagement, had in different ways shown to them both.

Harry proved to demonstration that he could love with complete self-forgetfulness. As Lucy's nickname for him, therefore, seems henceforth to lose its appropriateness, we think the time has come for us to close the story of "NARCISSITE."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE recent opening of the new Steinway Hall is an event of special interest to the lovers of music in our city. New York has been deficient in places suitable for musical entertainments; but this promises to be the best when completed. The Hall is immediately in the rear of the warerooms of Messrs. Steinway and Sons; and the main entrance is through the marble portico on Fourteenth Street. It is a thoroughly substantial building, capable of seating 1800 persons comfortably. The acoustic properties are said to be very good under inspection, and the hall is heated by steam generated in an invisible building at a security against accident. At present the walls are perfectly plain; but when they have become entirely dry they will be elegantly frescoed. The German Concert Troupe have already satisfactorily tested the acoustic properties of this new Hall; and Madame Anna Bishop, Brignoli, and other fine performers have seldom been more warmly received by the public than in the present series of concerts. It is said that the Philharmonic Rehearsals and Concerts will take place in the Steinway Hall.

Last week the corner-stone of a new Hebrew temple was laid on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifth Avenue. The congregation "Emanuel," who are to erect the building, have existed in this city twenty years from thirty to three hundred. This temple, which will cost about $600,000, promises to be a most architectural one. It will be built principally of Ohio and Newark stone, and will probably exhibit the characteristic features of several styles of architecture.

"Truth is stranger than fiction," is the old saying, receives confirmation in the following case, wherein whereby a lamp-trimmer in the United States navy comes into possession of $500,000 in gold, together with the title of Baron, and a Duchess for a wife. It seems that the individual in question, Edward Louis, Count Batthyanyi, many years ago left his native land his father having been executed for participating in the rebellion under Kossuth. Supposing that his father's possessions were confiscated, he and kept very little of the real position of his family, he obtained employment in a merchant's office in Boston, and at once about his high rank, but discharged his duties quietly and satisfactorily. Not long ago, however, a newspaper advertisement came to his hand "something to the advantage" of Edward Louis Batthyanyi, and he sequel was that he returned to Austria in real life, furnishing first-rate material for a novelist.

The following curious and comforting announcement appears in a London paper:

"Last evening a lady asked for epsom salts at a drug store in this city. An inexperienced clerk filled the order to be sure, but, unfortunately, he had some serious mistake of giving her cyanic acid instead of epsom salts. The lady took the poison, and returned to give this public notice, warning her that if she takes the cyanic acid she will surely die."

Very consoling this to the lady in question should, the chance to see if the cyanic acid would kill her, suggest child a dose of the above-mentioned salts! We suggest, however, that the "inexperienced clerk" who supposed he was filling the order correctly, ought to study chemistry a little longer, and perform experiments—especially upon himself if he chooses—before offering his services to the public.

Considering that the city railroad companies "don't pay their expenses," they very benevolently use up to extend their route across Broadway for the accommodation of the public! Truly they are self-sacrificing great-hearted men!

Some very sagacious prophecies have been made in regard to the year 1867. As they may not be found in all the almanacs, we will give a few for the benefit of our readers:

The year 1867 will be a very eventful one to every mother who gets twins. Throughout the whole course of the year, whenever the moon wanes, the baby will grow fat. Whenever it is in love it will cry; will think his sweet-heart an angel. Whoever gets married will find each other out is true. If a young lady happens to think she will look red in the face. In the dreams of a young man he will see his sweetheart, it is a sign of something. If any body jumps overboard during the month of June they will be sure one he gets drowned. If any one lends an umbrella, it is best to one to be returned. Any one will feel pain his pains.

A writer from Paris speaks of meeting a Parisian gentleman to whom misfortune has given a curious celebrity. Sometime since a cancer in his tongue rendered its amputation necessary. This operation was performed by the surgeon of the Hotel Dieu, who shortly afterward replaced the diseased organ by an artificial one. Although he can not speak, he tastes, swallows, and smokes his pipe with apparent enjoyment. After eating a hearty dinner, he leaves the table out a set of false teeth—to clean it; and between his repasts he generally finds it more convenient to carry it in his pocket.

According to what is supposed to be an accurate calculation of the salaries paid to preachers in this country, and of the number of sermons preached, the average price paid for sermons, taking the land through-out, is said to be eleven cents each. It would probably be desirable to believe that there is some grand mistake either in the data or in the estimate which produces such a conclusion.

Not long since Lady Harriet Sinclair published in London a cookery book called "Dainty Dishes," which attracted considerable attention. It is reported that shortly after the publication of this work, and as a result of it, she received a number of proposals of marriage. She made a "judicious selection," so the story goes, and a wedding followed. It may be expected, now, that all young ladies, English and American, will immediately commence collecting recipes, as the foundation of a work of "Dainty Dishes"—whereby they may win a name.

The following experience of a humorous traveler, who attempted to get a dinner at Xenia, on the Little Miami Railroad, is worth reading by those who have had a similar experience, without a like good-humor, as well as by all who enjoy a good laugh:

"Twenty minutes for dinner!" shouted the brakeman as we approached Xenia.

"Arrived there, I entered the dining-room and inquired of a waiter:

"'What do you have for dinner?'

"'Twenty minutes,' was the hurried reply.

"I told him I would try half a dozen minutes, raw, on the half-shell, just to see how they went. Told him to make a mistake of it on his books. He scratched his head trying to comprehend the order, but finally gave it up and waited upon some one else.

"I approached a man who stood near the door with a roll of money in his hand.

"'What do you have for dinner?'

"'Half a dollar,' says he.

"I told him that I would take half a dollar well done. I asked him if he couldn't send me, in addition, a boiled pocket-book stuffed with greenbacks, and some seven-thirties garnished with postage stamps and ten cent scrip. Also a Confederate bond, done brown, with bottom notes to be sliced. I would like to wash my dinner down with National Bank Notes, on 'draft.'

"He said they were out of every thing but the bank-notes, and he then ordered a waiter to go to the bank and serve them.

The following beautiful bit of poetry, entitled "My Good-for-Nothing," is evidently written by a mother, or by one who has all the loving feelings of a mother:

What are you good for, my brave little man,
Into all this pleasure for me if you can—
You, with your fingers as white as a sun,
You, with your eyes as bright as the sun.
All the day long with your busy contriving,
Into all things and for you are defying:
See if your wise little noddle can tell
What you are good for, and show or tell well.

Over the carpet the dear little feet
Come with a pattering to climb on my seat;
Two merry eyes, full of frolic and glee,
Under their lashes are looking up into me;
Two little hands, pressing soft on my face,
Have got into service by a loving embrace;
Two rosy lips gave the answer so true—
"Good for you, mother, good for love you!"

Poets, authors, and literary men in general, have frequently been afflicted with dreadfully practical and unpoetical wives. Shakespeare could never inspire Lucette with a lyrical enthusiasm of love, in which she could forget heaven and earth, and every thing else. She could count the strokes of the clock between his kisses, and could listen and run off to the sauce-pan that was boiling over, with all the big tears in her eyes which he had pressed out of her melting heart by a touching story or a sermon. She accompanied in the devotion that Petrarch bore which crowded lonely from the neighboring apartments, and in the midst of a verse she would interweave the prosaic question, "What shall I warm up for supper?" And he could never banish from his remembrance that once, when she seemed quite touched, and appeared listening intently to his cabinet discussion upon death and eternity, she looked at him thoughtfully, but turned his feet, and at length said, "Don't put on the left stocking tomorrow, I must darn it."

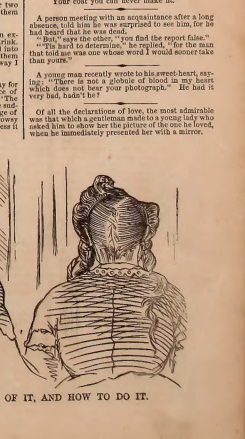
A rather comical story is told in connection with the early appearance of Dr. Bethune, as officiating clergyman in a church then located not far from the city of Hudson. The edifice was placed in the centre of a large park, and it being summer time, the open doors made the gentle side carpet appear like a continuation of the grassy lawn outside. At least so the matter appeared to a half-dozen geese, who quietly walked into the church just as the preacher was closing a splendid passage of eloquence, and was quoting the lines:

"Who are those arrayed in white?" etc.

A green, half-grown country boy, who supposed the quotation so eagerly propounded required answer, at once replied, in a bashful lisp: "Them—them there's geese!" The wings of the young minister were thus abruptly clipped while he was a-flight, and the ones "arrayed in white" were the only dignified individuals in the assembly.

Books seem to be scarce at the South. Some one living in Florida advertises for sale, for the reasonable sum of $1000, four published volumes of a work once owned by Cotton Mather. However, as Cotton Mather's none is written in one of them, it doubtless will be a valued relic to somebody.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.



SCIENTIFIC JOTTING.—M. Toutmouchi has addressed a memoir to the Academy of Sciences representing that indigestion proceeds from dyspepsy is calculated to result in ossification of the heart.

Why should tectotalers never hold their meetings at a theatre?—Because there ought not to be a drop-seen at them.

FOOD THOUGHT.—It seems an impossibility for two silly lovers ever to agree, seeing that between them they can not see a single something.

A man was recently arrested in Paris for an extraordinary freak while under the influence of drink. In passing before a dealer's, he suddenly jumped into a basket containing 100 eggs, and after smashing them to his heart's content, called out, "That is the way I make an omelette, now bring me a frying-pan!"

THE REV. MR. A——— was more eminent in his day for the brilliancy of his imagination than the force of his logic. At one time he was preaching on "The Ministration of Angels," and in the peroration he suddenly observed, "I hear a whisper!" The change of tone startled the person, who had been from a drowsy mood, and springing to his feet he spoke: "I guess it is the boys in the gallery."

PHILOSOPHY.

Alas! slack! and welladay!
How short my cash is running,
And I can not make my way
By poetry and punning.
But poverty is not a crime,
And I am young and clever.
This kind of thing will end in time—
It sent'y go on forever.

My health is in a pretty state!—
I'm something of a dyspeptic.
Regarding the decrees of Fate
My views are quite static. I'm a sceptic),
But who may alter by-and-by.
I shall be Christian? No, never.
I must in time get well or die:
It can't go on forever.

I love—and I must bear the woe
To which my folly drives me.
She knows, but will not own to know,
The passion that consumes me.
My heart is fettered in a chain
Impossible to sever.
'Twill break or struggle free again,
It sent'y go on forever.

The greatest gluttons are those who feed upon slander.

A coarse, ill-natured fellow died one day, and his friends assembled at his funeral, but no one had a good word to say about the deceased. Even at the grave all were silent. At length a good-hearted German, as he turned to go home, said, "Vell, he was a goot schtoker."

A certain duchess, a very handsome woman, was once walking through the streets of London, when a costermonger, whose pipe had gone out, walked up to her, and politely said, "I say, Miss, Madam, let me light my pipe at your eye." She declared this to be the greatest compliment which she had ever had paid to her.

REASON FOR THICK ANKLES.

"HENRY, I can not think," says DICK.
"What makes my ankles grow so thick."
"You do not recollect," says HARRY,
"How often I calf they have sixty."

A STRANGE TRADE.—A young fellow was lately taken before a Paris magistrate as a vagabond. "You have no occupation?" said the Bench, inquiringly. "Beg your Worship's pardon," was the rejoinder: "I deal in bits of hair for the use of gentlemen as plays." A bit of rope with which a man has been hanged, carried in his pocket, is held to secure luck at cards.

Old Ewes, the miser, having listened to a very elegant discourse on charity, remarked: "That sermon is strongly in favor the necessity of alms-giving that—I've almost a mind to beg."

WOMAN'S LOVE IN A LIGHT AND DARK ASPECT.—"Our idea is," says a fellow that had got a shrew for a wife, "that

"Woman's love is like Scotch snuff
We get one inch, and it's enough."

An old darkey says—

"I'd wenah be in India rubber—
It stretch de more de more you lub her."

Prentice, in a wicked humor at the very underpaining of society, says, "Tilting hoops enable the common people to see a great deal more of good society than they ever saw before."

"Well, Dick," said a doctor to a pollie man whose wife he had been attending, "how is your wife?" "She is dead, I thank you."

THE GREAT UNPAID.—The Medical Department.

How do you arrive at the height of a church steeple on a hot day?—Perspire.

The art of book-keeping taught in one short and easy lesson—Don't keep books.

NOT POSSIBLE TO PLEASE.

A FABLE.

Said the Moon to Dame Earth, This one day
(So is fable, at least, we are told),
"I want a new frock, mother dear;
Let the old one be changed to gold."

"How can I, my child, grant your wish,
Your figure so awkward is found?
Now a belt, now ungain with a hump,
Now crescent, upside down, round!"

Many persons resemble the Moon
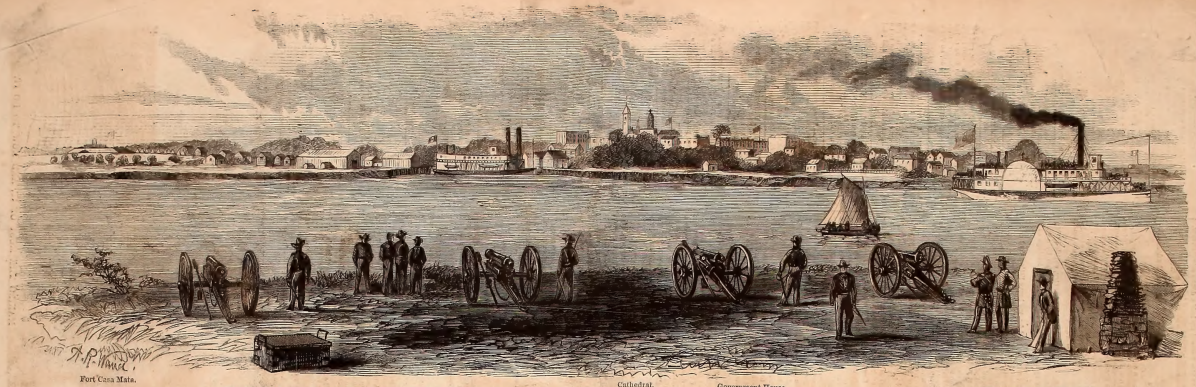
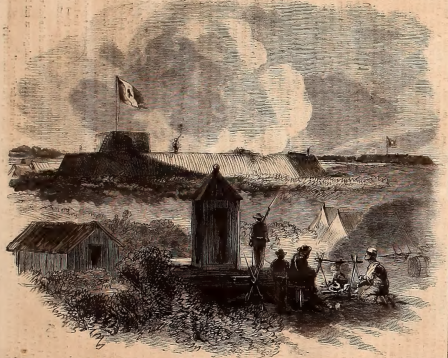
In judgment, taste, temper, or will Cut your cloth in what fashion you please,
Your cost you can never make fit.



A person meeting with an acquaintance after a long absence, told him he was surprised to see him, as he had heard that he was dead.

"But," said the other, "you find the report false."



"To hard to determine," he replied, "for the man that told me was one whose word I would sooner take than yours."

A young man recently wrote to his sweet-heart, saying: "There is not a globule of blood in my heart which does not bear your photograph." He had it very bad, hadn't he?

Of all the declarations of love, the most admirable was that which a gentleman made to a young lady who had taken a position for the picture of the one he loved, when he immediately presented her with a mirror.

BRAZIL AND THE BRAZILIANS.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
110 Washington Street, Boston,
PUBLISH THIS DAY:
A New and Enlarged Edition (6th Sixth) of Brazil and the Brazilians.
By Rev. J. C. FLETCHER and Rev. D. P. KIDDER.
With 100 Illustrations.
8vo, Cloth, $4 50.

The present edition has been prepared to supply a want felt by the public in England and America. Since the previous editions one of the authors (Mr. Fletcher) has visited Brazil four times, and has traversed extensively that portion of the country on the Amazon, and up that noble river to the borders of Peru.

By additions, by notes, and by appendices, an equivalent to a hundred pages of new matter has been added. Information has been brought down to date. It is believed that this volume will be the only comprehensive work on Brazil extant, containing the history of its country; sketches of Imperial Prince and of the living Statesmen; descriptions of six different modes of travel in the interior; notices of the great commercial statistics, and much information for those desiring to emigrate to Brazil. It contains maps, and 150 illustrations on steel, stone, and wood.

Sent by mail, postage free, for postage, on receipt of the advertised price.

An Autumn Suggestion.

Now, as heavy fogs arise and searching winds commence to blow; now, as the humus body, exhausted like inanimate nature by the heats of summer, begins to sit and shiver, and the whole physical system makes its trying count; NOW is the time for a preparatory course of the best acclimating medicine in existence,

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Fever and Ague is rampant in all parts of the country. Persons who have resided during the fever-and-ague District" should be exempted from the disorder for any particular time, provided every inhabitant would take the Stomach Bitters as a preventive during the term of the contract. There has never been an instance known of a confirmed dyspeptic whose horrible medicine has failed to ward off the complaint, when taken duly as a protection against malaria. Himalayas of physicians have endorsed and the official assertion, and now prescribe this harmless vegetable tonic, and nothing else, for debility and nervous fear all the forms of chills and fever. Vigor is the thing most needful to these cases as well as in dyspepsia and nervous affections, and HOSTETTER'S BITTERS are the safest, surest, and most wholesome strengthening preparation that medicine has yet produced.

The Great American Tea Company.

Always a Wholesale Establishment.

We have many inquiries (10 to 20 letters a day) asking what discount we make to the Trade from our prices as published in the Price List. These are our lowest wholesale prices. We consider ourselves only a Wholesale Corporation, and have no less than one price.

The way in which we came to break packages at all was, that during the high prices of Teas we furnished parties with packages as small as five pounds. Our name spread far and wide, and parties with small means thought it very hard to be compelled to pay, somewhere, about a dollar per pound more than we were selling the same goods for, simply because they could not afford to buy five pounds at a time. Therefore, in order to lighten these burdens, we consented to supply small quantities at exactly one dollar per pound at the wholesale prices.

Parties in small towns combining for goods to sell can have their orders put up in small packages to suit their trade, but we can not make any reduction in price, as our profits for the last six years have not averaged more than 5 per cent.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the foreign factors.

1st. The American House in China or Japan makes their sales of teas or silks—generally—on account of the utmost returned merchants in the country have made such sales, and sent through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

3d. The Importer sells at a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

4th. The jobber has a profit of 10 to 20 per cent., and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at a profit of 10 per cent. and upward.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 25 per cent.

8th. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE MONEY HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these eight profits as many Commissions, Storages, Cartages, Insurances, and Waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing by our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—we, in fact, do not supply you at all.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as they are sold to dealers in New York, as the list of prices will show.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

THE PRESENT NUMBER closes the TWENTY-THIRD VOLUME of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The Conductors believe that its variety and elegance have been exceeded by no previous Volume, and their arrangements ensure that its interest and value will be fully maintained in the ensuing Volume.

In the Number for December will be commenced a "THE VIRGINIANS OF TEXAS," a Tale by George F. HARRINGTON, Author of "Inside: A Chronicle of Secession." This story is already in part before the breaking out of the late Civil War, but its issue was postponed in consequence of the events of the time. The Author, in the form of Henry of Texas, describes the life and adventures of a Virginian Planter, who, with his family, emigrated to the "New Dominion." A notable is of peculiar interest at the present time, setting forth what Texas was before the war; what it would now have been but for the war: and what it may yet become notwithstanding the war, when liberty is secured, law maintained, and industry restored under the Union.

GENERAL SHERMAN will continue his "Personal Recollections of the War;" and various departments of the Magazine, whether furnished by the Editors or by Contributors, will be maintained in such a manner as to secure a continuance of the favor which the Magazine has received for almost Seventeen Years.

Terms for Harper's Magazine and Weekly, 1867.

MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year..... $4 00
WEEKLY. One Copy for One Year..... 4 00

An extra copy of either the Weekly or the Magazine will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance, or Six Copies for $20 00.

Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for six months, are published in June and December. They are sent, postage paid, by mail, or express, free of expense, at $2 50 per Volume. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each Volume containing the Numbers for one year, will be furnished for $2 00, freight paid.

A Title Page and Table of Contents is now to be sent to a year, and on the Weekly to be sent every twenty quarterly, semi-yearly, or yearly, as the case may be received.

☞ Subscriptions from the British Provinces of North America must be accompanied by 24 cents additional for the Magazine, and 20 cents for the Weekly, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine and Weekly will find on the wrapper-label of each number with which their subscription expires, as entered on our books. In renewing a subscription, it is desired that the exact form in which it is to commence should be stated. The name of the Subscriber, with the Number, Street, (or Avenue), and State, should be distinctly written. Thus—" Renew my subscription to HARPER'S WEEKLY commencing with Number ——, John Adams, Jackson, Pike County, Ohio."

In changing the direction, the old, as well as the new address must be given. Persons desiring the address of Magazine or Weekly from John Adams, Jackson, Pike County, Ohio, to Mary Adams, Franklin, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania."

The Magazine and Weekly are always stopped when the term for which they were paid expires, as necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the Numbers for June and DECEMBER of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Back Numbers of both Magazine and Weekly can always be supplied.

In remitting by mail, a POST-OFFICE ORDER, or a DRAFT upon New York, payable to the order of Harper & Brothers, is preferable to bank notes, as, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be replaced without loss to the sender.

☞ Those who wish to renew subscriptions, or to commence with the current Volume, are requested to notify the Publishers at once, to order that the Subscription-Book may be printed accordingly.

REMEMBER THE LITTLE ONES;

THE DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN OF OUR

COUNTRY'S DEFENDERS.

GRAND CHARITABLE FAIR AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL

IN AID OF THE

HOME AND SCHOOL

FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF

The Destitute Children

OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THIS HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1862 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union: its sphere of usefulness is constantly increasing; the children now numbering over 150; and daily and hourly the request for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied, solely for want of room to accommodate them. The old and unsuitable building (on Fifty-eighth Street, New York), now occupied, must be removed for the erection of such a Home as the cause demands; and this call is made upon the public with a firm belief that the Patriotism and Generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the Little Ones, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, which shall stand in the cause of humanity as a fitting rebuke to the trite assertion that "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" established to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

Mrs. GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT, President.	MRS. HERVEY G. LAW, Manager.
MRS. GEN. P. DALY, Acting President.	MRS. J. J. VAN DALSEM, Manager.
MRS. MAJOR-GEN. J. C. FREMONT, 1st Vice-President.	MRS. W. GLEASON.
MRS. ROBERT FORSTER, 2d Vice-President.	MRS. JAMES GILLIES.
MRS. JOHN S. YOUNGER, Treasurer.	MRS. C. MALLES.
MRS. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.	MRS. WM. MALLES.
MRS. WM. S. HILLYER, Corresponding Secretary.	MRS. HENRY BAYER.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

The undersigned desiring to express our sympathy and unite our efforts with the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, located in the City of New York, do most cheerfully co-operate with the Ladies composing the Officers and Managers of that Institution as a Supervisory Committee in their approaching "FAIR AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL."

Major-General VAN VLIET.	Brevet Brigadier-General JAMES F. HALL.
Major-General P. H. BARLOW.	Judge Chas. P. Daly, Ch'n of Committee.
Brigadier-General JOHN COCHRANE.	Jno. H. WHITE.
Brigadier-General WILLIAM HALL.	G. P. R. HOYT.
Brigadier-General RUSH C. HAWKINS.	J. H. FULLERTON.

The following card will be fully appreciated by the public, as it receives the thanks of the Institution:

"To the Managers and Directors of the Festival:—Sympathizing with your object, I take pleasure in tendering you, gratuitously, my professional services on the occasion of your Festival.
THEODORE THOMAS."

The Fair will open on the 10th of December, and continue two weeks, at the PUBLIC HALL, corner of Broadway and Twenty-third Street, New York. To be conducted by the

FROM OUR "CORRESPONDENT ON THE WING."

"DON'T SPEAK TO THE MAN AT THE WHEEL."

ALBANY, NEW YORK, 5 HOURS BELOW TROY.

Dear Harper's Weekly:

I hasten to give you a piece of important Marine Intelligence—in fact, from the Manual look this week we might call it Ultra-Marine. We had a heavy storm up here on Tuesday the 6th inst., which extended with great violence throughout the region of the Lakes and Massachusetts, and resulted in the total loss of the new Copper-fastened Craft the Policy. The storm had a very damaging effect on all the Craft that were caught out in it. Heavy blowing was observable from all points of the compass several days before the storm, and clouds seemed to be gathering on the horizon. On the morning of Tuesday the sun rose as bright as usual, but before noon it was evident up here that the Windy My Policy, Captain A. Jones, would have to go under. The gungs were worked vigorously all day long, under the supervision of First-Mate Randall. The bilge was attempted to be kept clear by Hopkins and the other deck-hands; but, notwithstanding their most vigorous efforts, the waves so overwhelmed them as to continually keep them under water; and before 4 o'clock that night the craft went down, carrying nearly the whole of her crew with her. There was no Wreck-Election of any thing like it by the oldest Inhabitant.

The My Policy was very badly rigged, and ranked 2 1, and was copper-fastened throughout. She was condemned as unseaworthy by the Government inspectors in the first part of last summer, and should have been laid up then; but her Captain insisted upon running her, notwithstanding her leaking badly on every trip she made; and came near foundering in her trip to Chicago and back last September. She would have done so had it not been for the efforts of Seward and Grant, the Carpenter and Caulker, who threw overboard every thing in order to lighten her and keep her leak above water. She had spring run against the old Tug Public Opinion, and got such a shock between wind and water that it took careful trimming of the vessel, when under sail, to keep her afloat. In fact, the carpenter had been kept to work day and night upon her ever since the accident, and he believed she never could be made much of a success with all the repairing he could put upon her. Although a comparatively new vessel, her main timbers were very rotten, and she had sunk lines, consequently it was impossible for her to carry the sail the Captain originally insisted upon crowding upon her.

The My Policy was launched at Washington, D. C., last April, and has had a very stormy time of it ever since. At the laying of the keel, in March, '65, the Secretary of the Navy was not invited to be present, the Captain not remembering his name. An incident that happened at her launching seemed to be a forerunner of misfortune to the craft. As they were knocking away the scaffolding around her President's Bill was killed outright, and several of his co-laborers were severely wounded.

The Captain has made several trips, but none of them have proved profitable to him; besides the accidents referred to, he has on a little pleasure-excursion with a party of the Captain's friends on the 22d of February, the one caught in a bloo, which carried away her figure-head (a "duck"), also her fore-stay and mainmast. This accident happened by the party being a little jolly, and a Philadelphia gal, by the name of Tom Florence being at the wheel, whose experience in navigating so large a craft was very limited. They afterward repaired the craft as well as they could, throwing the "duck" overboard, and getting the carpenter to rig up a jury-mast, the invention of a Mrs. Secretary, she has sailed ever since with that imperfect rig. She was always "by-the-wind," as the sailors have it, and steered very "side," paying but little attention to her helm during a blow. The Captain did better laying on Port than when under way. Her model was entirely original, with too much of the "rake" about her; and experienced nautical men, who sailed in the Ship of State, always predicted that, whatever she might do in fair weather, she would never live in a storm, and the "first Tuesday in November" storm was looked for by many as resulting in the total wreck of the craft, unless the Captain would discharge his crew and dismantle the ship. Perhaps no craft that was ever built was ever run by any man against such overwhelming testimony as to its utter unworthiness. And although well provisioned, and manned by picked men, and experienced ones, such as Randall, first-mate; Dewan, carpenter; Stanberry, rigger; Rayboon, sail-maker; Welles, captain of the fore-top, and others before the mast, she went down in spite of the best management, from the sole cause that she was rotten and unworthy.

The underwriters, I understand, had not made out his policy at the time she went down; consequently she is a total loss, which fails me mostly upon the Captain, who was her principal owner.

Below I give a view of

THE PRESENT APPEARANCE OF THE "MY POLICY," which I sketched from nature.

YOUR OWN "CORRESPONDENT ON-THE-WING."

P.S.—I hear that Mr. Charles Reade, the author, has commenced a lawsuit against some New York editors who have spoken of his late work in no complimentary terms. Some say the suit is to advertise his books, but my opinion is that he considers a "Good Fight" he will not only get rid of a large edition of of his "Griffith Gaunt" but also of his "Art of Fiction." This may account for the "milk in the cocoa-nut." Speaking of milk, no more from your own

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1866.

☞ In this Number of the Weekly the publication of Miss Braddon's new novel of "Birds of Prey" is begun. The author of "Lady Audley's Secret" is one of the most popular of living writers, and there is no question that this story will fully maintain her popularity. It is a tale of English life of to-day, beginning briskly in London, and very soon suggestive of some of the darker mysteries of the great metropolis: and we advise our readers to begin with the beginning.

THE POPULAR WILL.

IF the President is still of the opinion which Mr. Browning reports, that the people have not pronounced upon the Constitutional Amendment, he will never discover it. From Maine to Iowa and Missouri the one issue. Every Union orator showed by the record that the President's original theory of restoration upon which he acted was that upon which Congress insists today; that when he repudiated Johnson's principle he stigmatized his own action, deserted the party which elected him, and left himself in the hands of Copperheads and late rebels. That the conditions proposed by Congress were not only just in themselves, but were essential to complete those upon which the President insisted, and were necessary to the good faith of the Union; that to stop where the President stopped, and to approve the extraordinary doctrines which he announced, would be to make every man here who died in battle a fool for his pains; to reduce the war to a ridiculous trial of strength; to imperil the debt; to break faith with the freedmen; to leave the rebellion unbroken, and to invite self-contempt and the derision of mankind.

This was the ground upon which the Union campaign was fought, and a more intelligent, sober, and vigorous political contest was never known. The result justifies the faith of all who sincerely believe in free institutions, because it is precisely upon such points of practical political wisdom that confusion of the public mind is to be expected. The Union line pierces itself unbroken from the Potomac to the Mississippi. Congress is fully sustained, and the President's policy has been solemnly rebuked.

We confess that our delight in the result is not partisan triumph; for the Union party is not so much a party as it is the great body of the loyal and intelligent people who together to plant the Union upon the corner-stone of justice, which is the only sure and permanent foundation of national peace. The result reveals us to ourselves. It shows that the people have the patience, the tenacity, the insight, and the quiet courage which are essential to the wise consideration of the problem of the country. Those who are inclined to consider the people of the country at large like the mob of a city, and to suppose that, like the mob, they can be driven hither and thither by venturous leaders—that they must necessarily be hasty and impatient and rash, and plunge wildly in a great crisis like a struggling crowd in the rough of the sea—forget entirely that the antecedents and the conditions of this country make us different from any other modern nation.

Such an expectation might, indeed, be verified in the city of New York, where the population is largely composed of the most ignorant foreigners, placed in the hands of demagogues. But the population of the country at large is of British descent; its traditions are of local self-government; its temperament is not Celtic; our extent of territory invites easy expansion and ready support; the school and the church divide the days between them; so general an intelligence is the result of popular self-restraint, were never known; and while these conditions remain the United States will constantly disappoint the expectations based upon the study of human nature under other circumstances. If the city of New York were a type or fair representative of the country, there is no civilized government that would not be preferable to the vice and ignorance in power which our government would present. Had the people of the American Colonies in 1776 been like those of this city in 1866 they would never have declared their independence; they would have kissed the foot of England, and would never have undertaken a popular government possible or desirable. So long as the sturdy, independent, and intelligent spirit of the old Colonies is paramount in the Union it is safe. Should that spirit be extinguished the Union, as the defense of liberty, would disappear.

It is precisely that spirit which has prevailed in the late elections. The last shot of the war was fired more than a year and a half ago. The military prostration of the rebellion was immediate and universal. For four years the national mind had been strained steadily to the single purpose of maintaining the Government and the Union. Men of various party antecedents had united in that work, and the sudden, clean end of the war, without raveling out into guerrilla fighting, seemed to announce an equally sudden dissolution of the War party. A reaction was expected the consequences of which might be disastrous to the country. The reaction, indeed, was confidently counted upon, and greatly explains the President's course.

Now, had the War party been merely such the reaction would inevitably have followed. With relaxed muscles the warriors would have idly watched the politicians reversing the victory. But the so-called Union party was and is really the people who intelligently waged the war, and with whose intelligence will settle its results. They have bought national security at a great price, and they know it. They will therefore preserve it. The elections are the plain advertisement of that intention. They say distinctly that it is not a President whose warmest adherents are those whose hands are still red with loyal blood; it is not a party which excused and fostered rebellion; it is not those who shrick at the heart of the Government because they had lost its control, who are to decide whether the seceded rebellious States may resume their relations in the Union; but the loyal people who have saved the Union, and they only, are now to secure it wisely and forever.

FINANCE IN CONGRESS.

WITHIN three weeks Congress will again be in session. Secretary McCulloch will be enabled to lay before it an uncommonly favorable exhibit of his operations for the past year, together with a clear and flattering statement of his prospects for the future. He will tell the country that his revenue exceeds his expenditures by one hundred millions a year, and that the public debt has been reduced by that sum since Congress last met. He will explain that the revenue, large as it is, may still further be increased by a judicious distribution of taxes, and that the public burdens may be reduced by the removal of onerous but unproductive imports. He will say that owing to the late war of Europe the price of gold is higher than it was last year, but he may add that it is declining, and should the legislation of Congress be conservative, there is some prospect that by January 1867 it may be no higher than it was in January 1866. He will remind Congress that by the act of last session his power to issue currency was restricted to about $10,000,000 in the six months next following the passage of the act; that curtailment he effected in the time specified, besides accelerating the volume of interest bearing legal tender, by purchase and funding, to about $145,000,000. He will say that he is succeeding as well as he could expect in placing long bonds for Seven-Thirty notes, and that should no change take place in the money market, he has every reason to believe that the entire first series will be converted on or before maturity, thus relieving the Government from its obligation to pay them off in currency. He will reiterate his argument of last year, that for a substantial reduction of the currency: but experience will probably have taught him, on the one hand, that no large curtailment can safely be attempted until the Seven-Thirties are out of the way; and, on the other, that it is not particularly useful to recommend contraction to the party which is led by Thaddeus Stevens and John Sherman.

For, whatever the Secretary may urge, and whatever sound conservative men may hope, it is pretty well understood that the reconstructionists' party in Congress will at this session not only persist in their opposition to all measures tending to an early resumption of specie payments, but will propose a demand for a further issue of National Bank currency. They very nearly succeeded at last session in passing an Act authorizing the increase of the National Currency from $500,000,000 to $400,000,000. At that time the total amount issued was only $300,000,000. By next month the total amount authorized by law will have been issued. They will now point to the active demand for money at the financial centres of the West, and to the want of capital at the South, and will demand of Congress a fresh issue of National Bank notes at least equal in amount to the volume of interest-bearing and plain legal tenders which is likely to be funded during the year. They will insist on this with the more confidence as the result of the late elections—which have turned on issues quite distinct from questions of finance—has demonstrated that the people are on their side.

It is thus at least premature to speculate on the probable tendency of the financial legislation of the next Congress. Were the great question of reconstruction out of the way it is pretty certain that the first wish of the people would be to bring down prices to a reasonable standard, and to secure a readjustment of our systems of taxation, direct and indirect. But for the present financial theories are overborne by political necessities, and the men who, in the opinion of the loyal North, are right on the subject of reconstruction are suffered to have their own way on the subjects of currency and taxation, upon which an overwhelming majority of the people believe them to be wrong. They are the more readily permitted to persevere in an erroneous policy from the fact that, notwithstanding the severity with which taxation and high prices press upon the people, all classes are for the present unusually prosperous. Owing to the vast amount of money afloat, and the unparalleled bank expansion, business of all kinds thrives, the demand for and reward of labor are good, and, notwithstanding that prices are actually on the average higher than they were when gold was 280, and it was a question whether the currency would ever be redeemed, nobody seems to suffer, or at least nobody complains aloud. In no single constituency in the North, at the recent elections, were the high prices made a leading issue.

Should the dominant party in Congress, relying upon this public apathy, persevere at the coming session in the policy enunciated by its leaders last year and authorize further issues of irredeemable paper-money, the consequences will be obvious. A further impetus will be given to speculation; prices of all kinds will rise still higher; the existing fallacious prosperity will be extended; every one will appear to be growing rich; and this will go on until some unforeseen accident precipitates a collapse, and the whole fabric of paper-money wealth topples to the ground. At such an event the first and chief sufferers will be the manufacturers, in whose interest it is now proposed to wind the currency and tie it up tight. But it is quite hopeless to try at the present time to convince them of the fact. Each of them acts upon the motto: "After me, the deluge!"

If there were the least chance that suggestions would command the attention of the paper-money fanatics, we would agree, as we respectfully urge them, in case they determine to still further adulterate the currency, to let the new issue be plain legal tenders and not National Bank notes. For the latter are but the mischiefs of the former with the additional injury that the institution which issues them no sooner realizes the benefits of life than it begins to discount paper and lend money, and that, in a year, its loans do more toward fostering speculation and inflating prices than all its irredeemable currency. As a war measure the latter considerations would be bad enough. But $100,000,000 of them would merely be an adulteration of the currency to the extent of 12½ per cent. Whereas in addition of $100,000,000 of National Bank notes would adulterate our currency to the same extent, and would constitute a basis for more than $500,000,000 of paper expansion, which would double the mischief. But there is little chance that the triumphant majority of Congress will heed any suggestions from those who differ in opinion.

SOUTHERN SENTIMENT.

It is often said, and it is always true, that when the rebellion ended the people who had been engaged in it, however unchanged their secret feeling, expected to submit to terms which should vessel the victorious loyal people the results of the war. Only those who have had opportunities of knowing the internal history of the South can fully appreciate how entire and universal this feeling was. And it was a perfectly just and natural feeling. The late rebels knew that had they succeeded they were quite in sufficient enough to have made terms which would have amply secured their success. And had the President, acting upon the principle which he had declared, and with civil government was at an end in those States and could not be safely reorganized by rebels alone, have summoned Conventions of all loyal people and of all who had rebelled, adopting such modifications as Congress might have chosen to impose, even to the insertion of impartial suffrage in the new Constitutions, there would have been exactly the same acquiescence as there was in what was done; and the men who knew that by the letter of the law their lives were forfeit and their property confiscated, and who congratulated themselves that their fate was no worse.

This feeling continued even after the appointment of Provisional Governors, because the President was careful to call it such, and he did experimental. On the 24th of June, 1865, he said to the South Carolina delegation that, "The provisional Governor will only take the initiatory steps to enable them to do the things which it was incumbent upon them to perform." But from the moment that he said, on the 11th of September, 1865, to a delegation from various Southern States, "But, gentlemen, if I know myself as I think I do, I know that I am of the Southern people," the whole spirit of the "acquiescing" people in the Southern States changed. They recognized their shibboleth, and they were not deceived. All that wise men in the loyal States could do was to strengthen public opinion without unnecessary schism with the President; to expect a division, indeed, and to be ready for it, but to make it proceed from him, and to watch every thing and use every opportunity that might render it less likely. It was inevitable, however, and the elections show how entirely the President has mistaken and misrepresented the loyal people.

When the quarrel between the President and Congress was notorious, the public sentiment of the late rebel section became positive and active. But when the President lifted the most odious rebels, like HUMPHREYS and MONROE, into the highest offices, and refused official positions to known Union men, that sentiment became definite, culminating at last in the New Orleans massacre. And now the Southern mind is morbid. Its chief and favored orators and newspapers are those that were most conspicuous in rebellion. It asserts the rights o "the South." It accuses "the North" of violating its own terms offered to "the South" as the conditions or surrender. Its hostility to Union men of every hue is such that the presence of United States troops is absolutely essential to their safety. It regarded the August Philadelphia Convention as the sign of its returning national ascendency. It prayed and believed that the President, with the Copperheads, would carry the elections. It anticipated some action of Congress which would cause it to be dispersed by the President, and then ardently expected to be summoned to the field and to revenge upon "the North" the sufferings and the humiliation of the late shameful rebellion.

This is the present state of the public sentiment at the South which eighteen months ago would have accepted impartial suffrage. How indefinitely and in a condition delays and perplexes the restoration of the Union every man can see; and for this situation the President is responsible. It is not to hope that when the late rebel population sees that the President stands alone, that he has really carried no more to the Democratic party than the World declared, and that the loyal people of the country stand as united and firm in peace as they did in war, they will gradually understand that a vast political and social revolution has taken place in this country.

But this is a truth which they can never understand so long as their only knowledge of the situation, and feeling of the country is gained from such papers as the New York Daily News, and Day Book, and other Copperhead journals. If, by some happy chance—which often, we are glad to know, occurs—our own paper should fall into the hands of some one at the South who thinks that the President is ready to lead a war of revenge upon "the North," we beg him to understand and to tell his neighbors that the Democratic party with the President have been disastrously defeated in every Northern State and that the only question, we have to-day in the beginning of the overthrow of the ignorance which is the most fatal foe of the South, and which is most sedulously fostered by such journals as we have named. Little will be really done in the South toward true pacification until perfect freedom of speech is not only protected but invited.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

THE people of this State have decided to hold a Convention to revise the Constitution. There are many good reasons for such a course, and we know of no good reason against it. There are two points especially of general interest, and perfectly understood by every citizen, which require change, and there are, of course, many more which the experience of twenty years will wisely adjust. The two of which we speak are the inequality of suffrage based upon color and the tenure of the Judiciary.

The present Constitution provides that every male citizen of twenty-one years shall be a voter who has been a citizen for ten days, who has been for one year next preceding the election an inhabitant of the State, and for the last four months a resident of the county in which he offers to vote. But if he chance to be a "man of color" he must have lived three years in the State, and for the year before the election must have had in unincumbered freehold estate of two hundred and fifty dollars, upon which he must have paid a tax; nor shall he be directly taxed unless he has such an estate.

This is one but the most stupid and ridiculous prejudice gravely enacted into law. The practical result is, that the most worthless, drunken, ignorant, idle foreigner who can not speak the language, and has no idea whatever of the principle and spirit of the Government, upon due naturalization may vote upon terms infinitely more favorable than are accorded to intelligent, industrious, thrifty, and useful native Americans. It is an enormity so preposterous that we do not believe there can be any serious opposition in the Convention to an absolutely impartial system of suffrage in the State. But forewarned is forearmed. Let all the friends of justice and public honor take care that there shall be no such opposition by sending delegates to the Convention who understand the first principle of popular government.

Experience has shown that the purity of the Courts is best preserved by making them independent of party and temporary considerations. Let the Judges be appointed as the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States are, upon the nomination of the Executive, and with the consent of the Senate.

The gravest question which will engage the Convention is doubtless that of equal qualified suffrage. Now that the immediate perils of the influence of slavery have passed, the danger with which we are threatened from the vast corruption of our politics will require exclusive and courageous attention. Whether these can be wisely reached by any restriction of the suffrage is by no means clear, but the point will be fully argued. There is undoubtedly a large party in this State, as in the country, which is doubtful of the advantage of universal suffrage, and which would qualify it in a way that would not exclude any considerable number of the people, while it would encourage and enforce the education which is essential to good government. But while there are risks and perils in every method, the simplest way is the safest way. If a man is born with a brain it is hard to show that he is not born also to the equal use of every means which are necessary to protect those rights.

Now that the Constitutional Convention is to be called there ought to be a general discussion and consideration of all these vital and fundamental questions, in which every citizen is profoundly interested, but which are by no means familiar to the public mind.

NEW YORK STATE AND NEW YORK CITY.

THE result of the election in New York shows more plainly than ever that our politics are a struggle between the city and the State. The solo hope of the Democratic party was to accumulate such a majority in the city—by such means as are families—as to overcome the vote of the rest of the State. In 1862 HORATIO SEYMOUR was elected Governor by the 30,000 majority he received in the city over the 20,000 majority which General WADSWORTH had in the State.

There are 60 counties in the State; of these Mr. HOFFMAN, the Democratic candidate, carried 14. But outside of cities of New York and Brooklyn, and the adjacent counties of Queens, Richmond, and Westchester, his majorities in those counties fell considerably scarcely 5000 in all. His majority in the city was more than 47,000; in Brooklyn more than 9000; in Queens, Richmond, and Westchester, about 4000. He had the support of the whole power of the Administration; he had an unprecedented profusion of money, given in the foul conviction of success; he had the active support of interest; he had the large vote of the foreigners who have been holding back during the war lest they should be drafted; he had the "Conservative Republicans" all over the State, Thurlow WEED, whatever that may mean; the fullest possible force of the whole Democratic Ring, in which counties city after city, and convention; the majority around the bay was carried up to 60,000, fully 10,000 more than two years ago; and yet Mr. FENTON'S whole majority was immediately increased.

If the Democratic vote were analyzed what would appear? This, among other things. There are about 250,000 Irish in the city of New York. About 35,000 of these are legal voters. Of these nine-tenths are profoundly ignorant. Add 15,000 votes more for the criminal and dangerous, which is the meaning of "a Veteran Observer," the peculiarly competent statistician and correspondent of the New York Times, and you have 50,000 votes. It is fair to assume that one-tenth of the Irish will ignore vote, and the whole of the other or vicious votes are cast for the Democratic party. Its citizen vote this year alone is 80,000. And this is the character of a very large part of the "Conservative" vote which elects Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, and Mr. WHITHOUSE CRANKER, and Mr. JOHN MORRISSEY, and Mr. JAMES BROOKS to Congress. Those who engineer these votes by means known to all men are distinctively "Conservatives." The result of such a majority could it overbear the vote of the State is hailed as a "Conservative" triumph; and the men elected to Congress by a vote so composed would gladly shake hands with Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON and call themselves the "Conservative" members of "What's your name, you drunken vagabond?" cried the unshaven Democrat to the sober Republican who was registering his vote. "My n-n-name?" thickly answered SHERIDAN, "w-w-why, it's WILLIAM WILBERFORCE."

TENNYSON AND GOVERNOR EYRE.

ALFRED TENNYSON has sent a subscription to the EYRE Defense Fund. In this moment, and yet it has he wishes to secure a fair trial for a man charged with an atrocious crime no one would be surprised. But as there is no question that Governor EYRE would have a fair trial, the act of TENNYSON must be interpreted as a sign of sympathy with his conduct. It seems simply incredible that any one who has read the Report of the Commission sent out from England to examine into the facts of the case should be able to come to any other conclusion than that EYRE's conduct was that of a coward or a brute. The Commission treat the whole matter as lightly as they can. But even they do not pretend to deny that there was unnecessary severity. That CARLYLE and RUSKIN, who sympathized with the bloody attempt of Slavery to overthrow our Government, should think it perfectly right that unresisting people should be shot down at random by a fierce soldiery, and women be whipped with wires for supposed complicity in a supposed plot, is not surprising; but that TENNYSON should enroll himself in such a melancholy band is something which will cause the deepest sorrow to thousands of generous hearts who have believed that his sympathy was sure for the most unfortunate race in history.

INFLUENCE OF CHANGES OF TEMPERATURE ON HEALTH.

IT is a very common idea that exposures to marked changes of temperature, especially from heat to cold, are of course injurious. It is therefore enjoined upon the bather, who has become heated in going to his bathing-place, to get cooled off before he plunges into the water, either by remaining out of doors for a while, or by a partial application of water at the outset. So also, Dr. RUSH directed, in order to avoid the evil effects of drinking cold water when the system is greatly heated, that the vessel of water should be grasped in both hands, and held for some time that the extreme heat may pass off gradually, and prevent the shock from the strong impression of cold upon the stomach and through that upon the system. But all this does not agree with certain practices in bathing current in some quarters. The Russians, for example, go directly from their hot baths, and plunge at once into cold water, or even roll in snow. Recent does it agree with the fact stated by Sir CHARLES BLAGDEN and others in regard to their famous experiments with the capacity of the system to bear great heat. They remained for some time naked in a room heated to even 60° above the boiling point of water, and with no material consequences in the transition from this to a room of the ordinary temperature, although they sometimes delayed putting on their clothing for several minutes. In the connection may be mentioned the fact, that often in cases of inflammation, where there is high fever, the skin being very hot, cold water is freely applied, sometimes even dashed on, not only with safety, but with decided benefit. The experiments and benefit in the case. And Captain SCORESBY says that in the Arctic regions he has often gone from the breakfast-room, where the temperature was 50° or 60° to the most-head, where it was only 10°, with no addition to his clothing but a cap, and yet "never received what could be with reason called inconvenience, from the sudden transition."

Yet we know that sometimes cold applied to a system thus heated has been subjected to high temperature produces disastrous results. Laborers who have been working a long time in the heat have sometimes even died from drinking freely of cold water. Life was once lost on a large scale from this cause. The army of ALEXANDER THE GREAT on coming to the River OXUS, after a march across a scorching desert, experienced a greater heat than in any other part of Asia.

We can find an explanation of the apparent contradiction of the facts that we have given in the known laws of the production and maintenance of animal heat. There is a continual generation of heat in the body by certain processes which we need not here describe, and under ordinary circumstances of external temperature it is maintained quite uniformly at about 98°. It is essential to health that the body be kept at or near this amount it, and that, too, to a considerable amount. For observe, that when the body is at rest a temperature of 65° is found favorable to ease—that is, to the heat generated in the system is with this temperature of the air given off to a sufficient degree to secure a comfortable feeling of ease. That the body parts with a great deal of heat in this case is obvious from the difference between the air's temperature and that of the animal heat, amounting to 33°. We know how uncomfortable we are when the thermometer stands at 98°. Here the air and the body being at the same point there can be no heat taken from the body by the air. But there is a natural consequence when heat is the system. How, then, is it prevented from being put into a high fever by a use of the animal heat far above 98°? Simply by the evaporation that occurs, this absorbing, or rendering latent (as it is expressed) a great amount of heat in changing from water into vapor. It is in this way that the great heat safeguard of Sir CHARLES BLAGDEN and his friends when they were in an atmosphere hotter than boiling water. It is in this way that the temperature of the air be lower than 65° either clothing must be sufficiently applied to prevent the heat from passing off too rapidly, or the body must excite a greater production of animal heat, or the two expedients may be united. And observe here that the readiness with which heat is produced, and therefore the depressing impression of cold resisted, must depend much on the vigor of the system.

It is this last point that furnishes the key to the explanation of the evil results of the sudden impression of cold upon the heated or the power to react—the impression will do no harm. In all cases where harm is done there is one cause which is not mentioned, and which is the most, and yet it is the grand cause of the result. It is the exhaustion of the vital powers by prolonged exertion. The laborer who has been working cool water has not merely been heated, but has been worn down by laboring hour after hour under the oppression and suffering of the heat, and he is in such a condition that cold water, either poured into the stomach or dashed upon the skin, must produce only a depressing effect; and it may be that to which the exhausted powers will succumb. The army of Alexander were exhausted by a continuous march of 46 miles over the scorching sands of a desert, when it came to the River OXUS. If the soldiers had had a march of but an hour or two, however heated they might be, the drinking and bathing would have destroyed none of them.

It is not in these cases the transition from high heat to cold that causes the result. Indeed, let the heat be cooled off, the skin becoming cool and perspiring instead of being very hot, and the result will come even more readily, for the bathing down of the heat induces a state of depression in place of the active energy, and the system is not as able to react and stand up against the impression of cold. For this reason the bather, heated by his walk, had better go at once into the water, for one coming out of a heated place of public resort should avoid getting cool before going out into the cold air; and should at once proceed home, washing light in order to increase the generation of heat in the system, or if he rides home he should be wrapped up very thoroughly. Any such distribution frustrates vital injury from the impression of cold in riding from from the hall or party with too little clothing; but let it be remembered that the chief injury is in fact inflicted by the exhaustion occasioned by keeping out such late hours in the midst of a whirl of unnatural excitement. The cold only enhances evil already done. Even if due care be exercised in attending against the cold the dissipation nevertheless inflicts its injury upon the vital powers and sows the seeds of disease.

We have a good example of the power of vigorous action in withstanding the depressing influence of cold, when the sportsman or traveler who has been forced to get wet through manages to keep up a proper generation or heat in the body by exercise until he reaches home, where dry clothing and warm air render the exercise no longer necessary.

NEW ARCTIC DISCOVERIES.

In addition to the encouraging reports previously communicated to us as to the probable success of Mr. HALL'S Second Arctic Expedition in search of the remains of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, we have more recent intelligence of a still more hopeful character. A part of the crew of the American barque Aldebaran, lost on Nantelik Island, October 6, have just arrived at St. Johns, New Brunswick. The officers of the Aldebaran report that Mr. HALL found a gold watch, some silver spoons, and other relics which mark, in all probability, have belonged to the men of FRANKLIN'S expedition. Mr. HALL had also learned that the remains of some of FRANKLIN'S men were lying under a boat in Committee Bay. The natives would not permit Mr. HALL to go on to examine them, but as several vessels will winter in Repulse Bay, it is hoped that he will secure assistance and push his way to where the remains are located.

HARPER & BROTHERS have just issued a new edition of Mr. HALLE'S "ARCTIC EXPLORATIONS," the best book ever published in relation to the Arctic region, and made doubly interesting by the prospect of the author's ultimate success.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ELECTIONS.

On the 6th instant elections were held in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware. In all of these States except Maryland and Missouri the result was an overwhelming majority for the Republican party. Although in New York city there was a falling off, the majority over 40,000, the Republican majority for the whole State was over 10,000. In Illinois the Republican majority generally amounts to about 60,000; in Iowa 40,000; in Michigan 25,000; in Wisconsin 20,000, in Minnesota 10,000, and in Kansas 20,000. Taking all the States in which elections have been held, the Republican majority amounts to over 250,000. In Massachusetts the Republican majority was nearly 70,000.

Governor Ward, of New Jersey, has appointed Hon. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen United States Senator, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. William L. Dayton. Mr. Frelinghuysen has held a high judiciary-General of the State for the last six years.

The trial of Mrs. Celestial Celestine Vaughn has resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff—Madame Jumel's husband—for the sum of one hundred dollars. A new trial was executed. The executors did not contest the suit, and it is supposed that a compromise was agreed to before the trial came on, by which Nelson Chase, the husband of the plaintiff, will receive less than the subsequents named in the will, the defendants relinquishing all claim to the property under their respective wills and testimony estate.

Governor Jenkins, of Georgia, in his Message to the Legislature of that State (assembled November 1), takes the ground against the Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment. Alexander H. Stephens has taken similar ground.

We illustrated in a recent number the lawbone of the Mammoth Cave, recently found at Cuba. Other parts of this animal have more recently been discovered in the Cave. The cranium, agreeing with that figured in the following item: The laborers at work in the "Big Bone Room" of the Mammoth Mine, Cohoes, have found bones of an animal at a distance of eighty feet below the surface. They consist of the two tusks, the back-bone, the upper jaw and cranium, a number of the ribs, the hip-bone, shoulder-blades, and bones of the rear limbs. The two tusks are nearly six feet in length, and are curved in the form of a circle, of which there were fourteen found, are about four feet in length, and are three inches apart for most part. The upper jawbone is four feet nine inches long from the forehead to the extremity of the nose, and across the forehead measures about three feet.

AN INDICTMENT.

Low-brow'd Woman, that stole my Love!
Fairer than I—less true:
You fooled him first with your wily tongue
And your eyes' deceitful blue.

You looked in his, till you made him swear
His first love was all a dream;
While you let him toy with your yellow hair,
And bask in your smile's false gleam.

Welladay for your eyes so bright!
Weeping has made mine dim:
You would smile on, though he lay in his grave—

ANNEXATION OF NASSAU TO PRUSSIA.

THE ceremony of proclaiming the annexation of the Duchy of Nassau to the Kingdom of Prussia was performed on Monday, October 8, in the Schiller-Platz, at Wiesbaden. The place has received that name since the SCHILLER centenary festival of November, 1860, when a linden-tree was planted there, with patriotic speeches and songs, to commemorate the birthday of the German poet. The Government offices occupy the buildings on one side of the square. Here, as shown in our illustration, a tribune was erected, covered with black and white cloth, for the ceremony of the annexation; it was surmounted by the flags of Prussia and Nassau, with the Prussian eagle. The soldiers of the Thirty-sixth Regiment formed a hollow square, in the centre of which the magistrates, the clergy, the schoolmasters, and other official persons were ranged before the tribune. The Landrath von DRIESP took his stand beneath the Prussian eagle and read the King's proclamation, after which the royal standard was hoisted on the roof of the Government offices, and saluted by the firing of 101 guns, and by strains of military music. A grand parade of the troops afterward took place in the Wilhelm-Strasse.

AN INDICTMENT.—"LOW-BROW'D WOMAN, THAT STOLE MY LOVE!"

MUSCAT, ARABIA.

WE have received, from a correspondent on board the United States steamer Shenandoah, a very interesting account of the conflict between the Imaum and his uncle, at Muscat, in September last, accompanied by a sketch of the city, which we have reproduced on page 741. The Shenandoah entered the Arabian Sea September 11, and the Gulf of Oman (on the western shore of which Muscat is situated) on the 14th, anchoring the next day in the Cove of Muscat. Captain J. R. GOLDSBOROUGH, commanding the vessel, was cordially received at the palace of the Imaum on the day after his arrival, and the usual courtesies were interchanged.

Muscat lies south of the Cove, in a hollow, under cliffs from 600 to 800 feet in height, debarred even from a view of the sea by the surrounding high rocks. Its wealth and importance are much greater than its appearance would indicate. The streets of the city are very narrow, so that a few palm leaves laid across between the eaves of the houses above completely screen them from the sun. We print the following narrative of our correspondent in full:

"A short time ago SULEM, the present Sultan—or Imaum, as he styles himself—succeeded to the throne by the death of his father. His uncle, whose name is TUQUITE, was at the time ruling a province on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and SULEM, fearing that he might lay claim to the throne, sent a message to him that the Sultan desired his presence in Muscat, which TUQUITE obeyed promptly, under the impression that the command came from his brother. He had scarcely arrived in the city when he was seized and imprisoned in Fort Jillali, by SULEM's order. Fortunately for his head he was released by the interference of the English, and carried to Bushehr, in Persia. The English had originated a report that SULEM succeeded to power by murdering his father, and on this plea they refused to recognize him as Sultan. SULEM indignantly denies the atrocious charge, and persists in the story that his father died in an apoplectic fit, which story is confirmed by his people, who are sincerely attached to him. He certainly has been indulgent and mild in his government, remitting heavy taxation where it fell upon the poor, and otherwise endeavoring to improve the condition of his subjects.

"Lately the English have, to all appearances, consented to believe his statements, for, on the 14th of September, the Civil Commissioner, Colonel PELLY, who was at Muscat in the steamer Berenice, of the Bombay marine, saluted the Sultan's flag, thereby recognizing him, and relieving his mind of the fear that the English would attempt to dethrone him in favor of his uncle. Colonel PELLY sailed from Muscat on the night of the 16th, the day of our arrival. The English had previous to this released his uncle from surveillance, and told him that he might go where he pleased; whereupon he immediately set to work to collect his adherents, and made sail in an armed dow for Muscat, with about 200 followers, arriving at the sea-face of Fort Jillali on the night of the 16th September.

"He landed, surprised the garrison, which was only six men, and made himself master of the best fortification in the vicinity. The Governor of the fort and his six soldiers were imprisoned, and the impression on shore was that he treacherously yielded, as, otherwise, the fort could not have been taken in the manner it was, without the discharge of a single musket. Claiming to be Sultan, TUQUITE hoisted the flag of Muscat (a plain, rectilineal, red flag), over each turret of Jillali, and opened his fire on the palace at daylight of the 17th, to the surprise and consternation of the entire city. Neither TUQUITE nor the Sultan have any guns of a heavier calibre than 24-pounders, and in Fort Jillali some of these are not even mounted; but the rebels have the advantage in having nearly all the powder, the Sultan having been foolish enough to store the principal part of his ammunition in Jillali, and leave it scarcely guarded.

"During the first excitement caused by the knowledge that the rebels were commanding the city, the Sultan sent his son on board this vessel for protection, but he left us again during the forenoon, after the feeling of insecurity had partially subsided. It did not appear to us that the Arabs were very vigorous in their measures to protect themselves.

"The Sultan sent his messengers in every direction to collect his soldiers and followers, and planted a battery in an open square in the city (hidden in my sketch by the point on which Fort Merani stands), with which he opened on the rebel fort with an accurate aim.

"Fort Merani also opened fire; and there were four vessels of war in the harbor wearing the Sultan's flag (three sloops and one brig), which might have brought their broadsides to bear on Jillali, but which lay as idle as ourselves. The Sultan sent his interpreter, ALI BEN ABDALLAH BEN CALVERT (who, by-the-way, was educated in Salem, Massachusetts), to request that we would open fire on Jillali and knock it down, which modest request our Captain declined to accede to.

"The Shenandoah had been largely visited by the Arab population on the 15th and 16th, and they had been in raptures over our 11-inch guns. Upon our declining to demolish the fort the Sultan sent us another request that we would be his dispatch-boat to the Persian Gulf, but that also was politely declined. By this time quite a force was collected around the standard of the Sultan, and for a while both Fort Merani and the battery kept up a brisk fire on Jillali, nearly every shot telling on the soft material of which the fort is built; and the fire was returned by Twaqem; but as Arab is constitutionally opposed to any thing like energy, and by noon the firing slackened to an occasional gun. I don't blame them for a lack of energy with the thermometer at 108° in the shade; but if Twaqem chose he could destroy the entire city, and it behooved them to work energetically.

"All the fortifications around Muscat are ancient, and more or less out of repair, having been built by the Portuguese when they held possession of the country. They are constructed of small stones (like cobbles) and mortar, and in some places the material is so soft that it is by no means difficult to break off large cakes of it with the hands alone. Of the whole, only Jillali and Merani are of any real value, and they would not stand many shells from an 11-inch gun. Sirch Gharbi is almost a complete ruin. The effect of the 15-pound shot was seen by us distinctly from our anchorage (about half a mile distant). The ball displaced more or less of the material and caused a cloud of dust, but did not penetrate. The Sultan has a good gunner, and his attention has been directed to one spot in the fort, with an eye to breaching it, that they may take it by assault. The Arab is, generally speaking, a good shot with the rifle, and if the fight could be brought to a musketo-hand conflict, where bullets and knives were the principal weapons, it would soon be decided; we should occupy the throne; but they do not understand the use of ordnance as well. During the night a brisk musketry fire was kept up, at intervals, between Jillali and the adjacent hills, but no ordnance was used.

"The next day (16th) the Sultan planted a section of a battery—two pieces—behind a barricade of bags of dates, in front of the Custom-house, which did very good execution. He also sent out of his sloops, mounting fourteen guns, and a dow, mounting two, to the rear of Jillali to cut off communication and supplies from the fort, and capture the dow in which Twaqem came, and which was lying at anchor under the protection of the guns of the fort. He sent Ali, the interpreter, to us with a third request, that we would sell him some powder—again declined. He has sent to the hill-tribes, of which the Bedouin tribe is the largest and most powerful, to secure their services; but he is unwilling to have them come until he is reduced to a strait, for although the Bedouins are kindly disposed toward him, they are so inordinately fond of plunder that they would, after seating him on the throne and pressating to him the head of his opponent, overrun the city and rob every body in it. They plunder indiscriminately both friends and foes. There are too many rich sheiks and merchants in Muscat to make a call for the Bedouin popular.

"It was evident to us that the Sultan could not understand our non-interference, and had interpreted the Captain-General's promise of friendship (those hapless phrases uttered in all such official visits) in the sense of an active friendship. The English are always so prompt to interfere in the private affairs of these poor nations in the East that our neutrality appeared strange and incomprehensible in his eyes. We would have been but only too glad to have assisted him, but the Captain's hands were tied, and there were no American interests to warrant our interference. All we could do was to carry a mail for him to Bombay, which we did, getting under way on the evening of the 18th. The ensuing up to the time of our leaving were anxious days. On every report, small, in the city the killed amounted to twelve, and in Small the report is, "Nobody hurt."

LAUNCH OF THE STEAMER "GREAT REPUBLIC."

THE following description of the launch, on November 8, of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's mammoth steamer Great Republic, illustrated on our first page, is given in the New York Herald:—

"The large and magnificent steamship Great Republic was successfully launched yesterday morning from the ship-yard of Hunter Sprague, situated at Greenpoint. About two thousand persons, ladies and gentlemen, including quite a large number of ladies, many of whom availed themselves of the opportunity and were lingering about the vessel's bows before ten o'clock the keel block was knocked from under the mighty mass, the settling down upon the smooth and slippery ways, she glided majestically into the water amidst the cheers and music of the assembled crowd. The Great Republic was built for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to run between San Francisco, California, and the commercial cities of China and Japan. Another steamer, the sister ship of the Great Republic, will be ready for current building in the city at the ship-yard of Webb & Bell. When all is finished she will exceed seven complete tons, and is to be placed upon the same line.

"It is expected that the Great Republic will be ready for sea early in the spring, when it is contemplated to place her which will be the finest line to run regularly between San Francisco, Kanagawa, Japan, and Hong Kong, China, about the first of next year. On her present voyage, from the time of leaving the port of San Francisco until reaching it, she came, averaging nine and two months. The vessel is constructed of the best materials, and will be one of the very largest as well as best fitted up vessels with all the modern improvements, and will be, when ready for sea, over a million of dollars. She is divided into four water-tight compartments and may be towed with two of them missing discreetly throughout the entire length of the vessel. The Great Republic is the largest wooden merchant steamship ever built in the United States, and probably the largest in the world. Her dimensions are as follow: Length between perpendiculars at load line, 360 feet; breadth moulded, 53 feet; breadth extreme, including outer planking, 80 feet; depth of hold to top of spar deck beams, eighteen feet. She will draft 25 feet 6 inches full decks and an orlop deck at each end, extending to load line. Her engine is unknown as yet, but form in lower hold to receive cargo and coal. The floors are made up of white oak and hackmatack timber.

"The machinery is building at the Novelty Iron Works, and will be of the following dimensions: A beam engine of the back-acting diameter of cylinder and 14 feet stroke of piston, to be fitted with balanced poppet valves and Allen's adjustable cut-off. A surface condenser with compressed wood packings for the tube joints and supplied with condensing water by an independent rotary pump, driven by a pair of inverted direct acting engines, which will remove air-pumps and cranks. The feed pump will be arranged so that each will have its own supply from sink and discharge overboard by a separate tube to boilers. The horizontal tubular boilers will be placed forward of engines, and will be fitted with the adjustments concerning into one smoke-pipe. The steam pressure will be 25 pounds under ordinary use. She will be fitted with all the necessary valves and connections."

GENERAL SHERMAN'S MISSION.

ON Saturday afternoon, at half past three o'clock, Lieutenant-General W. T. SHERMAN and the Hon. LEWIS D. CAMPBELL, Minister to Mexico, embarked on board the United States steam-frigate Susquehanna, bound for Mexico.

This event is of great interest, and will have an important bearing upon our relations with Mexico. What the exact object is we have not time to state to-day. We understand that our Mexican relations are to be a promising topic in President JOHNSON'S next Message. Our illustration on page 741 represents the reception of the Lieutenant-General on board the Susquehanna by Commodore ALDEN.

PRIVATE LIFE OF PIUS THE NINTH.

THE solution of the Italian question is so closely connected with the life of the present Pope that the general interest in every thing concerning him is greatly increased. The private life of any man can be more simple, regular, and unostentatious than that of Pius the Ninth. He rises at the peep of day, often in winter while it is yet dark; and as even o'clock, after he has gone through a portion of his breviary, repairs to the small chapel adjoining his bedchamber, in order to read mass. When this service is finished he breakfasts, during which meal he causes the papers of the day to be read to him, or converses with Cardinal Merode, who is always about his person. Soon after this Cardinal Antonelli, who inhabits a part of the upper rooms of the Vatican, makes his appearance, in order to bring in his reports concerning the affairs of the internal government and of foreign politics, or receives o'clock commence the audiences. The Pope, in his long linen vestment, betakes himself to a small saloon, at the further end of which is a raised throne, covered by a canopy and furnished with a velvet arm-chair, richly trimmed with gold, and raised a foot above the floor. Near this chair, in which he seats himself, is a writing-table, covered with memorials and petitions from every quarter of the globe, awaiting the Papal decision. Among the short pauses which take place between the single audiences he puts his name to these documents, as one of the last duties present make their contents known to him.

The affability of the Popes at these levées, in spite of the strictness of etiquette, has become a proverb. Pius the Ninth possesses it in a high degree. Persons are admitted singly, or by twos and threes, kneel once at the door, again in the middle of the room, and once more directly in front of the throne, where they exclaim his feet to those who desire to kiss the golden cross embroidered on his slipper, and where they remain in the same posture until a sign is given them to rise. The ladies are immediately relieved, and the Pope addresses some kind words to each in his native tongue, Italian, French, or Spanish, as the case may be. Germans and the English, however, must have an interpreter, as he is unacquainted with either of those languages. The lower orders of the clergy are suffered to kneel for some minutes, and oftentimes have no sign given to them. Bishops and cardinals, on the contrary, after they have performed the prescribed ceremonies, are allowed to kneel the Pope's hand, seat themselves upon low stools. Single persons of high rank always kneel as soon as they are admitted; but this is a matter of free choice, and by no means obligatory. Cardinal Merode never omits the practice, although he is the Pope's most confidential friend.

The Pope rises from his seat to receive princes and princesses, advances to the middle of the room to meet kings, and as far as the anteroom in order to greet emperors. Ladies less distinguished than these high dignities, and their maids of honor, are not permitted to enter the saloon, but receive their audience either in the garden or in an adjoining gallery. They are expected to appear in black garments and black veils, without distinction of rank or age.

It is interesting to hear the expressions of those who have just left the audience-chamber as they pass through the ante-room. "He is an angel!" cry his enthusiastic adherents. And even the opponents of his political system are forced to assimilate mad St. Peter's chair has never held a Pope possessed of more winning qualities than the Ninth." The levée ended, he partakes of a simple dinner, which presents a strong contrast with the extravagance of the meals served at the papal tables of the Middle Ages. Then comes, as in every private house in Rome, the siesta, followed by a drive, during which he likes to have his carriage to amuse his Holiness with their conversation—no difficult task, as, when free from the pressure of political affairs, he is very fond of cheerful society, mix with pleasure and hearty laughter to anecdotes and the chit-chat of the day. The carriage, which is surrounded by a mounted guard, is stopped outside of the walls of Rome, either in the vicinity of the Pyramid of Cestius, Monte Pincio, or the Colosseum, the Pope frequently desiring it for a short walk, and then drive back to Rome, where a frugal supper awaits them. The day is closed with a game of billiards, which he is very fond of, understand and chevful conversation until ten o'clock, at which hour every light is extinguished in the Vatican.

A MERE SCRATCH.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER VI.

THE worthy butler had been right: but not sufficiently right. When Mr. Farnshaw had gone upstairs to swoon, and her aunt's chamber, to which she had been carried, and where she remained for a long, protracted consciousness, however, Mrs. Turnover gradually cleared the apartment of all extraneous company, and the consequence was Mrs. Turnover's first access, on recovering her faculties, was heard by her aunt alone. Shortly after the bright eyes reopened, when they were filled with a what shame.

"Is—is he—aunt, tell me—is he safe?" she gasped.

"Yes, my dear—safe enough," the old lady answered to reply. "Keep quiet, I hear Mr. Farnshaw—" "Not—not to dear aunt called softly. Mr. Farnshaw's voice was heard in faint response. "Is he better bit? That brute's fangs ain't touched him at all, has they?"

To this leading question Mr. Farnshaw was fortunately able to reply in good faith:

"No, Mrs. Turnover. Make yourself quite hreasy, ma'am. They have not."

Esther's voice, also, sought the welcome word.

"God be praised!" she uttered, fervently; then, once more turning deadly white, sank back upon the pillow.

Mrs. Turnover administered new restoratives, and soon saw the sufferer revive.

"Well, you are a one, I must say," the good lady could not help remarking. "So bold when there was danger, and such a one to be afraid of now it's all over. Why now, never mind, he you still for half an hour—and—there—Mercy, my dear, you're off again!" Mrs. Turnover, turning almost as pale as her patient had done a minute before.

"Pearl!" cried Esther, laughing. "My dear aunt, nothing. A mere scratch."

"Pearl!" echoed.

"Dog! No—no—no, dear. Calm yourself,' said Esther, mentally. "I was plucking a rose. Sir George Gorgon was standing near me. The dog sprang at him all."

"Lor, what a turn it giv' me!" said her aunt, sitting down on the bed, with her hand on her portly side. "No wonder, for there's all the mark of the beast's fangs close to your own husband. I shall take and snip it off."

She did so, and also washed and bound up the positive hand, to all of which Esther submitted placidly.

"And now," said Mrs. Turnover, "I must go and attend to Farnshaw. I'll spete somebody to look after you awaitin' of me." (I wonder if Farnshaw's giv' the letter?) "Now, you lay quiet as a mouse for half an hour. I shall putt myself to rights in Dolly's room, so's not to worrit you a-bobbing about. Got a sleep in there, I dessay, for that."

Not even the relief obtainable from a nap of this duration was yet vouchsafed to Esther. She did, indeed, close her eyes, until her aunt, after a hasty rummage among the treasures of her wardrobe, trotted off to an adjoining room, and closed the door. Then, however, she rose from the bed, and kneeling beside it, poured out in fervent gratitude to the great Defender, who had, through her feeble hands, been made so great a peril. Then, in the reaction that succeeds intense excitement, sleep deigned to visit her.

A few minutes had elapsed, when the door of the apartment to which Mrs. Turnover had retired opened softly, and displayed that lady listening, and lacing her stays. Finding all quiet, she advanced a step or two in the direction of the bed, and bent her head forward to record the fact that the good lady usually wore, under her gown, an embroidered petticoat, which might be described as pepper-and-salt, with a dash of mustard, and whose beauty authorizes the addition that she occasionally black cotton stockings with grey worsted tops as becoming and economical wear.

What article of dress the lady had forgotten to take from her drawer is not material to this narrative. She decmed it essential, since with great care and pains she made such an undoubtedly into the chamber, and was stretching out her hand to the half-opened drawer when a murmur from the sleeper's lips caught her ear. She stopped. Again the murmur. It sounded this time like somebody's name.

"Eh?—Lord bless me!" said Mrs. Turnover, softly. "What's that?"

She had advanced just beyond the curtain of Esther's bed, and by merely revolving on the stately pedestals we have already referred to as clothed in black and grey, without moving from her place, could distinguish Esther's face. The cheek was flushed, and even in sleep a tear was upon it, while her lips moved in feverish action. As the murmur her words inaudible, then shaped themselves into:

"Safe!—Safe! Oh, how far more than life!—George!" She breathed a profound sigh, and sank into quiet rest.

"Well—I never!" were the first words the listener's quivering lips attempted to frame.

After a hasty toilet, Mrs. Turnover appeared to rally her disordered thoughts. She faced the bed. As she gazed on the pretty sleeper a tear crept into her eye and it crossed at the identical angle of dilvert it down the nose instead of the cheeks, there was no less nose or due to the sleeper's face than to her own nose.

Then she glanced at the half-open drawer, and the reflection: "How lucky then I come back for my bonnet! Here Farnshaw has unexpectedly!" passed through her mind.

With that kind soul turned, and observing, if possible, double caution, stole back to the chamber she had left. Good woman! If Turnover could see you now, that elaborate toilet would have abandoned by his confidence in your frank and single-hearted nature got mitigated into a mere ordinary commentary of all his set speeches did not exceed your desert.

That Mrs. Turnover did not experience a pang of disproportionate regret at the result she claimed for her is mildly due to the readiness with which she confessed to herself that Farnshaw might be the lover of Esther's attachment, the fact of its existence was an absolute and unexpectable bar to her own pretensions.

"Pretty, pretty, indeed, said Mrs. Turnover, as she finished her lacing before the glass, and saw (but she was not questioned) that a large, coarse tress in the aforesaid dirt-colored petticoat, and a square knit with short, grizzled hair. "Lord bless my soul! what will old poll be next? Pretty poor stuff, I'm thinking. Cunning little 'uns that you be! You'd never ha' told me—not you! And think of all that patience of anger last night, and wouldn't even answer my lady Pauline's to open the door for him! And she'd cry's seen his picter, eh? Well, I'm sure, I never guessed things! They goes the cussed string!" Lace renewed, and Mrs. Turnover continued: "George,' she called him! Well, people be bold, asleep!"

The good lady hastily completed her toilet, rewinding her cotton-print garments, and after one peep at the still slumbering Esther, hurried down stairs in search of Mr. Farnshaw.

That gentleman's movements since we last saw him had been characterized by considerable indecision. The injunction of his wife had induced the footman entered with some breakfast articles.

"Master—Mr. Farnshaw, Mr. Fanshaw."

"Is he? Anc'ovy toast. Run, Thomas—quick" said the butler, hurriedly. His eye had rested on the silver muffin-dish, and the sight at its own bewildering cover, occurred to him. He lifted it—hesitated—heard Mrs. Turnover, and pounced. In his flurry Mr. Farnshaw dropped the note on the muffin. There was no time to recover it; he replaced the cover.

The baronet entered, glanced hastily over the ranks of letters, looked for a seat, and sat down to breakfast. At this instant Mr. Fanshaw, standing opposite, caught sight of the portly figure of Mrs. Turnover, executing, outside the door, a series of nods and wild and agitated movements, the object of which he could only interpret as a desire to inquire how if he had yet presented the letter, as injunction to do it if he had not. So earnest grew the pantomime that Mr. Fanshaw made a movement to leave the breakfast-room.

"Stay a moment, Fanshaw," said his master, who had opened a letter.

Unable to explain further, the butler gave Mrs. Turnover a reassuring smile, and significantly pushed the muffin-dish and the note under the lid, just sufficiently to afford the anxious lady an opportunity of reading this had not the tranquilizing effect he expected.

Mr. Farnshaw, observing that Sir George was still absorbed in his letter, ventured to raise the lid, just sufficiently to afford the anxious lady an opportunity of reading the contents of the note, and, at the same time he directed a triumphant glance through the door. In acknowledgment Mrs. Turnover threw up her arms in astonishment and ecstasy, flung her apron over her head, and staggered away. Mr. Fanshaw stared after her in some perplexity.

"Now that didn't ain like J'y," was his reflection. He began to wish he could regain the letter.

"Fanshaw—"

"Yes, Sir George."

"Fanshaw! Oh, you will present my compliments to Miss Vann, and beg her, when she has fully recovered, to afford me an opportunity of expressing my acknowledgments for the great service she has this day rendered to me, and, indeed, to all my household."

"Yes, Sir George."

"Stay, give me a muffin."

"Muffin, Sir George?"

"Muffin."

At that supreme moment the butler was conscious of the reappearance of Mrs. Turnover, now in an unmistakable attitude of despair, while Dolly, equally agitated, peeped over her shoulder. It was, however, too late. Mr. Fanshaw had placed the fatal dish within reach, and was preparing to beat a precipitate retreat.

"Take off the cover," said George.

Mr. Fanshaw obeyed. One glance revealed the fact that the steam-heated letter had begun to imbibe the rich fluid below, and, having once tasted thereof, was rapidly becoming inebriated.

"Why, what in the name of—" began George, lifting it curiously with his fork. "Here, take this away! Something has got into it."

"Bless me, so there is!" cried the butler, as he whipped off the dish, muttering something about "the bakers."

"Lor! what a providence!" gasped Mrs. Turnover, as Mr. Fanshaw presented her with the recovered missive. "Quick—run!" Snatching off the letter the good woman hurried away.

At some time after he had finished both his letters and his breakfast, the young baronet remained at the table immersed in thought. With an effort he rose and went into his study. There he sat for a few moments lerture, then rang the bell and flung himself into a chair.

"Now for my fate," he muttered.

A servant appeared.

"Mrs. Turnover," George checked himself. "Say to Mrs. Turnover that I shall be glad to see her for a minute."

Mrs. Turnover's avaitin', Sir George," was the prompt reply.

"Say her to come in."

Mrs. Turnover, quietly attired, came in. Though on a large scale, and of that general aspect which a fastidious critic might have described in the aid uncommon expression, "vulgar," the worthy cook was, for her style, a remarkable woman. It may further be that the consciousness of a presentable appearance imparted to her countenance and manner a degree of self-possession and dignity not usually to be found there. At all events her young master thought he had never seen her look so much like those days when, as a school-boy, he had not disdained to make surreptitious dainties at that large and liberal hand.

"Dear Mrs. Turnover," he began.

Mrs. Turnover bobbed a courtesy and remained standing.

"Sit, sit, my good friend," said Sir George, a little impatiently.

"Begging your pardon, Sir George," was the reply, "I prefer standin'."

Sir George rose.

Mrs. Turnover cleared her throat, twitched her apron nervously, and began:

"I've come, Sir George, to give hanser, as quick as I could, to what you was a-saying of last night. I've been considerin' of it, as you bordered, Sir George, and now I'm ready to answer, Sir George. I shall be most "appy"—George's heart stood still—"for to retain my situation, but as to being your wife, Sir George, when I does marry, keep to my hose spear."

"Of your feelings on such a point, my good Barbara, we shall judge, of course, be the best. And this much relieved sutior; "but do not decide hastily."

"I've settled it these many years," she said, "and you take it so kindly, Sir. I was afeard, seeing how ex-nest you was, that you might be disappinted," said the kind creature.

George took the good woman's hand, and was hypocrite enough to feign a shade of triumph at resigning to be perceptible in his exculnance as he replied, with a melancholy smile, that it was not his first disappointment, and he should overcome it as he had others; adding, after a decent pause, that he should dine at home that day, and expected two friends.

Mrs. Turnover, much relieved, and requested to withdraw; but, pausing a moment, remarked:

"Sir George, I'm glad to have been able to bless them last words as hever hissued from the lips of T. A."

"I'm," said George, absently.

"The same was as before," resumed Mrs. Turnover. "He was total unconcious. Indeed, we thought he never come round, when, suddenly, he opens one eye, and winks twice; which meaning 'stimulants,' they was giv', and he says, fairly: 'Fishes don't eny bilin' water.' Thinks he was a wanderin', we nodded cheerful-like: but he goes on: 'A dillykid female lookin' down at me.' Which there is, sure enough. After that, we thought he was going; but, with a great heffort, poor dear, he just manages to hadd: 'There's social difficulties.' Which there is, sure enough. 'When there ain't, don't let 'em stick to you. Adoo!'"

"Your excellent husband seems to have received many results of his experience to a very late moment!" remarked George. "At this precise moment, my mind is, I fear, too fully occupied with selfish thoughts to appreciate them properly. I have this morning received an important letter (here than one, his thought suggested), "and I am impatient till I have thanked my deliverer. Is your nice sufficiently recovered to allow me the opportunity?"

Mrs. Turnover considered that, by this time, she was, and would be glad to see if not sure the case.

"Have played the booby long enough," reflected the master of the mansion, left alone. "Honesty and openness commend me! I will tell her the whole truth, and then—"

Mrs. Turnover had a harder task than she expected. Her niece was indeed awake, and, calmed and recovered by her unwonted steals, looked as charming as need be. But the going communication—by the good old going away—was not to be thought of.

At length Mrs. Turnover lost all patience.

"Well, all the contrary creature as ever did see, you beats all! You westered your life to protect Miss Esther, and don't' added Mrs. Turnover, testily, "you've actually been s-dreamin' of him." Esther darted. "Child, you been him! Won't you go down stairs?"

"If what you say were true, ma'am," Esther replied, with hesitation, "which it is not, people, should be the last to force me into his presence."

"Highty-tighty! Who wants to force your ryal 'ighness?' And why should you be? Is it me as you do what in your 'art you wishes?" demanded the cook, losing all control of her temper. "You look here. If you don't go down and be thanked like a reasonable woman, I'll go to master myself, and tell him that that there letter was wrote by you to Mr. Fanshaw."

"Aunt, aunt! I could not have believed that you would have been guilty of such—wicked," said Esther, bursting into tears.

"Cruel! Wicked?" ejaculated Mrs. Turnover, aghast. "Why, what—"

"To compel me, feeling as you say and believe I do, to hold any further intercourse with gentlemen, to whom, miserably for yourself and for him, you are about to be married?"

"Both! That's it! Who said we was going to be married?" said her aunt, in an altered tone.

"Has you not accepted his offer?"

"Who's gone and putt that nonsense into your little head?" said her aunt, with an assumption of surprised innocence that Esther gazed at her in dumb surprise. "Don't you think it possible as I might like to hear what they'd say before, without rally meaning to make such aninny of myself as that comes to? Prayy I'd a fancy to tease Mrs. Mapes. But, there, a joke's a joke, and if master had his'n, why, I've had mine."

"Oh, aunt, I am so glad!" cried Esther. "How wise! how prudent! how disinterested!"

"But, good gracious, child! I en stand chatterin' here, and master's waiting! Now, Esther, I insist upon your going instant down. I'm not going to be married to him a bit, and so I've told him. Why, whatever the matter with me will continued Mrs. Turnover, flushing with anger and excitement, "you was glib enough to the doctor. As I'm a livin' woman, I'll tell him."

The movement she made to quit the room decided Esther.

"Stay, stay, aunt!" she exclaimed. "I will go down. It will be better—in the end."

Uttering the last words almost in a sob, she quitted the room.

The dialogue above recorded had allowed Sir George, little that he reserved self-estimation and the arrangement of his thoughts, so that, on Miss Vaux making her appearance, bearing very much the aspect of an empress whose privacy has been invaded by the exigencies of a public audience, he was prepared to meet her with a dignity equal to—and in one case greater than—her own.

Having made his purposed acknowledgments for the service she had, at such imminent personal hazard, rendered to himself and people, George respectfully bespoke her attention for a few moments, and thereupon related, without stint or pause, the history of his acquaintance with Mr Mulcaster, its abrupt and hopeless termination, his own mad yielding to a wild and foolish impulse, the attempt he had nevertheless felt it incumbent on him to make, to carry it out, and its failure. In making these humiliating confessions he treated the subject nearer would at least—in his credit for sincerity of purpose. Had also Vaux's estimable relation accepted the overture he had been induced to make, nothing should have been wanting on his part that might reconcile her to the duties of her new station. Her reason and foresight, however, which put his entirely to shame, had suggested a course greater wisdom, and more likely to conduce to the happiness of both, than leaving him, the speaker, free to—to—

"To—to—?"

"To make a fitter choice."

Miss Vaux must be forgiven for observing that there did not appear to be any choice in the matter.

Sir George Gosling had indulged the hope that the course on his remarks would have indicated his having arrived at the same views—aware as the indelicacy which lay at the root of his intemperate vow, he came it to the writer.

Miss Vaux was aware that those atmospheric agents possessed a very extensive treasury of the kind, but nevertheless, she had done as to be the legal transfer. That, however, was beyond her province. She would not trouble Sir George's memory.

Sir George considered that it could scarcely prove such to him, unless his hearer vouchsafed her attention a little longer.

But there was nothing more to say.

Her pardon. There was. Every thing.

How?

Thus. He had frankly described his engagement with Miss Mulcaster, how their intimacy, begun in childhood, had ripened into what he had been accustomed to regard as a mutual attachment, and then on the very threshold of their union, one of the parties had recoiled from the bargain. The blow thus rudely dealt, had expressed in his heart a serious doubting whether Miss Mulcaster had ever felt toward him as she permitted him to believe: while the speaker, on his part, was disposed to question whether, in his estimate of her character, he had attached sufficient importance to certain weaknesses and frivolity which underlay her more attractive qualities. In one word, George must acknowledge he no longer adored the idol of his boyhood. He had tested her, and found her mortal. Dreams were over for him. Henceforth he stooped to truth, to reason, to reality. These—and how much more he would not add—he believed he had addressed to—in her who had so patiently listened to his discourse.

It was well that George's speech came to a conclusion. Esther had turned very white, and looked as like to faint, that he had to place her in a chair. She rallied, however, with an effort, and, though encouraged by the returning color, and a faint smile that straggled about her lips, ventured to return to the charge.

During those appeals and explanations, to which George's historian has done but indifferent justice, the mind of the hearer had fluctuated not a little. Touched at length to the heart by his frank and earnest manner, she ended by believing every syllable. Strange and sudden as was the attachment he had formed for her, something seemed to whisper her that it was of more genuine and natural growth than that from whose ashes it had sprung; and if the exciting circumstances of the hour had led to a somewhat premature declaration, had she a right to dispute it on that ground alone? After a momentary hesitation, breaking into a bright smile, she gave him her hand. It was the left.

George happened to be superstitious on this subject. He hesitated:

"A bal. forgiveness?" he asked, smiling. She held out the other.

"Good Heavens, what is this?" exclaimed the young man, thinking only of the dog.

"Nothing. The rose," said Esther.

George was much relieved. He took the little hand tenderly, and kissed it.

There followed a little further conversation, with which we have no other concern than to know that it resulted in an understanding that the engagement (for such it must now be considered should be kept secret for a period of twelve calendar months, subsequently to be six, and ultimately, on petition, to three, reduced to six, and ultimately, on petition, to three, during which no communication whatever was to take place between the contracting parties. To this last condition Miss Vaux held firm. Sir George was to enjoy a period of three months for undisturbed reflection. In them, the impression that he now knew his own mind was sufficiently confirmed, he would use his discretion as to announcing the engagement; but any word of marriage, or allusion to that event, within one twelvemonth, was to nullify the whole transaction.

Article the last. Sir George was to order the carriage forthwith.

He did so, and led the young lady to the door, still looking wistfully at the bandaged hand.

"I fear you are suffering more than you will confess?" he said.

"I do not feel it at all," replied Esther, with her radiant smile.

"I shall send to inquire the progress of the cure."

"It will be your last communication, then," said Esther. "Remember our conditions."

"Nay, but I am really anxious—"

"Nonsense," said Esther, laughing, "a mere scratch!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Some of our railroad companies, having stations in this city, have for some time past maintained a regulation that no person shall be admitted to the cars about to start unless upon showing a ticket. The result is, that a gentleman who accompanies his wife or lady relative or friend to the cars to see her safely started on a journey, can not aid in procuring her a seat, but she must tread her way through the crowd into the car alone. The consequence is that the rule on the ground that it prevents pickpockets from plying their trade in the cars at a station, but it is very doubtful at least whether any advantage thus gained compensates for the annoyance to which timid and inexperienced females are subjected. The rule has recently given rise to renewed complaint.

There is talk of removing the old "William Penn" Mansion, heretofore standing on the corner of Second and Gothic streets, in Philadelphia, and one of the time-honored relics of the early history of that city, and re-erecting it, upon a reduced scale, in Fairmount Park.

By the re-establishment of the mail system throughout the Southern States has been heretofore embarrassed by the fact that few contractors for carrying the mails can be found who are able and willing to take the "test oath" which our Government requires from those who aspire to situations of trust and confidence in its employment. A Mr. Bryan Tyson, of Washington, now advertises an ingenious solution of this difficulty. He proposes that the contractor, instead of carrying a mail should notify Tyson; whereupon Tyson will immediately go to Washington, take the oath required, take the oath, give the security required, and take out the contract in his own name; and will then transfer it to the proposed contractor, receiving a commission of 5*l* per cent. for his (Tyson's) time, trouble, expenses, and the privilege of using his name and not of conscience in taking so many oaths as the prosecution of the plan involves.

In the Weekly of October 20 we gave Edward Everett's description of the cholera of 1832. Here is Rufus Choate's. It is extracted from a lately-published letter from him to Governor Everett, dated Salem, Wednesday, dated Salem, August 21, 1832, in which he describes a recent visit to Boston:

"The doctor and I found quarters in the same room. The moon shone as upon the city of the dead: and the sun sounds from the street, the clock in the hall, the steps, or the slow wheels, of the bearers of the sudden sick, or the dead. Every house is a hospital, and all over. Between you and me I came once or twice in the night to that old people call Apprehension—a sort of rascally nervous inclination to squeal and kick up my heels, fancy ministering to fear and blanching my hair. By the morning star rose at length it seemed to glitter and sting as my duty of the day approached, and full of the horror had been the night! So I called down to the wharf to meet the New England Packet, and to be the was guaranteed at New Haven, and that it was doubtful if any should be admitted to Salem. The same report was offered at Jarvis's, in Poughkeepsie. There I found a Mr. Wolfe, who proved to be a very respectable fellow, a friend of Pendleton and Clay, and a most determined foe to the cholera. He had already sailed me. Whereupon I went to bed, gentle as a babe, and slept like a rock. Early in the morning I was on the occasion. They send me my last year's bills to me with an intimation that if all were not straight and receive my United States' bills, as if they expected to give a thousand dollars for my good and faithful conduct."

By-the-way, why is it that the labors of our Board of Health seem so much relaxed lately. In the upper part of the city the bone-boiling nuisance seems remorselessly to be again commencing its work—and the streets and sidewalks are as dirty as ever.

Hunters often shoot deer, but one would say that a deer could not shoot a hunter. Yet this apparently impossible accident is reported to have occurred in Pennsylvania. A deer was pursued by hounds and a deer-stalker named Urquhart. He made one or a party who were pursuing a stag, and was sent, with another hunter, to keep it from escaping at the head of a glen into which it had been chased. The stag was, however, not intercepted by a shot, and so the two men were able to come up with him, and Urquhart tried to drive him down with the butt-end of his rifle before finishing him with the bullet. In despair and pain the stag lashed out, and, striking the hammer of the gun, knocked it back against the head of the other down on the cap, so that the charge exploded, and drove the bullet straight through the forester's body. He stood for a moment, and then fell, saying, "I am shot," and fell into the arms of his companion, who laid him down and tried to stop the bleeding. Medical assistance was at once sent for, but the distance was so great that before the doctors could arrive the wounded man was dead.

The week has brought news of some other accidents almost equally singular. From San Francisco we hear of an explosion of an ordinary brass ship's lamp, on board the sloop Sycamore, with such force as to shatter the cabin into kindling wood, kill the boy who was the lamp, and even drive pieces of the metal deep into the deck, accompanied by a noise like the report of a cannon. This was something out of the way to be explained on the supposition that the contents of the lamp were ample cause for it, as was at first believed. But upon investigation it appeared that the men on board the sloop, some weeks previously, obtained some fluid which they supposed to be oil. Some of it was placed in the coal-oil can, kept on board for filling the lamps. Shortly thereafter some was poured from the can to oil the axle of the track used for hauling freight on board the schooner, and on the track being used an explosion followed. The men now discovered that what they had supposed to be oil was nitro-glycerine. They thereupon turned the dangerous fluid overboard, and coming to port again had the can filled with coal oil at a drug-store. The theory of the explosion is, that enough of the nitro-glycerine remained sticking to the sides of the can when it was refilled with coal-oil to produce the explosion. This floated on the surface of the coal-oil, or mingled with it, and found its way into the lamp, where it is some manner, through friction in screwing down the lamp, a sudden jar, or heat from the burning wick, exploded with the terrible force and fatal result we have stated.

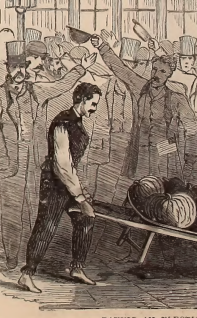
In the upper part of New York city last week several small boys were badly, and one of them fatally, burned by an explosion. It seems that while playing in the street they found some scattered pieces of what they supposed was coal, and immediately commenced collecting all they could and for the purpose of building a fire. After doing so, and igniting the material so collected, the children gathered round the embryo fire to high-jinx, as they so stood huddled together the black mass suddenly exploded, scattering the fire over them, and burning a number of them very seriously, so much so indeed, that one of them died next day. It was afterward ascertained that what the children supposed was coal, was in fact cakes of damaged powder. The proprietor of a coal-yard in the vicinity had a parcel of damaged powder on his premises, which he considered worthless, and gave to a carman, with directions to "throw it into the North River." To save going all the way to the river, however, the carman, not supposing any harm would come of it, threw the powder out of his cart into the street, where not long afterward the disastrous ludo found.

A severe penalty was recently inflicted upon a young boy in an English county town. It seems that three naughty boys were in the habit to go apples from the grounds of a certain gentleman. Two of them were lads of bad character. The third, a very young one, was of good character, entirely led away by his companions. A policeman caught them all. The decent boy was one of nine children, and was absent the next day to go to a situation. Apples, probably windfalls, were found in his pockets. His mother begged hard of the magistrates for his release. He was a very good boy at home, she said. She promised that he should be well looked after in future. It was his first offence. The justices, however, sentenced the poor child, in spite of his previous character, to three years in a reformatory! One can not help feeling a strong sympathy with the poor child thus punished for a first offence.

A Londonderb one day last spring met a large oleo went to the room of a broker in Hartford while he was asleep, took the keys of his office and safe from his pantaloons pocket, opened the safe of $100, and then replaced the keys in his pocket!

A residence in Rome just now would not seem to be particularly desirable. Brigands in that vicinity have become fearfully bold. A letter from Rome states that not long since a band of brigands entered the village of Acuto, and seized upon five persons belonging to the principal families of the place. They carried them off to the mountains, and gave them to understand that they must pay a large ransom. The family of one of them sent the amount demanded, and the brigands set free the person so ransomed, giving him a sealed box to be handed to the mayor of the village. When opened it was found to contain the ears of the four other prisoners, and a letter saying that if the whole sum demanded was not remitted the heads would shortly be sent to their friends.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.



SOME PERSPIRE!—The annual ceremony of crowning the king of the pumpkins took place lately at the extinct mastodon in Paris. The happy vegetable weighed 268 pounds, and measured ten feet four inches round. At one time it was feared the antediluvian might forbid the ceremony, on the ground of its politi-cal significance, because it might lead the dissatisfied to believe the crown was going to exhaust!

The last novelty in the way of locomotion is to be among the many wonders of the Great Exhibition at Paris. It is a mechanical horse, which trots, gallops, or walks, as may suit the pleasure of the rider. PAYING AN ELECTION WAGER.

If men will lay wagers on elections they must take the consequences with as much grace as possible. In the little town which we illustrate below both the winner and the loser were compelled to play a somewhat ludicrous part, the latter that of wheeling a barrow five pumpkins around the square, while the former went before with the Bull's-eye flag. The winner of the wager was Mr. W. B. BLANCHARD, the loser was Mr. JOHN MORGAN. All was done, without cost or bodily wheeled the pumpkins, according to agreement, a large and enthusiastic crowd following. The scene of this interesting performance was the square formed by Broadway, Grand, Crosby, and Howard streets.

PAYING AN ELECTION WAGER.

"SAY, MAMMA?"

Pray, mamma, say, mamma: did you not think—
As she stood for our carriage last night at the hall—
That Spooner, poor creature, was just on the brink
Of—I don't like to mention it!—"popping," that Should he propose, may I send him to you?
What shall I say, mamma? Say, mamma, do!

Yes, mamma! Guess, mamma, how I was vexed
When the carriage came up and he bid us "good night!"
I knew—or I fancied—what must have come next,
For his pressing my hand so expressibly did!
How shall I treat the man—send him to you?
What shall I say, mamma? Say, mamma, do!

Oh! mamma; so, mamma. Do not suppose
I would marry for that. I am not to be sold.
But still—for all gentleman's property goes
To the very identical son, I am told.
Make up your mind. Shall I send him to you?
What shall I say, mamma? Say, mamma, do!

Nay, mamma: sly, mamma, sweet mamma!
Let me beg you to give your definitive choice.
Good gracious, what's that? There's a knock at the door.
Oh, it's Spooner himself; no mistaking the voice.
Tell me at once; may I send him to you?
What shall I say, mamma? Say, mamma, do!

ELECTION RETURNS—SCENE IN FRONT OF THE NEW YORK "TRIBUNE" OFFICE AT MIDNIGHT, NOVEMBER 6-7.—[SKETCHED BY C. G. BUSH.]

PROCLAIMING THE ANNEXATION OF NASSAU AT WIESBADEN.—[See Page 746.]

THE UNWELCOME GUEST.

THE lights are lit, the chimney glows,
The board is laden with the best;
And evergreens the high walls deck
In expectation of a guest.

The maiden wears a snow-white rose
In shining braids of silken hair;
The matron's face is lit with smiles
To greet the guest expected there.

Along the turnpike's devious way,
Across the swift and dangerous ford,
The jaded steed his rider bears,
Obedient to the lightest word;

His iron hoofs upon the night
Ring out a harsh, discordant tune,
His streaming mane shakes in the wind,
His wild eye wonders at the moon.

The hours go by, the clock ticks loud,
The fire has lost its former glow;
The wine still waits the stranger's lip,
The flickering lights burn dim and low;

The matron's smile has passed away,
The maiden sighs within her chair,
And faded is the snow-white flower
The maiden wore to grace her hair.

A knock sounds at the castle gates,
That to the summons open wide;
And through the halls a stranger stalks,
With lofty mien and haughty stride—

Not the fair guest for whom they looked,
For whom the maiden graced her hair,
But one of other name and blood,
A visitor unwelcome there.

The board is laden with the best,
Yet has the wine a bitter taste;
Untouched the costly meats are passed,
The mellow fruit is left to waste;

No smile is on the matron's lip,
No love is in the maiden's eye;
The master sits with sullen brow,
In silence, as the hour goes by.

Perchance we all have sometime been
Unwelcome guests beside some hearth,
And shadowed by our presence there
Each show of gladness and of mirth.

The formal word, the chilling tone,
The slight, forced smile, what tales they tell!
How happy seems the parting hour
When at the last we say "Farewell!"

BIRDS OF PREY.

CHAPTER I.

THE HOUSE IN BLOOMSBURY.

THERE are some houses whereof the outward aspect is sealed with the seal of respectability—houses which inspire confidence in the minds of the most skeptical of butchers and bakers—houses at whose area-gates the tradesman delivers his goods undoubtingly, and from whose spotless door-steps the vagabond children of the neighborhood recoil as from a shrine too sacred for hob-nails.

Such a house made its presence obvious, some years ago, in one of the smaller streets of that west-central region which lies between Holborn and St. Pancras Church. It is, perhaps, the nature of ultra-respectability to be disagreeably conspicuous; and the unsullied brightness of No. 14 Fitzgeorge Street was a standing reproach to every other house in the dingy thoroughfare. That one spot of cleanliness made the surrounding dirt cruelly palpable. The muslin curtains in the parlor-windows of No. 13 would not have appeared of such a smoky yellow if the curtains of No. 14 had not been of such a pharisaical whiteness. The brass-plate, at No. 13, was a humble letter of lodgings, always more or less in arrear with the demands of quarter-day; and it seemed a hard thing that her door-steps, whereon were expended much labor and hearth-stone, not to mention house-flannel, which was in itself no unimportant item in the annual expenses—should be always thrown in the shade by the surpassing purity of the steps before No. 14.

Not satisfied with being the very pink and pattern of respectability, the objectionable house even aspired to a kind of prettiness. It was as bright, and pleasant, and rural of aspect as any house within ear-shot of the roar and rattle of Holborn can be. There were flowers in the windows, and pretty muslin curtains, ingeniously to enjoy an immunity from all the ills to which gentlemen are subject, so impossible was it to discover a faded leaf among their greenness, or the presence of blight amidst their wealth of blossoms. There were bird-cages within the shadow of the muslin curtains, and the coloring of the newly-painted brick-work was agreeably relieved by the vivid green of Venetian blinds. The freshly-varnished street-door bore a brass-plate, on which to look was to be dazzled; and the effect produced by this combination of white door-step, scarlet geranium, green blind, and brass-plate was obtrusively brilliant.

Those who had been so privileged as to behold the interior of the house in Fitzgeorge Street brought away with them an envious admiration of its inner splendors. The pink and pattern of propriety within, as it was the pink and pattern of propriety without, it excited in every breast alike a wondering awe, as of a habitation tenanted by some mysterious being, infinitely superior to the common order of householders.

The inscription on the brass-plate informed the neighborhood that No. 14 was occupied by Mr. Sheldon, surgeon-dentist; and the dwellers in Fitzgeorge Street were not slow to avail of the leisure hours by speculative discussions upon the character and pursuits, belongings and surroundings of this gentleman.

Of course he was eminently respectable. On that question no Fitzgeorgian had ever hazarded a doubt. A brass-plate on the door-post, a door-step and such muslin curtains could not be other than the most correct of manhood; for, if there is any external evidence by which a dissolute life or an ill-regulated mind will infallibly betray itself, that evidence is to be found in the yellowness and limpness of muslin window-curtains. The eyes are the windows of the soul, says the poet; but if a man's eyes are not open to your inspection, his windows of his house will help you to discover his character as an individual, and his conduct as a citizen. At least such was the opinion cherished in Fitzgeorge Street, Russell Square.

The genius and habits of Mr. Sheldon were in perfect harmony with the aspect of the house. The unsullied snow of the door-step reproduced itself in the unsullied snow of his shirt-front; the brilliancy of the brass-plate was reflected in the glittering brightness of his gold studs; the varnish on the door was rivaled by the immaculate surface of his black satin waistcoat; the careful pointing of the brick-work was in a manner imitated by the polished and highly-pumiced fingernails and the irreproachable neatness of his hair and whiskers.

No doctor or medical practitioner of any denomination had inhabited the house in Fitzgeorge Street before the coming of Philip Sheldon. The house had been unoccupied for a year and a half, and was in the last stage of shabbiness and decay, when the bills disappeared all at once from the windows, and busy painters and bricklayers set their ladders against the dingy brick-work. But Mr. Sheldon took the house upon a long lease, and expended a very large hundred pounds in the embellishment of it. Upon the completion of all repairs and decorations, two great waggons of furniture, distinguished by that old-fashioned clumsiness which is eminently suggestive of respectability, arrived from the Baker Square Terminus, while a young man of meditative aspect might have been seen on his knees, now in one empty chamber, anon in another, performing certain mysterious manipulations, with a three-foot rule, a loose little oblong memorandum-book, and the merest stump of a square lead pencil. This young man followed the carpet-workmen; and before nightfall it was known to more than one inhabitant of Fitzgeorge Street that the stranger was going to lay down new carpets. The new-comer was evidently of an active and energetic temperament, for within three days of his arrival the brass-plate on his street-door announced his profession, while a neat little glass-case, on a level with the eye of the pedestrian, exhibited specimens of his skill in mechanical dentistry, and afforded instruction and amusement to the boys of the neighborhood, who criticised the grinning white teeth and impossibly red gums displayed behind the plate-glass with a like vigor and freedom of language. Nor did Mr. Sheldon's arrangements in any manner confine itself to the brass-plate and the glass case. A shabby-genteel young man perambulated the neighborhood for some days after the surgeon-dentist's advent, knocking at gentlemen's kneck, leaving cards of the galvanic sharpness of the professional touch to be the real thing, and delivering neatly-printed circulars at the doors of the nobility and gentry. Finally, one fine day, Mr. Sheldon's carriage—a plain and plain-spoken vehicle enough—made its first appearance in the neighborhood of Fitzgeorge Street, had invented some novel method of adjusting false teeth, indisputably superior to every other invention, and that he had, further, patented an improvement upon nature in the way of coral gums, the name whereof you may see in dentistical shop-windows in Greek and Latin, calculated to awaken an awful reverence in the unprofessional and unclassical mind.

The Fitzgeorgians shook their heads with prophetic solemnity as they read these circulars. Immaculate householders, who had been at pains to keep the two ends which never have met and never will meet from growing farther and farther asunder every year, had to be content with a dreary kind of satisfaction from the contemplation of another man's unspending ruin. Fitzgeorge Street and its neighborhood had existed without the services of a dentist, but it was very doubtful that a dentist would be able to exist on the patronage to be obtained in Fitzgeorge Street. Mr. Sheldon may, perhaps, have pitched his tent under the impression that wherever there was much dirt there was likely to be toothache, and that the healer of an ill so common to frail humanity could scarcely fail to earn his bread, let him establish his abode of what locality he might. For some time after his arrival people watched him and wondered about him, and regarded him a little suspiciously, in spite of the substantial clumsiness of his furniture and the unwinking brightness of his windows. His neighbors asked one another how long all that outward semblance of prosperity would last; and there was snither meaning in the question.

The Fitzgeorgians were not a little surprised, and were perhaps just a little disappointed, on finding that the newly-established dentist did manage to hold his ground somehow or other, and that the muslin curtains were renewed again and again in all their spotless purity; that the supplies of rotten-stone and oil, hearth-stone and hose-flannel were unfailing as a perennial spring; and that the unsullied snow of Mr. Sheldon's shirt-fronts retained its primeval whiteness. Wonder and suspicion gave place to a half-envious respect. Whether much custom came to the dentist no one could decide. There is no trade or profession in which the struggling man will not receive some faint show of encouragement. Pedestrians of agonized aspect, with handkerchiefs held convulsively before their mouths, were often seen walking toward the dentist's door, then pause for a moment, stricken by a sudden terror, and anon feebly pull the handle of an inflexible bell. Calls had been heard to approach that fatal door—generally on wet days; for there seems to be a kind of fitness in the choice of gloomy and inclement weather for the extraction of teeth. Elderly ladies and gentlemen had been known to come many times to the Fitzgeorge Street door. There was a legend of an old lady who had been seen to arrive in a hackney-chariot, supported with much outrageous affection, and to depart half an hour afterward a beautified and renovated creature. One half of the Fitzgeorgians declared that Mr. Sheldon had established a very nice little practice, and was having money; while the other half were still disposed to maintain that the dentist had private property, and was eating up his little capital. It transpired in course of time that Mr. Sheldon had left a wife and child at Little Burlingford, in Yorkshire, where his father and grandfather had been surgeon-dentists before him, to establish himself in London. He had disposed advantageously of an excellent practice, and had transferred his household goods—the mahogany couches and chairs, the wool wheel that deepened and mellowed in tint under the indefatigable hand of his grandmother—to the metropolis, impressed with the chance that his talents and appearance, address and industry, could scarcely fail to achieve a position. It was further known that he was a brother, an attorney in Gray's Inn, who visited him very frequently; that he had few other friends or acquaintances; that he was a young man of steadiness and sobriety; that he was on the sunnier side of thirty, a bachelor, and very good-looking; and that his temperament comprised of a grim-visaged, active old woman imported from Burlingford, a girl who ran errands, and a boy who opened the door and attended to the consulting-room, and did some mysterious work at odd times with a file and sundry queer lumps of plaster of Paris, designated by him and by him alone as "stuff," in the back-garden.

The dentist interrupted her with a short, bitter laugh.

"Neither March winds nor April showers are likely to bring me patients, Nancy, on foot or in cabs, and you ought to know it. If it's a patient, ask him in, by all means, and give him also Saturday week's Times to read, while I get the rust off my forceps. There, that will do; take your tray—no, you can put some water in the jug." He rose, and stood with his back to the fire and his eyes bent upon the hearth-rug, while Mrs. Woolper made the table, which with the tray-cloth ready for removal. Her master kept her waiting so for some minutes, and then turned his face half away from her, and complained himself absently in the glass while he spoke.

"You remember Mrs. Holliday?" he asked.

"I should think I did, Mr. Sheldon, considering Cradock that was—Miss Georgey they called her; your first sweet-heart. And how she could ever marry that Holliday I declare I never know than I can make out. Poor fondy! I suppose she was took with those great round blue eyes and red whiskers of his."

"Her mother and father were 'took' by his comfortable farm-house, and well-stocked farm, Nancy," answered Mr. Sheldon, contemplating himself in the glass. "Georgy had very little to do with it. She is one of those women who let other people think for them. However, Tom is an excellent fellow, and Georgy was a lucky girl to catch such a husband. Any little flirtation may have been between her and me was over and done with long before she married Tom. It never was more than a flirtation; and I'm flirted with a good many Burlingford girls in my time, as you know, Nancy."

It was not often that Mr. Sheldon condescended to be so communicative to his housekeeper. The old woman nodded and chuckled, delighted by her master's unwonted graciousness.

"I drove over to Hyley while I was at home, Nancy," continued the dentist—he called Burlingford Hyley sometimes, though he knew most of the links that had bound him to it—"and dined with the Hallidays. Georgy is as pretty as ever, and so proud Tom get on capitally."

"Any children, Sir?"

"One girl," answered Mr. Sheldon, carelessly. "She's at school in Scarborough, and I didn't see her. I had a very pleasant day with the Hallidays. Tom has sous his farm; that part of the world doesn't suit him, it seems, so cheap and bleak for him. He's one of those big, burly-looking men who seem as if they could knock you down with a finger, and who after a time are every puff of wind. I don't think he'll make old bones, Nancy. But that's neither here nor there. I dare say I shall send for another sum year; or I'm sure I hope so, on Georgy's account."

"It was right-down soft of him to sell Hyley Farm, indeed, Sir," said Nancy, reflectively. "I've heard tell as it's the best land for forty mile round Burlingford. But he got a rare good price for it, I'll lay."

"Oh, yes; he sold the property uncommonly well he tells me. You know if a north-countryman gets the chance of making a profit, he never lets it slip through his fingers."

Mrs. Woolper received this compliment to her countrymen with a gratified grin, and Mr. Sheldon went on talking, still looking at the reflection of his handsome face in the glass, and pulling his whiskers meditatively.

of a household may inhabit a neighborhood for years without becoming acquainted even with the outward aspect of their neighbors; but in the lordly servants' halls of the West, or the modest kitchens of Bloomsbury, there will be interchange of civilities and friendly "droppings in" to tea or supper, let the master of the house be never so ungregarious a creature.

"You can take the tea-things, Nancy," Mr. Sheldon said, presently, arousing himself suddenly from that absolute reverie in which he had been absorbed for the last ten minutes; "I am going to be very busy to-night, and I expect Mr. George in the course of the evening. Mind I am not at home to any body but him."

The old woman arranged the tea-things on her tray, but still kept a furtive watch on her master, who sat with his head a little bent, and his bright black eyes fixed on the fire, with that intensity of gaze particular to eyes which see something far away from the object they seem to contemplate. She was in the habit of watching Mr. Sheldon rather curiously at all times, for she had never quite got over a difficulty in realizing the fact that the black-eyed baby with whom she had been so intimate could have developed into that self-contained inflexible young man, whose thoughts were so very far away from her. To-night she watched him more intently than she was accustomed to do, for to-night there was some change in the dentist's face she was trying, in a dim way, to account for.

He looked up from the fire suddenly, and found her standing by the door. It may be that he had been disturbed by a semi-consciousness of that curious gaze, for he looked at her angrily at first—"What are you staring at, Nancy?"

It was not the first time he had encountered her watchful eyes and asked the same impatient question. But Mr. Sheldon possessed that north-country quickness of intellect which is generally equal to an emergency, and was always ready with the question or suggestion which went to prove that she had just fixed her eyes on her master, inspired by some anxiety about his interests.

"I was just a-thinking, Sir," she said, meeting his stern glance unflinchingly with her little sharp grey eyes—"I was just a-thinking—you said not at home to any one, except Mr. George. If it should be a person in a cab wanting their teeth out sudden-like, while they could make toothache move general in this neighborhood it would be these March winds—if it should be a patient, Sir, in a cab—"

"Nancy," interrupted her with a short, bitter laugh.

"Neither March winds nor April showers are likely to bring me patients, Nancy, on foot or in cabs, and you ought to know it. If it's a patient, ask him in, by all means, and give him also Saturday week's Times to read, while I get the rust off my forceps. Mrs. Woolper received this compliment to her countrymen with a gratified grin, and Mr. Sheldon went on talking, still looking at the reflection of his handsome face in the glass, and pulling his whiskers meditatively.

"Now, as Tom was made for a farmer, and nothing but a farmer, he must find land somewhere in a climate that does suit him; so his friends have advised him to try a place in Devonshire or Cornwall, where he may train his myrtles and roses over his roof, and grow green peas for the London markets as late as November. There are such places to be had if he bides his time, and he's coming to town next week to look about him. So as George and he would be about as capable of taking care of themselves in London as a couple of children, I have reconsidered them to take up their quarters here. They'll have their lodgings for nothing, and we shall experience for the Yorkshire system, for of course I can't afford to keep a couple of visitors for a month at a stretch. Do you think you shall be able to manage for us, Mrs. Sheldon?"

"Oh yes, I'll manage well enough. I'm not one of your lazy London lasses that take half an hour to wash a tea-cup. I'll manage easy enough. Mr. and Mrs. Halliday will be having your room, I'll lay."

"Yes, I give them the best room, by all means. I can sleep any where. And now go down stairs and think it over, Nancy. I must get to my work. I've some letters that must be written to-night."

Mrs. Woolger departed with her tray, gratified by her ministry's invented familiarity, and not ill-pleased by the thought of visitors. They would cause a great deal of trouble, certainly, but the memory of Nancy's cozy life had grown so oppressive to an active temperament as to render the idea of any variety delightful to her mind. And then there would be the pleasure of making that iniquitous creature, the London lass, bestir herself, and there would be further more the satisfaction of certain little reprisals which a clever manager always secures to her self in a house where there is much eating and drinking. Mrs. Sheldon himself had lived like a modern anchorite for the last four years; and Nancy Woolger, who was pretty well acquainted with the weight of the finances, had pinched and contrived for his benefit, or rather for the benefit of the black-eyed baby she had nursed since mid-winter of seven before. For his sake she had been careful and honest, willing to forego all the small profits she could have put herself entitled to but if welch-do people were going to share her master's expenses, there would be no longer need for such austere integrity; and if things were to be rightly managed, Thomas Halliday might be made to bear the entire cost of the household during his mouth's visit on the Yorkshire system.

While Mrs. Woolger meditated upon her domestic state, the master of the domicile abandoned himself to reflections which were apparently of a very serious character. He brought a leathern desk to a side-table, unlocked it, and took out a quire of paper; but he made no further advance toward the writing of those letters on account of which he had dismissed his housekeeper. He sat, with his elbows on the table, nibbling the end of a wooden pen-holder, and staring at the opposite wall. His face looked pale and haggard in the light of the gas, and the eyes, fixed in that vacant stare, had a feverish brightness.

Mr. Sheldon was a handsome man—eminently handsome, according to the popular notion of masculine beauty; and if the popular ideal has been a little vulgarized by the waxen gentlemen on whose finely-moulded foreheads the wig-maker is wont to display the specimens of his art, that is no discredit to Mr. Sheldon. His features were regular; the nose a handsome aquiline; the mouth firm and well moulded; the chin and jaw rather heavier than in the waxen ideal of the hair-dresser; the forehead very prominent in the region of the perceptives, but obviously wanting in the higher faculties. The eye of the phrenologist, unaided by his fingers, must have failed to discover the secret of Mr. Sheldon's organization; for one of the dentist's strong points was his hair, which was very luxuriant, and which he wore in artfully-arranged masses that passed for curls, but which owed their undulating grace rather to a skillful manipulation than to any natural tendency. It has been said that the rulers of the world are straight-haired men; and Mr. Sheldon might have been a Napoleon as far as regards this special attribute. His hair was of a dense black, and his whiskers of the same sombre hue. He carefully cultivated whiskers were another of the dentist's strong points; and the third strong point was his teeth, the perfection of whose beauty, and were it little apt to suggest an unpleasant image of some sleek bridled creature crunching its provender in an Indian jungle. But they were handsome teeth notwithstanding, and their flashing whiteness made an effective contrast to the clear sallow tint of the dentist's complexion.

Mr. Sheldon was a man of industrious habits—a fond student of art, and distinguished by a persistent activity in the carrying out of any labor he had planned for himself. He was not prone to the indolent ease of idle cravers or agreeable day-dreams. Thought with him was labor; it was the "thinking out" of future work to be done, and it was an operation as precise and mathematical as the actual labor that resulted therefrom. The contents of his brain were as well kept as a careful trader's ledger. The bird his thoughts docketed and indexed, and rarely wasted the smallest portion of his time in searching for an idea. To-night he sat thinking until he was interrupted by a loud double-knock, which was evidently familiar to him, for he muttered "George!" pushed aside his desk, and took up his stand upon the hearth-rug, ready to receive the expected visitor.

There was the sound of a man's voice below—very like Philip Sheldon's own voice: then a quick firm tread on the stairs; and then the door was opened, and a man, who himself was very like Philip Sheldon, came into the room. This was the dentist's brother George, two years his junior. The likeness lasted when the two men were in no way marvelous, but it was nevertheless very obvious. You could scarcely have mistaken one man for the other, and the world hardly have failed to perceive that the two men were brothers. They resembled each other more closely in their manhood than in the years of the same height—both tall and strongly built; they had both black eyes with a hazy brightness in them, black, curly hair, and rather hairy hands, with prominent knuckles, square finger-tops, and bony wrists. Each man seemed the personification of some one of the two distinct types of shaped in accordance with the prejudices of civilized life. Looking at these two men for the first time, you might approve or disapprove their appearance; they might impress you favorably or unfavorably; but you could scarcely fail to be reminded vaguely of strong, bright-eyed, savage creatures, beautiful and graceful after their kind, but dangerous and fierce to men.

The brothers greeted each other with a friendly nod. They were a great deal too practical to waste time in any demonstration of fraternal affection. They liked each other very well, and were useful to each other, and took their pleasure together when they could; but even when they were weak enough to waste time upon unprofitable pleasures but neither of them would have comprehended the possibility of any thing beyond this.

"Well, old fellow," said George, "I'm glad you're back again. You're looking rather seedy, though. I suppose you knocked about a good deal down there?"

"I had a spell or two of it with Halliday and the old set. He's going to rather fast."

"Humph!" muttered Mr. Sheldon the younger; "it's a pity he's such a muff, for he'll never go off the hooks altogether, so that you might marry George."

"How do I know that George would have me, if he did leave her a widow?" asked Philip, dubiously.

"Oh, she'd have you fast enough. She used to be very sweet upon you before she married Jack; and even if she'd forgotten all that she'd have you if you asked her. She'd be afraid to say no. She was always more or less afraid of you, wasn't she, Phil."

"I don't know about that. She was a nice little thing enough; but she knew how to drop a poor sweet-heart like a hot cake up with a rich one in spite of her simplicity."

"Oh, that was the old parties' doing. George would have jumped at her directly, only he couldn't oil if her mother and father had told her she must do it. Don't you remember when we were children together how he used to be used to be spoiling her frocks? I don't believe she married Tom Halliday of her own free-will any more than she stood at the altar with her own frock-off after she'd torn her frock, as I've seen her stand twenty times. She stood in the corner because they told her she must, and she married Tom for the same reason, and I don't suppose she's been particularly happy with him."

"Well, that's her look-out, isn't it, Phil," glumly; "I know I want a rich wife badly enough. Things are about as bad with me as they can be."

"I suppose they are rather pisacorial. The elderly dowagers don't come up to time, eh? Very few orders for dentistry sent at two-pound-ten?"

"I took about seventy pounds last year," said the dentist, "and my expenses are something like five pounds a week. I've been making up the deficiency out of my capital. It's the way business, thinking I should be able to stand out and make a connection; but the connection gets more discouraging every day. Competition seems to me at first for the novelty of the thing, for I had a sprinkling of decent patients for the first twelve months or so, and I dare say might as well throw my money into the gutter as spend it on circulars or advertisements."

"And a young man requires a few thousand pounds and something amiss with her jaw hasn't turned up yet."

"Yes, nor an old woman either. I wouldn't kick at the age if they were not ugly," answered Mr. Sheldon, bitterly.

The young man shrugged his shoulders and plunged his hands into his trowers-pockets with a gesture of serio-comic despair. He was in the livelier of the two moods—a light-hearted sort of dress and talk and manner, a certain "horsey" style, very different from his elder brother's studied respectability and constant gravity. He had the reputation of a loose sporting cut, and always odorous with stale tobacco. He wore a good deal of flashy jewelry in his hands and about his person, gilding lockets and fusee-boxes; his whiskers were more obtrusive than his brother's, and he wore a mustache in addition—a thick, ragged, black mustache, which would have become a guerrilla chieftain rather than a gentleman amid the peaceful associations of Gray's Inn. His position as a lawyer was not much better than that of Philip as a dentist; he had been called to the bar a couple of years before, but hoped to win for himself a larger fortune than is often made in the Law. He was a keen sportsman, and possessed a bit-and-bridle of fabulous price, a joiner of broken links, a kind of legal resurrectionist, a digger in the dust and ashes of the past; and he expected in due time to dig up a treasure rich enough to reward the labor and patience of half a lifetime.

"Well, George," said Philip, "I'm very glad you've come back. You're looking rather well, though I suppose you knocked about a good deal down there?"

making numerous notes in a thick little oblong memorandum-book, until the Bloomsbury clock struck three.

CHAPTER III.

MR. AND MRS. HALLIDAY.

MR. SHELDON'S visitors arrived in due course. They were provincial people of the middle-class, accounted monstrously genteel in their own neighborhood, but in nowise resembling Londoners of the same rank.

Mr. Thomas Halliday was a big, loud-spoken, good-tempered Yorkshireman, who had inherited a comfortable little estate from a plodding, money-making father, and for whom life had been very easy. He was a farmer, and nothing but a farmer; a man for whom the supremest pleasure of existence was a cattle-show or a country horse-fair. The farm upon which he had been born and brought up was situated about six miles from Barlingford, and all the delights of his boyhood and youth were associated with that small market-town. He and the two Sheldons had been school-fellows, and afterward boon companions, having such pleasure as was obtainable in Barlingford together; flirting with the same provincial beauties at prim tea-parties in the winter, and getting up friendly parties in the summer—picnics at which eating and drinking were the leading features of the day's entertainment. Mr. Halliday had always regarded George and Philip Sheldon with that reverential admiration which a stupid man, who is conscious of his own mental inferiority, generally feels for a clever friend and companion. But he was also fully aware of the advantage which a rich man possesses over a poor one, and would not have exchanged the fertile acres of Hyley for the intellectual glories of the Sheldon children. He found the substantial value of his handsomely-furnished house and well-stocked farm when he and his friend Philip Sheldon became suitors for the hand of Georgian Craddock, youngest daughter of a Barlingford attorney, who lived next door to the Barlingford doctor's friend and client, father. Philip and the girl had been play-fellows in the long walled gardens behind the two houses, and there had been a friendly and masterly intimacy between the juvenile members of the two families. But when Philip and Georgiana met at the Barlingford tea-parties in later years the parental powers frowned upon any renewal of that childish friendship. Miss Craddock had no fortune, and the wealthy solicitor for whom she was a prudent man, who was apt to look for the promise of domestic happiness in the plate-basket and the tea-pot-rather than in the more superficial qualifications as black whiskers and white teeth. So poor Philip was "thrown over the bridge," as he said himself, and George Craddock married Mr. Halliday, with all attendant ceremony and splendor, according to the "lights" of Barlingford society.

But this provincial bride's story was no passionate record of sighs and tears. The Barlingford juliet had liked Romeo as much as she was capable of liking any one; but when Papa Capulet insisted on her union with Paris she accepted her destiny with decent resignation, and in the absence of any sympathetic father confessor, wife fain to seek consolation from a more abundant individual in the person of the Barlingford milliner. Nor did Philip Sheldon give evidence of any extravagant despair. His father was something of a doctor as well as a dentist; and there were plenty of dark little vials lurking on the shelves of his surgery in which the young man could have found "mortal drugs" without the aid of the apothecary, had he been so minded. But there was no such desperate act ever occurred to him in connection with his grief. He held himself sulkily aloof from Mr. and Mrs. Halliday for some time after their marriage, and allowed people to see that he considered himself very hardly used; but prudence, which had always been Philip Sheldon's counselor, proved herself also his consoler in this crisis of his life. A careful consideration of his own interests led him to persuade himself that the successful result of love-suit would have been about the worst thing that could have happened to him.

George had no money. All was said in that. As the young dentist's philosophy of this world discovered that the influence of experience which proceeds from the early ease of the full man in Barlingford was something like that of a canary-bird in which imbibes a clean cage and is supplied with abundance seed and water. The cage is eminently comfortable, and the sleepy, respectable bird sees light for no better abiding-place, no wider prospect than that small bit of the universe which he sees between the bars. But now and then there is hatched a wild young fledgling, which beats its wings against the inexorable wires, and would fain soar away into that wide outer world, to prosper or perish in its freedom.

Before George had been married a year her sometime lover had fully resigned himself to the existing state of things, and was on the best possible terms with his friend Tom. He could eat his dinner in the comfortable house at Hyley with an excellent appetite; for there was a gulf between him and his old love far wider than any Rubicon whose dog by that ceremony in the parish church of Barlingford. Philip Sheldon had awakened to the consciousness that life in his native town was little more than a kind of animal vegetation—the life of some pulpy invertebrate creature, which sprawls helplessly upon the sands wherein the wave has deposited it, and may be cloven in half without feeling it. Self naturally worse for the operation. He had awakened to the knowledge that there was a wider and more agreeable world beyond that little provincial township; that a handsome face and figure and a vigorous intellect were commodities for which there must be some kind of market.

Once convinced of the utter worthlessness of his prospects in Barlingford, Mr. Sheldon turned his eyes Londonward; and his father happening at this time very conveniently to depart this life, Philip, the son and heir, disposed of the business to an aspiring young practitioner, and came to the metropolis, where he made that future attempt to establish himself which has been described.

The dentist had wasted four years in London, and nine years since George's wedding-day, finding; and now for the first time he had an opportunity of witnessing the domestic happiness for the donment misery of the man who had jilted him, and the man who had been his successful rival. He set himself to watch them with the cool attention of a natural naturalist, and he experienced very little difficulty in the performance of this moral dissection. They were established in the habit of his companions at every meal; and they were the kind of people who discuss their grievances and indulge in their "little differences" with perfect freedom in the presence of a third, or a fourth, or even a fifth party.

Mr. Sheldon was wise enough to preserve a strict neutrality. He would take up a newspaper at the beginning of a little difference, and lay it down when the little difference was finished, with the most perfect assumption of unconsciousness; but it is doubtful whether the matrimonial disputants were much more appreciative of this good-breeding. They would have liked to have had Mr. Sheldon for a court of appeal; and sometimes when one of them would have given gest to their quarrels. Meanwhile Philip watched them slyly from the covert of his newspaper, and formed his own conclusions about them. If he was pleased to see his false love's path was not entirely rose-bestrewn, or if he rejoiced to find that the married state's severance of his rival, he allowed no evidence of his pleasure to appear in his face or manner.

Georgiana Craddock's rather pale prettiness had developed into matronly comeliness. Her complexion was still pink enough to last none of their freshness. Her mouth was what was as soft and bright as it had been when she had studied hypogrynth with Barlingford tea-party in the days of her spinsterhood. She was a pretty, weak little woman, whose education had never gone beyond the routine of a provincial boarding-school, and who thought that she had attained all necessary wisdom in having mastered French exercises and Italian grammars, histories and the rudiments of the French language. She was a woman who thought that the perfection of feminine accomplishment was expressive dress and a conspicuous gold chain. She was a woman who considered a well-furnished house and a liberal cook the highest form of earthly splendor or prosperity.

This was the shallow commonplace creature whom Tom Halliday had loved and married and wooed. He looked at her now, and wondered how he could ever have felt even as much as he had felt for the pretty girl who had been his fiancée to devote to any such abstract and useless consideration. He had his own affairs to think about, and had no time for sentiment.

In the mean time Mr. and Mrs. Halliday occupied themselves in the pursuit of pleasure or business, as the case might be. They were eager for amusement: went to exhibitions in the day and to theatres at night, and came home in every little quarrel in Fitzgerald's time, after which Mr. Halliday was wont to waste the small hours in friendly conversation with his quondam companion, and in the consumption of much brandy-and-water.

Unhappily for poor George, these halcyon days were brief, and were followed by storm and cloud. The weak little woman was afflicted with that intermittent fever called jealousy; and the stalwart Yorkshireman in a fit of anger who can scarcely give the time of day to a feminine acquaintance without some orate and loud-spoken gallantry. The dentist had abundant resources wherewith to beguile the tedium of his life prosperously, he was fain to seek pleasure in the companionship of his friends, and thus he thus become a haunter of tavern-parlors and small race-courses, being always ready for any amusement his friends proposed to him. It fell lowed, therefore, that he was very often absent from his comfortable home and his pretty weak-minded wife. And poor George had ample food for her jealous fears and suspicions; for when she was left alone to dine and sup as seldom at home? She had never been particularly fond of her husband, but that was no reason why she should not be miserable when he was about him; and her jealousy betrayed itself in a peevish worrying fashion, which was harder to bear than the vengeful fervors of a Spanish mantra. It was in vain that Thomas Halliday and those jolly good fellows his friends and companions attended the Barlingford race-meetings, courses, and the perfect purity of that smoky atmosphere peculiar to tavern-parlors. George's suspicions were always ready for refutation; but they were nevertheless sufficient ground for all the alternations of temper—from stolid sullenness to provide hysterics, from reproachful lamentations to loud hysterics—to which the female temperament is liable.

In the mean time poor honest, loud-spoken Tom did all in his power to demonstrate his truth and devotion. He bought his wife many stiff silk-gowns and gaudy Barlingford bonnets as she chose to sigh for. He made a will, in which she was sole legatee, and insured his life in different offices to the amount of five thousand pounds.

"I'm the sort of fellow that's likely to go off the looks suddenly, you know, George," he said, "and your poor dad was always anxious I should make things regular for you. I don't suppose you're likely to marry again, my lass, so I've no need to tie up Lottie's little fortune. I must trust some one, and I'd better confide in my own little wife than in some canting methodistical fellow of a trustee, who would speculate my daughter's money upon some Stock-Exchange hazard, and levant to Australia when it was all swamped. If you can't trust me, George, I'll let you see that I can trust you," added Tom, reproachfully.

Whereupon poor weak little Mrs. Halliday mentally and hysterically that she did not want fortunes or life-insurances, but that she wanted her husband to stay at home, content with the calm and peaceful delights of his own fireside. Poor Tom was wont to promise amendment, and would keep his promise faithfully so long as no extreme temptation in the shape of a first-rate some friend of the jolly-good-fellow species, arose to vanquish his good resolutions. But a good-natured, open-handed, hospitable young man who farms his own land, has three or four good horses in his stable, a decent cellar of honest port and sherry, and a very perfect freedom and stuff in the way of hock or claret—and a very comfortable balance at his banker's, finds it no very easy matter to shake off friends of the jolly-good-fellow fraternity. Is it not the speciality of "jolly dogs" to be "here again," whether you will or not?

In London Mr. Halliday found the spirit of jolly-dog-ism rampant. George Sheldon had always been a hospitable man in two brothers; and it was George who lured him from the safe shelter of Fitzgeorge Street and took him to mysterious lodgings in Soho, returned long after midnight, boisterous of manner and unsteady of gait, and with garments reeking of stale tobacco-smoke.

He was always good-tempered, even after these diabolical orgies on somewhat unknown Brocker-like premises, and only that there was no harm "'pon m' wor', ye know, ol' gur'! Geor' an' me—half-doz' oyst'r—c'gar—hot' p'l ale—isn't home," which excuses rather lacked force. When did any married man ever take more than half a dozen oysters—or take any undomestic pleasure in his own satisfaction? It is always those incorrigible bachelors, Thomas, Richard, or Henry, who hinder the unwilling Benedict from returning to the Lares and Penates.

Poor George was not to be pacified by protestations about oysters and cigars from the lips of a husband guilty of the blackest of utterance, and who betrayed a general imbecility of mind and unsteadiness of body. This London excursion, which had begun in sunshine, threatened to end in storm and darkness. George Sheldon and his set had taken possession of the young farmer; and George found his amusement in the long blasterous March evenings than to sit at her work under the flaming gas in Mr. Sheldon's drawing-room, with the gentleman—who rarely joined in the dissipations of his friend and his brother—occupied himself with mechanical dentistry in the chamber of torture below.

Fitzgeorge Street in general, always on the watch for signs and symptoms of impecuniosity or doubtful morality on the part of any new citizen in particular, could find no food for scandal in the visit of Mr. and Mrs. Halliday to their friend and countryman. It had been noised abroad, through the agency of Mrs. Woolper, that Mr. Sheldon had come down for the lady's hand, and had been jilted by her. The Fitzgeorgians had been, therefore, especially on the alert to detect any sign of backsliding in the dentist. There would have been much pleasant discussion in kitchens and back-parlors if Mr. Sheldon had been guilty of anything prior to his fair guest; but it speedily became known, always by the agency of Mrs. Woolper and that phenomenon of idleness called "the Londy" (girl," that Mr. Sheldon was not by any means attentive to the pretty young woman from Yorkshire—but that he absolutely left her alone hour after hour in her husband's absence—with no amusement but her needle-work wherewith to "pass the time," while he himself smoked filed and polished those fragments of bone which were to assist in the renovation of decayed beauty.

The Londy, the maid of all, and Mrs. Halliday's visit was near its close, and as yet the young farmer had arrived at no decision as to the subject which had brought him to London. The sale of Hyley Farm was an accomplished fact; and the purchase-money duly bestowed at Tom's banker's. Lottie had been left alone toward finding the new property which was to be a substitute for the estate his father and grandfather had farmed before him. He had seen auctioneers, and had brought home plans of estates in Herefordshire and Devonshire, Cornwall and Somersetshire, which seemed to be, in their way, the most perfect things imaginable—the kind of such fertility as one would scarcely expect to find in this world—insulas—fee-stock which seemed beyond all price to be taken at a valuation—roads and surrounding neighborhood unparalleled for sociability and convenience—cabbuildings that must have been the very archetypes of farms and stabling—a house which to inhabit would be to adore. But as yet he had seen none of these peerless domains. He was waiting for a remittance in which to go down to the West and "look about him," as he said himself. In the mean time the bituminous March weather, with its sharp winds, its long railroad journeys, and all that waiting about at junctions and at little windy stations on branch lines, incidental to the inspection of estates scattered over a large area of country, served very well for "jolly-dog-ism"—and what with a hand at cards in George Sheldon's chambers, and another hand at cards in somebody else's chambers, and a run down to an early meeting at Newmarket, and a visit to some country house where there was something to be seen which was a near prize-fighting as the law allowed, and other evenings in unknown regions, Mr. Halliday found time slipping by him, and his domestic peace vanishing away.

It was on an evening at the end of this third week that Mr. Sheldon abandoned his mechanical dentistry for once in a way and ascended to the drawing-room, where poor Londy sat hugging with that eternal needle-work, but for which melancholy madness would surely overtake many desolate matrons in houses whom commonplace comfort and respectable dullness are more dismal than the picturesque dreariness of an unoated garret amidst the Libyan fens. To the masculine mind this needle-work seems nothing more than a purposeless stabbing and sewing of strips of calico; but to the feminine hood it is the prison-flower of the captive, it is the spider of Latude.

Mr. Sheldon brought his guest an evening newspaper.

"There's an account of the opening of Parliament," he said, "which you may like to look like to see. I wish I had a piano, or some female acquaintances to drop in upon you. I'm afraid you must be dull in these dreary evenings when Tom is out of the way."

"I am indeed dull," Mrs. Halliday answered, peevishly; "and if Tom cared for me, he wouldn't leave me like this evening after evening. But he doesn't care for me."

Mr. Sheldon laid down the newspaper, and seated himself opposite his guest. He sat for a few minutes in silence, because time is an imaginary air with the tips of his fingers on the old-fashioned mahogany table. Then he said, in a half-absent way upon his face—

"But surely Tom is the best of husbands! He has been a little wild since his coming to London, I dare say; but then you see he doesn't often come to town."

"He's just as bad in Yorkshire," Georgy answered, pettishly. "He is always going to Barlingford with somebody or other, or to meet some of his old friends. I'm sure, if I had known what he was I would never have married him."

"Why, I thought he was such a good husband. He was telling me only a few days ago how he had resolved to will leaving your reference he possesses, without reservation, and how he has insured his life for five thousand pounds."

"Oh, yes, I know that; but I don't call that being a good husband. I don't want him to leave me his money. I don't want him to die. I want him to stay at home."

"Poor Tom! I'm afraid he's not the sort of man for that kind of thing. He likes change and amusement. I've married a rich man, Mrs. Halliday; you made your choice, you know, without regard to the feelings of any one else. You sacrificed truth and honor to your own inclination, or your own interest, I do not know, and I do not ask which. If the bargain has turned out a bad one that's your look-out."

Philip Sheldon sat with his folded arms resting on the little table, and his eyes fixed on Georgy's face. They could be very stern and hard and cruel, those bright black eyes, and Mrs. Halliday grew first red and then pale under their searching gaze. She knew that Mr. Sheldon very often during the years of her married life, but this was the first time he had ever said any thing to her that sounded like a reproach. The dentist's eyes softened a little as he watched her, not with any special tenderness, but with the expression of half-philosophical compassion—such as a strong, stern man might feel for a foolish child. He could see that this woman was afraid of him, and afraid in his interests that she should fear him. He had a purpose in every thing he did, and his purpose was straight with the straight line of existence over Georgina Halliday. In the old time before her marriage that influence had been very strong. It was for him to discover now whether it still endured.

"You made your choice, Mrs. Halliday," he went on presently, "and it was a choice which all prudent people must have approved. What chance had you of being the wife of a practice worth four or five hundred pounds a year, assisted the inheritor of Hyley Farm, with its two hundred and fifty acres, and three hundred pounds worth of live-stock, plant, and working capital? When do the prudent people ever stop to consider truth and honor, or still more, any affection that dates from childhood? They calculate every thing by pounds, shillings, and pence; and according to their method of reckoning you were in the right when you jilted me to marry Tom Halliday."

George laid down her work and took out her handkerchief. She was one of those women who take refuge in tears when they find themselves at a disadvantage. A child always melted honest Tom, was his wrath never so dire, and tears would no doubt subdue Philip Sheldon.

But Georgy had to discover that the dentist was made of a stuff very different from that of her easy-going, unsuspicious, and hitherto good-tempered farmer. Mr. Sheldon watched her tears with the cold-blooded deliberation of a scientific experimentalist. He was glad to find that he could make her cry. She was a necessary instrument in the working out of certain plans that he had formed in his own mind; he was anxious to discover whether she was likely to be a plastic instrument. He knew that her love for him had always been worth much at its best, and that the poor little flickering flame had been utterly extinguished by nine years of commonplace domesticity and petty jealousy. But his purpose was one that would be served as well by her fear as by her love, and he had set himself to-night to gauge his power in relation to this poor weak creature.

"I am very tired of you to say such dreadful things, Mr. Sheldon," she whimpered presently; "you know very well that my marriage with Tom was pa's doing, and not mine. I'm sure if I'd known how he would stay out night after night, and come home in such dreadful states time after time, I never would have consented to marry him."

"Wouldn't you? Oh yes, you would! If you were a widow to-morrow, and free to marry again, you would choose just such another man as Tom—a man who laughs loud, and pays flourishing compliments, and drives a gig with a highstepping horse in it. That's the sort of man women like, and that's the sort of man you'd marry."

"I'm sure I shouldn't marry at all," answered Mrs. Halliday, in a tone that did not suit her little gasping sobs. "I have seen enough of the misery of married life. But I don't want Tom to die, indeed, as he is me. People are always saying that he won't make old bones—how horrid it is to talk of a person's bones!—and I'm sure I've sometimes made myself wretched about him, as he knows, though he doesn't thank me for it."

And here Mrs. Halliday's sobs got the better of her utterance, and Mr. Sheldon was fain to say something of a consolatory nature.

"Come, come," he said, "I won't tease you any more. That's against the laws of hospitality, isn't it? Surely there are some things which you can't expect a man to forget, you know. However, let by-gones be by-gones. As for poor old Tom, I'm sure he'll live to be a hale, hearty old man, in spite of the crackers. People always will croak about something; and it's a kind of fashion to say that a big, merry, six-foot man is a fragile blossom likely to be nipped by any wintry blast. Come, come, Mrs. Halliday, your husband mustn't discover that I've been making you cry when he comes home. He may be home early this evening, perhaps; and if he is, we'll have an oyster supper and a chat about old times."

Mrs. Halliday shook her head dolefully.

"It's past ten o'clock already," she said, "and I don't suppose Tom will be home till after twelve. He doesn't like my sitting up for him; but I wonder what time he would come home if I didn't sit up for him?"

"Let's hope for the best," exclaimed Mr. Sheldon, cheerfully. "I'll go and see about the oysters."

"Don't get them for me or for Tom," protested Mrs. Halliday; "he will have had his supper when he comes home, you may be sure, and I couldn't eat a morsel of any thing."

To this resolution Mrs. Halliday adhered; so the dentist was fain to abandon all jovial ideas in relation to oysters and pale ale. But he did not go back to his mechanical dentistry. He sat opposite his visitor, and watched her, silently and thoughtfully, for some time as she worked. She had been hard at work for hours, but she looked very peevish and miserable, and took out her watch several times in an hour. Mr. Sheldon made two or three feeble attempts at conversation, but the talk languished and expired on each occasion, and they sat on in silence.

Little by little the dentist's attention seemed to wander away from his guest. He wheeled his chair round and sat looking at the fire, with the same fixed gloom upon his face which had darkened it on the night of his return from Yorkshire. Things had been so desperate with him of late that he had lost his old orderly habit of thinking out a business at one sitting, and making an end of all deliberation and hesitation about it. There were subjects that forced themselves upon his thoughts, and certain ideas which repeated themselves with a stupid persistence. He was such an eminently practical man that this disorder of his brain troubled him more even than the thoughts that made the disorder. He sat in the same attitude for a long while, scarcely conscious of Mrs. Halliday's presence, not at all conscious of the progress of time.

George had been right in her gloomy forebodings of bad behavior on the part of Mr. Halliday. It was nearly one o'clock when a loud double knock announced that gentleman's return. The wind had been howling dreadfully, and a sharp, slanting rain had been pattering against the windows for the last half hour, while Mrs. Halliday's breast had been racked by the contending emotions of anxiety and indignation.

"I suppose he couldn't get a cab," she exclaimed, as the knock startled her from her bewildering attitude; for however intently a midnight watcher may be listening for the returning wanderer's knock, it is not the less startling when it comes. "And he is not walked home through the wet, and now he'll have a violent cold, I dare say," added George, peevishly.

"That it's lucky for him he's in a doctor's house," answered Mr. Sheldon, with a smile. He was a handsome man by no doubt, according to the popular idea of masculine perfection, but he had not a pleasant smile. "I went through the regular course, you know, and am as well able to see a patient safely through a cold or a fever as I am to make him a set of teeth."

Mr. Halliday burst into the room at this moment, singing a fragment of the "Chough and Crow" chorus, very much out of tune. He was in boisterously high spirits, and very little the worse for liquor. He had only walked from Covent Garden, he said, and had taken nothing but a tumbler of punch and a Welsh rarebit. He had been hearing the divinest singing—boys with the voices of angels—and had been eating his supper in a place which duchesses themselves did not disdain to peep at from the sacred recesses of a loge grillée, George Sheldon had told him. But poor country-bred Georgina Halliday would not believe in the duchesses, or the angelic singing-boys, or the primitive simplicity of Welsh rarebits. She had a vision of beautiful women, and hails of dazzling light; where there was the loud music of trumpets and post-horn galops, with a riotous accompaniment of huzzas, and the popping of Champagne corks; where the sheen of satin and the glitter of gems bewildered the eye of the beholder. She had seen such a picture once on the stage, and had vaguely associated it with all Tom's midnight roysterings ever afterward.

The roysterer's garments were very wet, and it was in vain that his wife and Philip Sheldon entreated him to change them for dry ones, or to go to bed immediately. He stood before the fire relating his innocent adventures, and trying to dispel the cloud from George's fair young brow; and, when he did at last consent to go to his room, the dentist shook his head ominously.

"You'll have a severe cold to-morrow, depend upon it, Tom, and you'll have yourself to thank for it," he said, as he bade the good-tempered reprobate good-night.

"Never mind, old fellow," answered Tom; "if I am ill, you shall nurse me. If one is doomed to die by doctor's stuff, it's better to have a doctor one does know than a doctor one doesn't know for one's executioner."

After which graceful piece of humor Mr. Halliday went blundering up the staircase, followed by his aggrieved wife.

Philip Sheldon stood on the landing looking after his visitors for some minutes. Then he went slowly back to the sitting-room, where he replenished the fire, and seated himself before it with a newspaper in his hand.

"What's the use of going to bed if I can't sleep?" he muttered, in a discontented tone. He would be well again, and there would be more midnight roysterings, and he would be again tormented by that vision of lighted halls and beautiful diabolical creatures revolving madly to the music of the Post-horn Galop.

It seemed, however, that poor jealous Mrs. Halliday was to be spared her nightly agony for some time to come. Tom's cold lasted longer than he had expected, and the cold was succeeded by a low fever—a bilious fever, Mr. Sheldon said. There was not the least occasion for alarm, of course. The invalid and the invalid's wife trusted implicitly in the friendly doctor, who assured them both that Tom's attack was the most ordinary kind of thing; a little wearing, no doubt, but entirely without danger. He had to repeat this assurance very often to Georgy, whose angry feelings had given place to extreme tenderness and affection now that Tom was an invalid, quite unfitted for the society of jolly good-fellows, and willing to receive basins of beef-tea and arrow-root meekly from his wife's hands, instead of those edibles of iniquity, oysters and toasted cheese.

Mr. Halliday's illness was very tiresome. It was one of those perplexing complaints which keep the patient himself, and the patient's friends and attendants, in perpetual uncertainty. A little worse one day, and a shade better the next; now gaining a little strength, now losing a trifle more than he had gained; the patient declined

MRS. HALLIDAY IS REPROACHED.

CHAPTER IV.

A PERPLEXING ILLNESS.

MR. SHELDON'S prophecy was fully realized. Tom Halliday awoke the next day with a violent cold in his head. Like most boisterous people, he was a bad patient, and he was the veriest craven in the hour of physical ailment; so he succumbed at once to the malady which a man obliged to face the world and fight for his daily bread must needs have made light of.

The dentist rallied his invalid friend.

"Keep your bed, if you like, Tom," he said, "but there's no necessity for any such coddling. Keep your hands out, and your tongue; rather queer, I may as well give you a saline draught. You'll be all right by dinner-time, and I'll get George to look round in the evening for a hand at cards."

Tom obeyed his profession and friend—took his medicine, read the paper, and slept away the best part of the dull March day. At half past five he got up and dressed for dinner, and the evening passed very pleasantly; so pleasantly, indeed, that Georgy was half inclined to wish that her husband might be afflicted with chronic influenza, whereby he would be compelled to stop at home. She sighed when Philip Sheldon slapped his friend's broad shoulder, and told him cheerily that he would be "all right to-morrow," in an imperceptible manner, and it was only when he had been all three weeks, and was no longer able to leave his bed, and had lost alike his appetite and his spirits, it was then only that Georgy awoke to the fact that this illness, hitherto considered so lightly, must be very serious.

"I think, if—if you have no objection, I should like to see another doctor, Mr. Sheldon," she said, one day, with considerable embarrassment of manner. She feared to offend her host by any doubt of his skill. "You see—you—you are so much employed with teeth—and—of course you know I am quite assured of your talent—but don't you think that a doctor who had more experience in fever cases might bring Tom round quicker? He has been ill so long now; and really he doesn't seem to get any better."

Philip Sheldon shrugged his shoulders.

"As you please, my dear Mrs. Halliday," he said, carelessly; "I don't wish to press my services upon you. It is quite a matter of friendship, you know, and I shall not profit six-pence by my attendance on poor old Tom. Call in another doctor, by all means, if you think fit to do so; but, of course, in that event, I must withdraw from the case. The man you call in may be clever, or he may be stupid and ignorant. It's all a chance, when one doesn't know one's man; and I really can't advise you upon that point, for I know nothing of the London profession."

Georgy looked alarmed. This was a new view of the subject. She had fancied that all regular practitioners were clever, and had only doubted Mr. Sheldon because he was not a regular practitioner. But how if she were to withdraw her husband from the hands of a clever man to deliver him into the care of an ignorant pretender, simply because she was over-anxious for his recovery?

"I always am foolishly anxious about things," she thought.

And then she looked piteously at Mr. Sheldon, and said:

"What do you think I ought to do? Pray tell me! He has eaten no breakfast again this morning; and even the cup of tea which I persuaded him to take seemed to disagree with him. And then there is that dreadful sore throat which torments him so. What ought I to do, Mr. Sheldon?"

"Whatever seems best to yourself, Mrs. Halliday," answered the dentist, earnestly. "It is a subject upon which I can not pretend to advise you. It is a matter of feeling rather than of reason, and it is a matter which you yourself must decide upon. If I knew any man whom I could honestly recommend to you it would be another affair, but I don't. Tom's illness is the simplest thing in the world, and I feel myself quite competent to pull him through it, without fuss or bother; but if you think otherwise, pray put me out of the question. There's one fact, however, of which I am bound to remind you. Like many fine, big, stalwart fellows of his stamp, your husband is as nervous as a hysterical woman; and if you call in a stranger doctor, who will pull long faces, and put on the professional solemnity, the chances are that he'll take alarm, and do himself more mischief in a few hours than your new adviser can undo in as many weeks."

There was a little pause after this. Georgy's opinions, and suspicions, and anxieties were alike vague; and this last suggestion of Mr. Sheldon's put things in a new and alarming light. She was really anxious about her husband, but she had been accustomed all her life to accept the opinion of other people in preference to her own.

"Do you really think that Tom will soon be well and strong again?" she asked, presently.

"If I thought otherwise I should be the first to advise other measures. However, my dear Mrs. Halliday, call in some one else, for your own satisfaction."

"No," said Georgy, sighing plaintively, "it might frighten Tom. You are quite right, Mr. Sheldon; he is very nervous, and the idea that I was alarmed might alarm him. I'll trust in you. Pray try to bring him round again. You will try, won't you?" she asked, in the childish pleading way which was peculiar to her.

The dentist was searching for something in the drawer of a table, and his back was turned upon that anxious questioner.

"You may depend upon it I'll do my best, Mrs. Halliday," he answered, still busy at the drawer.

Mr. Sheldon the younger had paid many visits to Frigmore Street during Tom Halliday's illness. George and Tom had been the Damon and Pythias of Barlingford; and George seemed really distressed when he found his friend changed for the worse. The changes in the invalid were so puzzling, the alternations from better to worse, and from worse to better so frequent, that fear could take no hold upon the minds of the patient's friends. It seemed such a very slight affair this low fever, that each sufficiently inconvenient to the patient himself, who suffered a good deal from thirst and sickness, and showed an extreme disinclination for food, all which symptoms Mr. Sheldon said were the commonest and simplest features of a very mild attack of bilious fever, which would be over Tom a better man than it had found him.

There had been several pleasant little card-parties during the earlier stages of Mr. Halliday's illness; but within the last week the patient had been too low and weak for cards; too weak to read the newspaper, or even to bear having it read to him. When George came to look at his old friend, "to cheer you up a little, old fellow! you know," and so on, he found Tom, for the time being, past all capability of being cheered, even by the genial society of his favorite jolly-good-fellow, or by tidings of a steeplechase in Yorkshire, in which a neighbor had been concerned as "gentleman rider."

"That chap up stairs seems rather queerish," George had said to his brother, after finding Tom lower and weaker than usual. "He's in a bad way, isn't he, Phil?"

"No; there's nothing serious the matter with him. He's only low-spirited, that's all."

"Rather low!" echoed George Sheldon. "He seems to me so very low that he can't sink much lower without going to the bottom of his grave. I'd call some one in if I were you."

The dentist shrugged his shoulders, and made a little contemptuous noise with his lips.

"If you knew as much of doctors as I do you wouldn't be in any hurry to call one in except to be mercy of one," he said, carelessly. "Don't you alarm yourself about Tom. He's right enough. He's been in a state of chronic indigestion and overdrinking for the last ten years, and this bilious fever will be the making of him."

"Will it?" said George, doubtfully; and then there followed a little pause, during which the brothers happened to look at each other furtively, and happened to surprise each other in the act.

"I don't mean overeating or drinking," said George, presently; "but something has disagreed with Tom Halliday, that's very evident."

Purify the Blood.

If the blood be pure, the body, which is formed from and by the blood, can not be diseased. But if there be in any part of the body any affection, such as a boil or ulcer, even a bruise, the blood circulating through that part takes in impure matter from the local affection and carries it into the general system. This is the cause often or sudden death to persons of full habit afflicted with boils and ulcers, and who use any medicine: the matter gets into the circulating system and chokes up the fine blood vessels which supply the brain with vitality, and life ceases as if

Bereft by Lightning.

Now this can be remedied.

We publish below an extract from one of our numerous compliments received, with a view of inspiring confidence in the minds of those who may have been deceived by some of the swindling schemes which imitate our business:

"FORT LYON, October 8, 1866.

"J. H. WINSLOW & CO.: Gents,—There have been quite a number of men sent here for Jewelry, &c., from this place to New York and other places; and, so far, have only found J. H. WINSLOW & CO. honest and truthful in that business. Every thing that has been sent for has come of the proper size, and is exactly what it was represented to be. There has been no other Jewelry business that could be bought for less than double the money it cost.

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE COMPANY'S HIGHEST PREMIUM

WONDERFUL SIMPLICITY.

DURABILITY. CAPACITY.

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines,

Incomparably the best for Family Use.

No. 585 Broadway, New York.

THEIR SUPERIORITY VINDICATED BY THE VERDICT OF AUTHORITIES.

GOLD MEDAL. Fair Maryland Institute, 1866.
ALL THE HIGHEST PREMIUMS at the Maryland Institute, New York and Pennsylvania State Fairs in 1866, over all competitors. Only one given to a Manufacturing Machine at the New York State Fair.

WERE AWARDED

After a most severe and impartial test, TO THE ELLIPTIC LOCK STITCH MACHINE, as follows:

At the Maryland Institute Fair, as the

"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,"

And at the New York State Fair as the

"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,"

"BEST SEWING MACHINE FOR GENERAL PURPOSE."

(These two completely covering all the ground),

And for the above,

"BEST SAMPLE OF SEWING MACHINE WORK."

As each of these Awards followed comprehensive and conclusive report of the committee of practical and experienced mechanical experts appointed by the Judges' Board to investigate into the merits of the different Sewing Machines.

"We, the Committee on Sewing Machines, after a careful and thorough examination of, and the respective merits of the various machines submitted for examination, find the ELLIPTIC LOCK-STITCH machine to be superior to all others in the following points, namely:

"Simplicity of Construction and Mechanical Construction.

"Ease of Operation and Management.

"Noiselessness and Rapidity of Movement.

"Beauty, Accuracy, and Quality of Stitch.

"Variety and Perfection of Attachments, and Range of Work.

"Compactness and Beauty of Model and Finish.

"Adaptability of Capacity of any thickness by an Adjustable Feed Bag, and in the Unequaled Precision with which it executes the Lock-Stitch, by means of the Elliptic Hook, and we therefore award it the First Premium as the

"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.

And also for the above reasons the First Premium as the

"BEST DOUBLE THREAD SEWING MACHINE

"C. E. PETERS,
"HECTOR TUFFAT, } Committee."

☞ The above report fully accords with the almost unanimous opinion of the best impartial judges and Sewing Machine experts, as well as of all others who have used this unrivaled machine, which is incomparably the most simple in construction; the most efficient in operation; the most easy, rapid, and durable to use; and the most complete in the variety and perfection of its fashionable Stitching and Embroidery; and therefore justly is the most perfect Family Sewing Machine, for which purposes it is recommended and unquestioned.

Machines (which are warranted for 5 years) are furnished to purchasers with printed instructions (which will enable any one to operate them without the slightest difficulty), on receipt of the price in current funds or by draft; or the machine will be sent to any part of the country, for examination, on receipt of satisfactory assurance that it will not be returned, and all orders from a distance will be faithfully filled as if a personal visit and selection had been made.

Liberal Arrangements are made with parties of energy, good standing, and capital, who may wish to engage in the sale of these machines, as agents, in such territory as yet remains unoccupied; for full particulars address as above, or call at the office, or private circular, address ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, No. 585 Broadway, New York.

An Autumn Suggestion.

Now, as heavy fogs arise and searching winds commence to blow; now, as the human body, exhausted like inanimate nature by the heats of summer, begins to wilt and droop; now, as the inclement weather makes its trying onset; NOW is the time for a preparatory course of the best acclimating medicine in existence,

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Fever and Ague is rampant in all parts of the country. Quinine, the physician admit, will not quell the phase of the disease which at present exists in the entire West. It is well that it is so, for the remedy (so-called) is deadlier than the malady. But if quinine is inefficient in intermittent fevers,

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS

Is irresistible. It would be safe to make a contract, under heavy penalties, that any one of the "new-and-Agne Distrist" should be exempted from the disorder for any particular time, provided every inhabitant would take the BITTERS according to direction during the term of the contract. There has never been an instance in which this sterling tonic and anti-malebrific medicine has failed to ward off the complaint, when taken duly as a protection against malaria. Hundreds of physicians have abandoned all the official specifics, and now prescribe this harmless vegetable tonic, and nothing else, as a preventive and cure for all the forms of chills and fever. Vigor is the thing so needful in these cases as well as in dyspepsia and nervous affections, and HOSTETTER'S BITTERS are the safest, surest, and most wholesome strengthening preparation that human skill has yet concocted.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

The Great American Tea Company.

Always a Wholesale Establishment.

We have many inquiries (10 to 20 letters a day) asking what discount we make to the Trade from our prices as published in the Price List. These are our lowest wholesale prices. We consider ourselves only a Wholesale Corporation, and we have but one price.

The way in which we came to break packages at all was, that during the high prices of Teas we furnished parties with packages as small as five pounds. Our time spread far and wide; and parties with requirements thought it very hard to be compelled to pay, elsewhere, double dollar per pound more than we were selling the same goods for, simply because they could not afford to buy five pounds or at one time. Therefore, in order to lighten these burdens, we consented to supply their wants in quantities as small as one pound at the wholesale prices.

Parties can make by ordering for goods to sell can have their orders put up in small packages to suit their trade, but we can not make any reduction in price, as our profits for the last six years have not averaged more than ten per pound.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the the great houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Clubbers.

1st. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

3d. The Importer makes a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

4th. On arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 5000 packages, at an average profit of about 40 per cent.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer for but a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

8th. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THAT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these eight profits as many brokerages, commissions, cranages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small stores.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and wholesale brokerages, cranages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing them to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of all. They are sold at the prices named the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

GRAND CHARITABLE FAIR

AND

PRESENTATION FESTIVAL

IN AID OF THE

HOME AND SCHOOL

FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF

The Destitute Children

OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THIS HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1863 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union: its sphere of usefulness is constantly increasing, the children now numbering upwards of 300, and daily are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied, solely for want of room to accommodate them. The old and valuable building on Fifty-eighth Street, New York, is now completely filled to overflowing, and the erection of such a Home as necessity demands; and this call is made upon the public with a feeling of confidence that the liberal and generous spirit of the American People will readily respond in the wants of the Little Ones, and that a noble edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, which shall stand as a lasting monument in the cause of humanity as a fitting rebuke to the fate mention that "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, to aid us in the good work we have undertaken to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

Mrs. General ULYSSES S. GRANT, President.
Mrs. CHAS. P. DALY, Acting President.
Mrs. Major-Gen. J. C. ROBINSON, 1st Vice-President.
Mrs. ROBERT FOSTER, 2d Vice-President.
Mrs. JOHN B. VOUDRES, Treasurer.
Mrs. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.
Mrs. WM. S. HILLIER, Corresponding Secretary.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with inflammation of the lungs, attended with a distressing cough. I had for some months previous been in the habit of preparing a cough syrup for the use of those of my flock who might require it, and as I chanced to be very much engaged at the time of the illness alluded to, I commenced making a small quantity of the article I had been previously accustomed to compound for those purposes. The result was highly gratifying. Within two days after the administration of the first teaspoonful, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. The success of this I sent around to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a severe cough, and was soon informed that she, too, had been entirely relieved with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces and was glad to say that in November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled."—Independent.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of seven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a sovereign remedy for diseased bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy it will be found valuable.

Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

CHOOSING THE WEDDING GOWN.

THE picture which we give on this page is that charming little scene from the "Vicar of Wakefield," "Choosing the Wedding Gown," as painted by MULREADY, and now among the treasures of South Kensington Museum, England.

It is twenty years ago that this picture was at the Academy Exhibition a constant source of surprise as well as delight. MULREADY had then been for above forty years an exhibiter at the Academy, yet here was a painting by him as fresh and unanticipated in conception and treatment as though the work of an unknown man. No symptom about it of mental torpor, of failing hand or eye, but full of life and spirit, as effective at a distance as when seen close, in color of gem-like depth and lustre, and in execution the perfection of unobtrusive finish. And that fair face—one such as youthful poets dream of, but very, very rarely even youthful painters transfer to canvas. In the cold, ever-lighted room at South Kensington the picture loses something of its attractiveness among so many larger and more pretentious works; but like Mrs. Primrose herself, it retains its hold on those who look "not for a fine glossy surface, but for such qualities as wear well."

The scene is the inside of a country draper's shop. The draper we see is a man well to do, and one who can afford to keep a good article. Deborah, Mrs. Primrose that is to be, is choosing for her wedding gown a peach-blossom silk, and is carefully scrutinizing its wearing qualities. She has already selected the bangings for the famous green bed, a pretty set of window curtains, and other household as well as wedding requisites; the sprig of orange-blossom laid on the piletypifying at once the purchase and the occasion. She has been long selecting, for the wedding gown is not the only article that she chooses for such qualities as would wear well, and her little spaniel has curled himself round at her feet and gone comfortably to sleep. The young Vicar, however, is heedless of the flight of time, for he finds ample occupation in watching the countenance of his charmer. And no wonder. "Cobl must be he who ever gazed impassive on her beauty." That comfortable-looking old mercer, who usually thinks far more of the beauty of his silks than he does of that of his customers, is evidently touched by the loveliness of our Deborah. See with what a gentle, admiring deference he is regarding her, while insisting on the excellent texture and color of the silk she is holding up to the light.

How, it may fairly be asked, did MULREADY, a man of sixty, succeed in producing so original a picture, and, for the first time, so lovely a face? The answer is obvious to any one who knew the man, or is acquainted with his history. He was always a student, always a learner. In his early pictures, while his drawing is invariably careful, it is often inaccurate. But he went on, year after year, drawing with unflagging diligence, and ever-increasing power, till he became not only, as Sir CHARLES EASTLAKE told the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the present state of the Royal Academy (1863), "the best and most judicious teacher the Academy has ever had," and "the best judge of the merits of drawing in this country;" but himself so skilled in drawing that, as CHARLES LANDSEER declared, "perhaps neither is there now, nor at any time has there been, so great a draughtsman as Mr. MULREADY." Most academicians, when they are elected visitors, cease to draw in the schools, contenting themselves with acting as teachers; but MULREADY continued to draw as diligently as the most ambitious of his pupils. "An admirable example for students," said Sir EDWIN LANDSEER, "his drawings are remarkable for their accuracy: every thing seems to be done upon oath by him; he can account for every touch, and he is a good anatomist." While, as a crowning testimony, we have his own statement of his practice from 1817, when he first acted as visitor, to 1868, when he gave his evidence: "I have from the first moment I became a visiter in the life school drawn there as if I were drawing for a prize." Surely here is a lesson the student, whatever be his pursuit, may profitably ponder. This thoroughness of study, it is almost needless to add, was not confined to drawing, but extended to all the technicalities of painting, as well as to the principles of art.

"CHOOSING THE WEDDING GOWN."—[FROM A PAINTING BY MULREADY.]

THE POPE'S VISIT TO THE EMPRESS CARLOTTA.

OUR readers have already been made acquainted with the unhappy termination of the Empress CARLOTTA's mission to Rome. Our engraving on page 764 represents the Holy Father paying a visit to the Empress shortly after her arrival in Rome. The Empress resided in the Hotel de Rome, on the Corso. Here the soldiers of the French and the Pontifical army took turns in guarding the entrance of the palace, and in accompanying the Empress to church and in her walks. Some days after, the Pope's visit was returned by the Empress. She had at the Vatican a very long and important interview on the subject of MAXIMILIAN'S Mexican Empire. It was on the occasion of this visit that she first exhibited symptoms of the malady with which she is now afflicted. The Empress is now under the most solicitous care at her chateau in Miramar, of which also we give an illustration on page 765.

EVACUATION DAY.

WE illustrate on page 761 WASHINGTON'S entrance to New York City, upon its evacuation by the British, November 25, 1783. Sir GUY CARLETON, the British Commander, received, on August 7, instructions to evacuate the city; but this event was delayed in order to make arrangements for the Tories who wished to leave the country.

On the morning of the 25th—a cold and frosty morning—the American troops, under Gen. KNOX, who had come down from West Point, and encamped at Harlem, marched to the Bowery Lane, and halted at the present junction of Third Avenue and Bowery. There they remained until one o'clock P.M., when the British left their posts and marched to Whitehall. The American troops followed, and before three o'clock Gen. KNOX took formal possession of Fort George amidst the acclamations of his men and the roar of artillery upon the Battery. The troops entered the city from the Bowery, through Chatham Street, in the following order: 1. A corps of light dragoons; 2. Advanced guard of light infantry; 3. A corps of artillery;

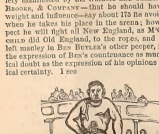
4. A battalion of light Infantry; 5. A battalion of Massachusetts troops, 6. Rear-guard.

WASHINGTON with his Staff, and Governor CLINTON with the State officers, soon afterward made a public entry. General WASHINGTON and Governor CLINTON, with their suite, led the advance, followed by the Lieutenant-Governor and the Members of the Council, four abreast. Then followed—in separate columns, eight abreast—the officers of the American army and the citizens, on horseback. The Speaker of the Assembly and the citizens on foot brought up the rear.

During the afternoon Governor CLINTON gave a dinner to the army officers at FRAUNCE'S TAVERN (now FRAUNCE HOUSE), the head-quarters of General WASHINGTON. In the evening the city was brilliantly illuminated. It was only a few days later that the principal officers of the army took a final leave of their beloved chief at FRAUNCE'S.

WINGLETS

FROM OUR "CORRESPONDENT ON-THE-WING."

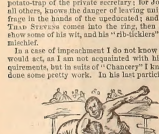


ROOM 1020, HOFFMAN HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Dear Harper's Weekly:

This epistle is about what I call "Fights to Come," and is suggested by the close proximity of a Congressman elect in the room two or three doors below me. Mr. MCCHARACTERISTICS, the School Commissioner—who, in the language of DICKENS, "had a genius for coming to the scratch, wherever and whatever it was, and proving himself an ugly customer"—has found a Peer in our Consumer JOHN ROGERS, elected to Congress from my district. As was the case with Mr. MCCHARACTERISTICS, so with JOHN, "he don't mean to be put upon;" subject whatever with his right, follow it up with his left, step, exchange, counter, bore his opponent to the ropes, and "fight it out on that line if it takes all summer." And so continue, he will be certain to "knock the wind out of common sense, and retard that unlucky adversary deaf to the call o' time."

I can imagine the great—and shall I say healthful? —change that must take place in discussing knotty questions in our hereditore wordy Congress. And as all politicians, more or less, owe their nominations first, and their elections secondly, to the operations of the "Ring," how appropriate that an ex-champion of the Ring should lend his countenance (though it is a little bruised and "smiling") to so great a gathering of the "Ring" leaders!



I see now, in my mind's eye, JOHN going through a course of training for his maiden speech, and the alacrity manifested by his trainers and backers—WOOD, BROOKS, & Co.—that he should have the proper weight and influence—say about 175 lbs avoirdupois when he takes his place in the arena; how they expect he will fight all New England, at MCCRACKENEUM did Old England, to the ropes, and lodge his left manley in Ben BERLIN'S other optic; and, finally, the expression of Ben's countenance as much a physical doubt as the expression of his opinions is a political certainty. I see with its usual "feints" and "counters;" and how, on the first intimation of "Negro Suffrage," he will let fly, straight on the shoulders his bunch of fives, caving in the clerk's bread-basket, and spoiling the points-map of the private secretary. For JOHN, above all others, knows the danger of leaving universal suffrage in the hands of the uneducated; and when old THAD STEVENS comes into the ring, then will JOHN show some of his wit, and his "rib-ticklers" will mean mischief.

JOHN PREPARED TO RECEIVE THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE,

In a case of impeachment I do not know how JOHN would act, as I am not acquainted with the legal requirements, but in suits of "Chancery" I know he has done some pretty work. In his last participation in

A CASE OF THIS KIND,

he spilled more "claret" and treated his client to more punches than ever was done by any tippling lawyer of modern times. How easily, in case the Chaplain of the House displeased him—which will, of course, be the case—can he send him to "prayers," and bring any temperance champion up "strippy" on the first round! and should any cowardly Southerner be lurking around, with his revolvers and bowies, for the purpose of commanding respect from Congressmen and obedience from waiters at the hotels, how would they be shamed by JOHN'S appearing two or three of the biggest waiters to "grass," and knocking the expostulating landlord completely off his "pins!"

JOHN SENDING A WAITER AFTER A "DROP."

The waiter very soon returns with "drops for you."

So long live the "RING," fistic and political! and your own

C. O. W.

P.S.—The following "adder" I think you had better publish in your widely-circulated paper; it may lead to some good:

"[Extract] MADAME MAX.—Left his home, the Hall of the Montezumas, an old man, of feeble mind, to-day, answers to the name of 'MAXIMILIAN,' and has an idea that he is a MEXICAN EMPEROR. It was noticed that his mind had been wandering lately, and it is feared his body has been doing the same thing. He left word that he was on the road to VERA CRUZ, aggravedly in a hurry, making good time. Had on what he left behind him, French pegtop pantaloons, with a few French coins in his pockets, a short-tail coat, and hankering with the Mexican style of tall. Any information concerning him will be thankfully received by his family and friends. Address quot-paid L. N., Tuileries, Paris, France."

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1866.

THE AMENDMENT AT THE SOUTH.

THE people have laid down a principle of restoration by which, of course, they are willing to stand. They have plainly declared that when passed by the States within the Union, and attempting to maintain the secession by force of arms are subdued, they may resume their relations in the Union only upon such conditions as they submit together with the fundamental principles of the Government, as may be determined by the loyal sentiment of the country represented in Congress during the first autumn elections. And as the conditions were at the same time announced, it becomes an interesting question what the States which attempted secession will do with it.

Several of them have already acted. The Legislatures of Texas and Georgia have rejected the proposed Amendment. The Governors of Mississippi, South Carolina, and Alabama have recommended the rejection. The old political leaders who dragged their section into the war adopt the same policy in the conventions. And the newspapers, the tone and manner of which are simply inconceivable to one who does not see them, disdain the Amendment as not humiliating enough. The people are persons in the unrepresented States who deprecate this folly of Governors, Legislatures, leaders, and editors in unison; but that the practical drift of public opinion can be ascertained only through such channels. So long as those who, for whatever reason, approve the Amendment can not control the Governors or a majority of the Legislatures, nor even organize to do so, we must regard what we see as the indication of the real state of feeling.

The objections to the Amendment are, that it was suggested by a Congress in which all the States were not represented; that it is destructive of State rights; and that it is humiliating to the people of the unrepresented States.

Now, to the first of these objections it should be enough to say that it begs the question. By the necessity of the case the States that remained loyal constituted Congress by their representatives. By an equal necessity they are the only judges of the conditions of restoration that may arise from the unrestricted return of the rebel States, just as they were bound to defend it from the consequences of the attempted secession. The authority for this lies not only in the nature of government itself and in common sense. It is found exactly where the authority to emancipate the slaves was found. Since Congress alone has the lawful force, Congress of the United States ever since certain States seceded, it has the same authority to propose amendments for the condition that any Congress ever had or ever can have. If it be not competent to propose a Constitutional Amendment, it is not competent to legislate; and if it be not competent to legislate because certain States are unrepresented, the entire legislation of the country for the last five years is invalid. If it be such a lawful Congress, the President is not a lawful President, and the Chief Justice confirmed by it is not a lawful Chief Justice. That is to say, if Congress be not lawful, we have no government in either of the States lately rebellious, and the whole country is in a state of confusion and defiance of their civil rights. The Amendment, in the first clause, simply says that as the Government of the United States is a supreme authority in its sphere, and has power which ever shall presume to deprive its citizens of civil rights. When the Governors of the unrepresented States say that this is a blow at State rights, they forget that they are speaking from the old and now obsolete Southern theory that the Constitution is a mere treaty between sovereign States and the Union a common servant of many masters. They must now understand that the people of the Union have decided by the last appeal that it is a national power, and no sensible, practical statesman will undertake to quarrel with that decision. Why should an English politician attempt to prove that WILLIAM III. had no right to the British throne, and that some remote STUART boy is now the real King of England? He might as well try to prove that it was very foolish for people to be drowned in the deluge. Certain questions are settled. They have been debated long and fiercely. The differences could not be reconciled. Arms were invoked, and the event of the struggle was the final reply. The Southern theory of the Constitution and Union is one of those questions. Those who continue to vex it will be the only sufferers.

The second objection to the Amendment is, that it humiliates the States lately in rebellion. How? Were they humiliated by accepting the Emancipation Amendment, also proposed by a Congress in which they were not represented? If they were not, how can they be humiliated by accepting the legitimate results of that Amendment, namely, an equalization of political rights? After a tremendous struggle to overthrow a Government in which you fail, how can you be humiliated by accepting, as the condition of resuming a share in that Government, that it shall be upon equal terms with all others? Do the Southern Governors mean us to understand—not to put too fine a point upon it—that they are humiliated if by their causeless and defeated rebellion they have not gained increased political power? They mean that they are willing to offer a theme that have broken their oath to the Government disables the chief men of the section, and representatively disgraces all who honestly supported the rebellion. This is not a valid argument. The sincerity of the rebellion is not a pertinent plea. The question for the United States is, how it can most effectively secure the future. And a very obvious and simple method is by making treason odious—not by hangings and confiscations, but by making the whole tribe of political treason a pusillanimous indignity to office, not forever, but at the pleasure of Congress. Certainly a South Carolinian of this class, for instance, who prides himself upon having been a rebel, and glories in the fact, does not suppose that the whole duty of a Government recovering from so severe a strain is to forget and forgive. It is not vindictiveness toward rebels. It is merely justice to loyal men which prescribes this and all other parts of the Amendment.

There is no chance whatever, and we hope the whole country will see it and say it as often and strongly as they can—there is no chance whatever that the persistence of the late rebel States will wear out the tenacity of the loyal country. Its not party heat, but the cautural warmth of intelligent conviction, which has moulded the conditions offered for restoration. Does the experience of the last five years lead the people of the unrepresented States to suppose that the loyal people will be turned from their purpose?

THE IDES OF NOVEMBER.

THE Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th November officially informed the public that the United States will not avail themselves of their right to pay off the Five-Twenty bonds of 1862 in currency next year, but will continue to pay interest upon the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until they are able to redeem them in coin. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of this announcement. Two or three years ago Mr. CHASE, who was then Secretary, wrote a private letter to say that these bonds ought to be and probably would be paid in coin; but the statement carried no more weight than was due to the private opinion of an official who was not likely to be in office at the time the bonds matured, and who could neither bind the country nor his successor. Mr. MCCULLOCH's positive assurance is a very different matter. There is no reason to believe that he will vacate the office he holds before the Five-Twenty bonds mature. When he tells us, therefore, that he will not pay off these bonds in currency, but will continue to pay interest in coin upon them, he is ready to liquidate them in specie, the statement may be regarded as so absolute an interpretation of the law, on the part of the Government, that, on the one hand, the issue of foreign bondholders, who have been afraid they might next year be compelled to accept payment in currency, will at once be dispelled; and, on the other, it is rendered extremely difficult for any future Secretary of the Treasury to attempt a different policy. Should the reins of Government fall into unscrupulous hands, it is hard to say what might not be done. But this much at least is certain. The bonds will not be paid off next year, and any new Secretary who may attempt to pay them off in currency will have to overcome the express law given by two of his most distinguished predecessors.

It is not too much to say that this announcement will produce an effect on our finances unsurpassed by that of any occurrence since the surrender of LEE. The great anomaly of the age has been the price of Five-Twenty bonds in Europe. These securities, yielding 6 per cent. per annum interest in coin—the obligations of a country which owes little more than half as much as Great Britain, and whose revenue exceeds her expenditure by ten per cent. of her whole debt—have been selling in London at less than 70 cents on the dollar, while British Consols, which only pay 3 per cent., have been worth 90 cents. The main cause of this anomaly was the impression, very general abroad, and not unfelt at home, that, owing to the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary in the law of 1862, the United States Government would claim the right of paying off the first issue of Five-Twenty bonds in currency. This impression removed, there would seem to be no good reason why these bonds should not rise to a price commensurate with their intrinsic worth, as established by the public revenues of the countrywealth and the improving credit of the country.

It is not very likely that they will rise much at home. Equilibrium between home and the foreign markets is more likely to be preserved by a fall in gold than by a rise in bonds. There is ample room for a decline of 15 @ 20 per cent. in gold, and we see no reason why it should not take place.

Importations are on the decline. The fall trade, which opened under such brilliant auspices, closed dull and drooping. Late invoices netted a loss instead of a profit, and not a few orders were countermanded by telegraph. There is no prospect at present of any spring trade, and the chances are that even without any increase in the export of bonds, our shipments of cotton and breadstuffs will fully discharge our debt to Europe that exchange will hardly rise to the specie-shipping point. Under these circumstances an increased inquiry for Five-Twenty bonds for investment, the expected to arise on receipt of the Secretary's official announcement, would inevitably precipitate a heavy fall in gold. It is but eight months since gold was considered an excellent sale at 128, and many good judges thought it must go to 115. Why should it be worth any more now?

JOHN BRIGHT IN IRELAND.

JOHN BRIGHT has made a speech in Dublin which will bring him very near to the popular heart of Ireland, and which will be proportionately denounced by the British Tories, although he really proposes nothing violent nor unreasonable. The speech is excellent, like all BRIGHT'S speeches, for its freedom from rhetoric and its clear and simple statements. It is worth all the Fenian froth ever blown in the eyes of an impulsive and very generous people; and, like his other speeches, this one might be most profitably studied by the orators who are hastening to their seats in Congress. It is not a treatise, nor can such a lecture, had it been such, presenting plainly two or three points, and enforcing them by simple and not elaborate arguments.

Mr. BRIGHT began by describing the sad condition of Ireland, and mentioning the various theories which had been proposed to alleviate it. He then directed attention to two points of the situation—the established church and the land. "The church may be said to affect the soul and sentiment of the country, and the land the means of living and the comfort of the people." The existence of the established church, he said, is a fatal error, for every unbeliever, however good a citizen, is necessarily the symbol of the subjection of the many to the few. The removal of the established Protestant church would not only remove the sentiment of the Irishman's church in his own country, but it would make him feel that the English people and Parliament intended to do justice to Ireland.

Passing to the subject of land, Mr. BRIGHT said that the original ownership came from conquest or confiscation; that there was therefore a wide gulf between the owners and occupiers; that it is not common for proprietors to give leases to Roman Catholic tenants; and therefore the security of the tenant's property depends upon the fairness and good-will of the proprietor. But the grand evil of all is, that the Irish people are dispossessed of the soil; and therefore the true "Irish policy" is that which will most speedily and justly restore the ownership of the soil of Ireland to the Irish people. Mr. BRIGHT'S initiatory method to this result would be a Parliamentary Commission to buy up the large estates in Ireland belonging to the English nobility, and to sell them to the occupiers of farms and the Irish peasantry. The plan is not accurate, he said, and the remedy must be searching.

These propositions show the perception of a statesman. The details of the remedy, however, would, of course, be difficult. But it is evident to the whole world, as Mr. BRIGHT says, that the present system of governing Ireland has disastrously failed. The wisest observers agree that the chief difficulties are the English Church established in Ireland and the land tenure; and Mr. BRIGHT'S remedy is strictly radical, for he would abolish both. He told his audience that, if the 105 Irish members of Parliament were only agreed, they might do almost any thing they liked even in the present Parliament; and he exhorted them to unite themselves firmly to the Liberal Reform party in England. This is a very significant suggestion. For if the liberal party in England proposes an imperial policy, or merely adds an Irish policy to its present aims, Ireland will be in a fairer way of relief than she has been for centuries, and the "men in the gap" can come quietly out again and devote their energies to more practicable result.

THE LEOPARD CHANGING HIS SPOTS.

The Chicago Times is notorious as the journal which was suspended by General BURNSIDE for disloyalty. It is one of the most reckless and unscrupulous papers in the country, and a few months since suggested to the President that he should sweep Congress out of the Capitol with the army. It appears from recent signs that it is the loyal people of the country who must be swept out, if such advice were followed; and it really looks now as if, instead of being swept, Congress and the people were sweeping. This, at least, is the view taken by the Chicago Times, and it beats an alarm. It gives advice to the Democratic party, and if profound obsequiousness to the only aristocratic element in the country does not authorize it to speak for that party we should like to know what does? "This advice, the Times is aware, and plainly says, must run in a more advanced view" than Democrats, and especially Southern Democrats, are in the habit of taking, for it is nothing else than the adoption of impartial suffrage as the Democratic policy!

It asks, "Is not negro suffrage inevitable?" It declares that when qualified impartial suffrage is once established "the South," the Republican-Radical party will be extinct. And it exhorts its fellow-partisans every where in the country to remember that it is always wise to accept the inevitable when it comes. This one of the most malignant opponents of equal rights should read correctly the writing upon the wall which precipitates the action of the most unprecedent incidents of the time. HORATIO SEYMOUR, also, is reputed to have taken the same ground with the Chicago Times. It was during a recent visit to the South, when his ears are more favorable to clear perceptions. But, on the other hand, the patriotic VALLANDIGHAM is understood, with his usual sagacity, to be engaged in reorganizing his party. Does he propose to plant it upon the proposition which he made in Congress, that the Union should be quartered? A Union divided into four or more quarters is the VALLANDIGHAM idea of a National party.

The suggestion of the Chicago Times merely reveals the utter dissolution of the Democratic party—as which dissolution the contempt of all intelligent Americans, because it has steadily and inhumanly withstood every lawful effort ever made to free this country of the incubus of slavery. If it had taken ten years ago a position which so much as looked in the direction in which the Times now urges it to run, the Democratic party might have retained its ascendency. If it had had one leader who truly understood his countrymen and his time, our late history would not have been written in blood.

But the Chicago Times does not seem to be aware that parties are not made to order. It thinks that the master-key of the situation is that the Democratic party shall supersede the Union party. So the intelligent spectator thought that the little boy had nothing to do but to go in and win. But the big boy hit the hardest. If the occupation of the Union party will be gone when the Democracy urges equal suffrage, what becomes of the occupation of the Democratic party? In the pleasing game of Puss in the Corner, if one player comes out from his corner to take that of another, and the other quickly runs to leave his, is the first player finds himself left out. Does the Chicago Times think the country is so enamored of the party which first incited rebellion and then urged surrender to it that it is anxious to intrust the Government to its care at the earliest moment? The work of the Union party will be done by the Union party, and the national existence being peacefully secured upon its principles, parties will divide again upon questions of policy.

CROTON WATER.

THE decision of the Croton Aqueduct Board, heretofore noticed, to place the intended new storing reservoir on the middle branch of the Croton, was by a majority of one. Section 19, Putnam County, has been reversed, owing to expected difficulties in procuring the required land, and a new site has been chosen on the west branch of the river, where no such difficulties are expected. It seems that large damages were claimed in the former case from flooding an iron mine and other business, to which damages the Croton Board were unwilling to subject the city, and hence the change, from which no disadvantage will result.

The new location is near the western extremity of the great basin of the Croton, which comprises a drainage area of 323 square miles, of which quantity the reservoir now to be made will share about one-sixteenth, or say twenty square miles. The situation of the reservoir is in a still more elevated region, at an elevation of six hundred feet above tide, where the Croton is a pure mountain stream, distant twenty-three miles and upward from the dam near Sing Sing. In approaching the spot it is readily seen that Nature has well adapted it for this purpose. Two of the mountain ridges which here incline the west branch, after expanding around some beautiful meadows, suddenly contract at the point selected for a dam, so as to require but seven hundred feet of masonry in length to inclose a reservoir of three hundred and three acres, the extreme depth of water being sixty-four feet. The abutments of granite which these hills afford will render the dam nearly indestructible, although the reservoir will contain three thousand three hundred and sixty-nine million gallons, or about fifty-seven days' supply for the city, notestimating the increase which necessarily comes with a doubling that number of days, and while the exhaustion of water is going on.

The theory upon which this reserveir is built is simply this—that although the Croton for nine or ten months of the year easily supplies the required quantity of water, yet for the remaining two or three months, or at certain times a scantiness which necessitates the storing of water to aid in keeping up the maximum supply. The average daily supply of bringing down sixty million gallons per day—a quantity which may be relied upon with certainty even during the season of drought, after this new storing reservoir shall be in full operation, which may be expected within about two years. The supply will then furnish throughout the year one hundred gallons per day to each of a million inhabitants—a supply which far exceeds that of any other large city. The average furnished in London by the several companies to their customers is reported to amount to be about one-fifth, or say twelve gallons, to each person.

The arrangement by which pure water is delivered from high elevations into houses in sufficient quantity, constituting as it does the power or carrier for removing the refuse into sewers, is now a necessity in every large manufacturing city can dispense with, even leaving out of view its uses in extinguishing fires, and as a power for manufacturing purposes. The use of water in the city for manufacturing purposes is necessarily limited by the size of the aqueduct, which, being a tube composed of masonry, can not be enlarged at will. The natural water-way flow of the river were brought in, aided by all the storing dams which could be conveniently constructed, there would not be enough for it which would greatly increase our manufacturing power. The number of storing reservoirs already laid out is twenty-three, or thereabouts, the land for which, and the construction of seven one and two hundred dollars per acre, including improvements. The remaining reservoirs are capable of holding quite as much water as the one now being constructed. The policy of acquiring land at least for several more of them, now or at no distant period, is quite clear, as its acquisition will prevent the improvements which will embarrass the purchase of it hereafter.

Next week we shall have a word to say upon the advantage to the health and welfare of the city of obtaining control of the margin of all the sources upon which we now depend for the supply of water.

RAILROAD SAFETY AND COMFORT.

"A FOREIGNER, who is an ardent admirer of American institutions, railways excepted," sends us a letter descriptive of the management of railways in Germany, and recommending similar precautions here. He relates that leaving Ludwigshafen, on the Rhine, for the old city of Spires, the train did not start until the conductor had blown a trumpet and was answered by the locomotive whistle.

Upon that road, and all others in the country, defective and worn-out rails are very scarce, and about every year the entire permanent way of the sing little houses of the inspectors, whose duty it is to watch carefully and constantly the whole road. Seven a portion of the poll-tax which every German road, and the train does not leave one station until the signal is given from the next that the road is clear. On the other hand, the Rhine steamers are said to be such large dividends as the prosperous American roads.

Meanwhile, whatever be the truth in Germany, it is very plain that as our railroads fall more and more into the hands of certain great corporations, the security of travel is diminished, and the public is powerless to aid in bringing public opinion to bear upon the management. It is not only safety but comfort to which we are entitled, and in this we have a case which recent experience suggests. The traveler finds himself in a crowded car heated by a stove, with every window closed, and the low, old-fashioned, stifling and no apertures for ventilation except the three useless openings through the top of the car. There is no reason whatever why at this day, and with the improvements in cars, passengers should submit to be shoved into such a black hole, exposed either to disease from the poisonous air of it, or to the risk of suffocation, or giving others colds, or being roundly cursed for opening a window and letting in the sharp air. The regular passengers by the road should protest, and if no notice were taken of the protest, the facts of the case, and the names of the gentlemen who are responsible for the management of the road, should be published.

There is no excuse for not traveling comfortably. The great companies divide large dividends; they are highly prosperous; and the means of safety and comfort are easily accessible. The practicable improvements suggest themselves to every traveler, and if we only steadily grumble and growl, we may by-and-by travel as safely as in Germany and as comfortably as in England.

DAVID S. CODDINGTON.

In the slim and modest volume, upon the back of which we read, "David S. Coddington's Speeches," we find the few works of a young orator who died some months since almost unknown except to a circle of companions and friends whom his wit and charming cultivation fascinated and dazzled. And yet most of our famous orators surpass, and very few rival, the brilliancy of rhetoric, the amplitude and felicity of language, the incisive thought, the profuse play of fancy, which characterize the half-dozen speeches of MR. CODDINGTON. To the evident human education of every part of his orations is the spirit of a true artist does not in the least touch the fiery intensity, the pictorial fulness, which the thought or the fact home to the mind and memory. No one who read, a day or two after its delivery, MR. CODDINGTON'S speech at the Cooper Institute upon occasion of the meeting of the DIX Democracy to repudiate the Chicago action of 1864 and to support ABRAHAM LINCOLN, is likely to forget the profound conviction of which he was conscious that here was a new orator who would make all the old ones look nervously to their laurels.

But an early bodily misfortune had probably cost the orator the kind of inner struggle that most weary life away. It must not be denied that the brilliancy of his book is lorne; that a subtle strain of weakness is sometimes to be felt in the midst of all its richness and insight and picturesque power it lacks that warm, humane sympathy which most endears the book to us. It is rather a certain ideal nationality, noble, indeed, and grand, charmed his imagination and inspired the author's hope. It was AMERICA standing erect with the imperial crown upon her brow, not AMERICA stooping to lift up the lowly, which most allured him. And yet, of all the orators who represent the national heart during the great struggle with the glowing vision of our possibility and power, none was more persuasive or convincing than HON. MR. CODDINGTON lived, and had his health and taste permitted, he could hardly have failed to make himself heard by the whole nation.

He was born and bred a Democrat, and even in advocating MR. LINCOLN'S election in 1864 he distinctly declared that his friends would "hold aside under the LINCOLN shed until Democracy finds a better path to follow than the trumpet;" but he had been a Free-soiler of '48, and the old music still lingered in his heart. So when he stood in Charleston on the 3d of May, 1865, and delivered a eulogy upon ABRAHAM LINCOLN, his heart overflowed in the most striking and eloquent of the thousand tributes of the time. It was quite a passage, and we heartily commend our readers to the book;

"He found himself heir to a statesmanship concealed, debilitating, and pusillanimous, occupied only with the question as to how we should permit our institutions to be murdered most gracefully; and he left its public policy settled, earnest, self-sustaining, engaged only with the question how the attempted murderers could be treated most mercifully. He found American citizenship suddenly confounded with him as a disgraceful doubt; he parted with it a tarnished-respected fact. He found the Government a dissolving phantom, and an old cancer that had baffled the best physicians; he lived to cut out the poison with his sword, and left his well-knit, well-mannered, well-governed patient a perpetual and healthful mourner at his grave."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SOUTHERN LEGISLATION.

THE Alabama Legislature met on the 12th. Governor PATTON in his message recommends the good behavior of the freedmen, and urges measures to protect them in the enjoyment of the full faith of their employers. He would remove all restrictions upon negro testimony. He urges a portion of the poll-tax collected from freedmen to the education of colored children. Both the Governor strongly opposes the Constitutional Amendment. The first section, he says, gives to the General Government an enlarged judicial power which would overshadow, and might possibly nullify, the influence of the State tribunals both in important and in trivial cases. The second section, he claims, is unjust in being partial to the North in the matter of representation. The third section, he says, establishes a class of citizens, State officers, both State and Federal, which is unnecessary and unjustly proscriptive. If the measure as a whole is adopted, he argues, there are already sufficient penalties laid down in the national statute book for the offenses without recourse to the injustice of ex post facto law. There would, however, be no objection to it upon grounds of expediency as a test of eligibility. The Governor concludes from the premises that the Constitutional Amendment ought not to be ratified.

On November 1 Governor Throckmorton, of TEXAS, sent in a special message to the Legislature, urging the passage of measures expressive of "the earnest and sincere desire of our people for peace and perfect reconciliation, and their readiness to obey the laws of the land, and to afford all persons, without distinction, the fullest measure of protection for life, property, and the enjoyment of political sentiment." He advocates the admission of negro testimony, and the appropriation of taxes from the freedmen to the education of colored children. He hopes that the wish of the President that the Legislature will "make all laws conform to the new conditions of things, so as to extend equal and exact justice to all persons, without regard to color," will be responded to in a proper spirit. In conclusion, he says:

"The firm and hopeful view of the President in regard to the future of our beloved country must be encouraging to every patriot. I trust he may not be disappointed, and I feel that it is the highest duty of patriotism to aid him by every wise and prudent means at our command."

Georgia has rejected the Constitutional Amendment. In the House there were for rejection 131, against it 5; in the Senate the vote to reject was unanimous. The Committee to whom the matter had been referred considered that constitutionally the Amendment was not before the States, not being proposed by two-thirds of a full Congress. Some States having been refused the right to participate in the debate on proposing the Amendment, and yet being expected to ratify when thus proposed. The right to ratify implied the right to take part in the original proposition.

THE BALTIMORE TROUBLE.

Judge BOND, of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, has given his decision as to the law involved in the Baltimore troubles. He declares the Governor's authority to summon the old and new Boards of Police Commissioners to be unquestionable, and that Judge BOND'S order restraining MESSRS. KING and WILLIAM from exercising the official functions to which they had been appointed, was unwarranted.

IMPARTIAL SUFFRAGE.

Some of the Democratic organs appear to be desirous of taking the wind out of the Radical sails. The Boston Post, referring to Judge Rosser's letter advocating impartial suffrage in TEXAS, says: "This is wise, just, liberal. Impartial suffrage we have always advocated." The Massachusetts system we think a good one, and if every State would adopt it the result would prove its great security to the peace and prosperity of the country." The Chicago Times goes not more boldly. It declares that negro suffrage in some shape is inevitable, and recommends the South to accept "impartial suffrage, or suffrage dependent upon the intelligence of the man, irrespective of color, as is now the rule in Massachusetts," that an end may be put to the struggle against the restoration of the United States.

CAN SECESSION DESTROY A STATE?

The Supreme Court of Mississippi has decided that the State never lost its organization as a government by reason of the rebellion or war; but that in all respects not only de facto but de jure a State, and that the functions of the government were never more potentially exercised by those who exercised executive, legislative, and judicial functions during that time within the State.

STATE ITEMS.

The Society of the Army of the Tennessee met November 14, in Cincinnati. Generals GRANT, SHERMAN, and Howard were able to be present. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: For President, General J. A. Rawlings; Vice-Presidents, Major-Generals M. L. Smith, P. J. Osterhaus, J. E. Blair, R. J. Oglesby, A. J. Smith, and Brevet Brigadier-Generals W. W. Belknap and Alexander McDowell McCook; Secretary, Dr. R. Patterson; Corresponding Secretary, Brigadier-General A. D. Balcombe; Treasurer, Major-General M. D. Leggett.

The greater portion of the session was occupied in discussing the proposed monument to Major-General M'Pherson.

A resolution was finally passed, tying upon Clyde, Ohio, the burial-place of General M'Pherson, as the location of the monument.

After transacting some unimportant business a resolution was adopted to hold the next annual meeting at St. Louis—the time to be indicated by the President-elect, General J. A. Rawlings.

DR. HOWITZ, the Chief of the Naval Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, has prepared some valuable statistics, showing the naval casualties of battle during the rebellion. The total deaths from this cause were 2,106 from gun-shot fractures, 1,160 from gun-shot flesh wounds, and 1,000 from miscellaneous casualties, while 96 died in rebel prison-pens—making the total number of deaths 2,256. There were discharged from the naval service as disabled 250 from casualties of war, and all from gun-shot wounds received in battle. Three hundred and sixteen amputations were performed and four cases of trepanning, of which two recovered and two died.

Daniel Carpenter, one of our four Inspectors of Police, died suddenly, on the 18th, of heart-disease. He was a native of Albany, and about 50 years of age.

BANQUET TO MR. FIELD.

TO CYRUS W. FIELD, rather than to any other man, belongs the credit of having first conceived the practicability of an Atlantic telegraph. His share in the cost of the enterprise, or his prominence in its execution, may have been surpassed by some; but one thing unquestionably is his alone—original and absolute faith in final success, a faith which no difficulties could overcome, and the patience of which was equal to any labor and any cost. No injustice can be done to any man by the declaration that, but for CYRUS W. FIELD, there would now be no telegraphic communication between America and Europe. And of no other man can this be said.

It was proper, then, that his own city should do him honor, and show her pride not only in his success, but in the heroic faith which accomplished it. This was the object of the banquet given to Mr. FIELD on the evening of November 15, at the Metropolitan Hotel. We illustrate the banquet below, and give a new and excellent portrait of Mr. FIELD, from a photograph taken for Harper's Weekly by ROCKWOOD & CO., of this city, the morning after the banquet.

The decorations of the banquet-hall are thus described in the New York Times:

"From the centre of the dome fell clouds of gaily-colored silk, concurring all below. From these hung crystal chandeliers, flooding the hall with silver light, toned down by the soft refraction of the silken ceiling overhead. Suspended from the dome, at its eastern end, hung in mid-air the Earth in miniature, girt by an iron band, emblematic of the telegraphic girdle. Above this globe were the Sun, the Moon, and the stars, and from each of these fell delicate cords of silk, like cobweb threads in the sunlight, uniting the mysterious worlds whence they came to the iron-bound, imprisoned Earth below. These lines, gathered together on the meridian of the globe, did not end there, but, spreading out again, descended and were caught up by the grappling arms of delicate telegraphic poles of silver, planted on the tables underneath, and, tied up by those poles, the entire hall was girt by these silken lines. Up among the congregated solar systems hung the ethereal messages, 'Greeting from all the stars!' 'The lordly Sun sends greeting down!' 'The Moon her peaceful radiance lends!' and hanging from the globe a prosaic sign-board, announcing the whereabout of the 'General Telegraphic Office.' On the telegraphic poles along the tables were symbols of the glad communion of all nations with the spirit animating the festivities of the night. There were greetings from Russia, France, Plymouth Rock, Spain, New Jersey, Portugal, Denmark, New Hampshire, China, Timbuctoo, and all the places with names familiar or unfamiliar to the ear, near and remote, reading as you passed along with the surprising oddity of medley, so frequent and queer were the transitions."

CYRUS W. FIELD.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD & CO., 839 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.]

MR. FIELD'S speech after dinner contained a full and interesting history of the Atlantic Cable:

"It is nearly thirteen years ago," he said, "since half a dozen gentlemen of this city met at my house for four successive evenings, and, around a table covered with maps and charts, and plans and estimates, considered a project to extend a line of telegraph from Nova Scotia to St. Johns, in Newfoundland, thence to be carried across the ocean. It was a very pretty plan on paper. There was New York, and there was St. Johns, only about 1700 miles apart. It was easy to draw a line from one point to the other, making no account of the forests and mountains, and swamps and rivers and gulfs, that lay in our way. Not one of us had ever seen the country, or had any idea of the obstacles to be overcome. We thought we could build the line in a few months. It took two years and a half. Yet we never asked for help outside our own little circle. Indeed, we fear we should not have got it if we had, for few had any faith in our scheme. Every dollar came out of our own pockets. Yet I am proud to say no man drew back. Every man proved a deserter. Those who came first into the work have stood by it to the end. Of these six men four are here to-night—Mr. PETER COOPER, Moses TAYLOR, MARSHALL O. ROBERTS, and myself. My brother DUDLEY is in Europe, and Mr. CHANDLER WHITE died in London, and his place was filled by Mr. WILLIAM WATSON, who is also here. My friend Mr. LEONARD W. JEWETT was our Secretary. To these gentlemen, as my first associates, it is but just that I should pay my first acknowledgments.

"From this statement you perceive that, in the beginning, this was wholly an American enterprise. It was begun, and for two years and a half was carried on, solely by American capital. Our brethren across the sea did not even know what we were doing away in the forests of Newfoundland. Our little company raised and expended over a million and a quarter of dollars before an Englishman paid a single pound sterling. Our only support outside was in the liberal character and steady friendship of the Government of Newfoundland, for which we were greatly indebted to Mr. E. M. ARCHIBALD, then Attorney-General of that colony, and now British Consul in New York. And in preparing for an ocean cable the first soundings across the Atlantic were made by American officers in American ships. Our scientific men—Messrs. HENRY, BACHE, and MAURY—had taken great interest in the subject. The United States ship Dolphin discovered the telegraphic plateau as early as 1850; and the United States ship Arctic sounded across from Newfoundland to Ireland in 1856—a year before her Majesty's ship Cyclops, under command of Captain DAYMAN, went over the same course. This I state not to take aught from the just praise of England, but simply to vindicate the truth of history.

"It was not till 1856—ten years ago—that the enterprise had any existence in England. In that summer I went to London, and there with Mr. JOHN W. BRETT, Mr. (now Sir) CHARLES BRIGHT, and Dr. WHITEHOUSE, organized the Atlantic Telegraph Company. Science had begun to contemplate the necessity of such an enterprise; and the great FARADAY cheered us with his lofty enthusiasm. Then for the first time was enlisted the support of English capitalists; and then the British Government began that generous course which it has continued ever since—offering us ships to complete soundings across the Atlantic, and to assist in laying the cable, and an annual subsidy for the transmission of messages. The expedition of 1857 and the two expeditions of 1858 were joint enterprises, in which the Niagara and the Susquehanna took part with the Agamemnon, the Leopard, the Gorgon, and the Valorous; and the officers of both navies worked with generous rivalry for the same great object. The capital—except one quarter which, as you have said, was taken by myself—was subscribed wholly in Great Britain. The Directors were almost all English bankers and merchants, though among them was one gentleman whom we are proud to call an American—Mr. GEORGE PEABODY, a name honored in two countries, since he has showered his princely benefactions upon both—who, though a resident for nearly forty years in London, where he has gained abundant wealth and reputation, is to the last hand of his birth, declining honors, still clings to the Church of the United Kingdom to re the honor of a Democratic citizen.

Main a simple American the expeditions of 1857-58 you are familiar. On the third trial we gained a brief success. The cable was laid, and for four weeks it worked well—though never very brilliantly—never giving forth although never distinct flashes or the rainbow of to-day. such rapid and The failure of 1858 came our darkest days.

"After the cable is dead it is hard to galvanize it into life. It is more difficult to revive an old enterprise than to start a new one. The freshness and vigor of inception are gone, and the feeling of disappointment discourages further effort.

"Other cables have followed a new attempt. This country had become involved in a tremendous war; and while the nation was struggling for life, it had no time to spend in foreign enterprises.

"But in England the project was still kept alive. The Atlantic Telegraph Company kept up its organization, which included not only Mr. Brassey and Mr. Field, but men of great wealth, like Messrs. Thomson, Mr. George Elliot and Mr. Barclay, of London, and Mr. Pender, of Manchester, and which, thus bolstered with immense capital, took up the whole enterprise. It was reorganized with a capital of £1,000,000, and with all our efforts in England and America we raised only £300,000. The new company now came to the front, and offered to take the whole remaining £700,000 of the capital stock of the board, and to put their own profits contingent on success. Mr. Richard A. Lucas was made Managing Director, and gave energy and vigor to all its departments, being admirably seconded by the engineer, Mr. Saward. Mr. Glass had been recently knighted for his services in carrying out the Atlantic Telegraph, an honor which he richly deserves."

Mr. Field then alluded to the failure of 1865:

"We returned to England defeated, yet full of resolution to begin the battle anew. Measures were at once taken to make a second cable, and the end of the expedition; and with that assurance I came home last autumn.

"In December I went back again, when lo, all our hopes had come to nothing. The Atlantic Company in England had given his written opinion that we had no legal right without a special Act of Parliament (which could not be obtained under a year), to issue any more shares, or, which was the same thing, to call up our capital. This was a terrible blow. The works were at once stopped, and which the money which had been paid in returned to the subscribers. Such was the state of things only two months ago. Mr. Brassey was then on the 5th of December, and the next day we had a merry Christmas to me. But it was a most irresistible comfort to have the counsel of such men as Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Roundell Palmer, and the hour stout-hearted Mr. Brassey tell us to go ahead, and if need were, he would put down £60,000 more. It was finally concluded that the best course was to reorganize a new company, with increased capital stock, and so originated the Anglo-American Telegraph Company. It was formed by ten gentlemen who met around a table in London, and put down £10,000 apiece. Mr. Glass was elected Secretary of the Company, Mr. Daniel, who came with us across the ocean, will write a history, and tell the world what life and death we encountered in its Board of Directors. The great Telegraphic Construction and Maintenance Company—also founded by the failure of last year, answered us with a subscription of £50,000. Soon after last December we opened to the public, through the eminent bankinghouse of S. M. Samuel & Co., and in three months we had raised the whole £600,000. Then the work began again, and went on with speed. Never was greater energy infused into any enterprise. It was only the 1st day of March that the new company was organized, and was registered as a company the next day; and yet such was the power and despatch that in less than from that day the cable had been manufactured, shipped in the Great Eastern, stretched across the Atlantic, and was sending messages, literally swift as lightning, from continent to continent."

He thus describes the fishing up of the old cable:

"Our fishing-line was of formidable size. It was made of wires twisted with wires of steel, as well as a strain of thirty tons. It took about two hours for the grapnel to reach bottom, but we could tell when it struck. I often went to the bow and sat on the rope, and could feel the quiver that the grapnel gave when it sang on the bottom two miles under us. But it was a very slow process. We had storms and fogs and squalls. Still we worked on day after day. Once, on the 17th of August, we got the cable on board, had it in full sight for five minutes, a long, slimy monster lifted from the ooze of the ocean's bed, and then began to cheer so wildly that it seemed to be frightened, and suddenly broke away, and sank down into the sea. This accident kept us at work two weeks longer, but, finally, on the last night of August, we had the cable on board, and the grappel thirty times. It was a little before midnight on Friday night when we reached the cable, and it was a little after midnight Sunday morning when we got it on board. We were then within two hundred and twenty-six hours! The strain on every mile of the cable but the strain on the cable from the bow to the stern. It was midnight; the lights of the ship, and of the boats around our bows, and which floated in the faces of the men, showed them eagerly watching for the cable to appear on the surface. At length it was brought to the surface. All who were allowed to approach crowded forward to look at it. Not a word was spoken, only the voices of the officers in command were heard giving orders. All was still as the dead hung on the lesse. It was only when it was brought over the bow and on the deck that men dared to breathe. Even then they hardly believed their eyes. Some crept forward to look at it, to be sure it was there. Then we carried it along to the electrician's room to see if our instruments of measure still were or dead. A few minutes of suspense, and a flash told the lightning-message had been sent. Did the feeling long pent up burst forth? Were there not many brave hearts that wept? Others broke into cheers, and the cry ran from man to man, and was heard down in the engine-room, deck below, and from the boats on the water, and the other ships, while rockets lighted up the darkness of the night, and with thankful hearts we turned our faces once more toward home. But now the work for our little 226 hours we were exposed to all the dangers of the storm on the Atlantic. Still the anxious night and fury of the sea, as I sat in the electricians room, a flash of lightning came from the ocean, and the cable seemed to breathe, some back to me in mid-heaven, and forth. The Great Eastern bore herself proudly through the storm. She bore the land, the vital cord, which was to join two hemispheres, long in her stern; and so, on Saturday, the 5th of December, we brought our second cable safely to the shore."

Mr. Field concluded with the following sentiment:

"Of the results of this enterprise—commercially and politically—it is for others to speak. To one effect only do I refer as the wish of my heart—that, as it brings us into closer relations with England, it may produce a better understanding between the two countries. Let wise will speak against England—words of censure must come from other lips than mine. I have received too much kindness from Englishmen to join in this language. I have eaten of their bread and drunk of their cup, and have received from them, in the darkest hours of this enterprise, words of their which I shall never forget; and if any words of mine can tend to peace and good-will, they shall not be wanting. I beg my countrymen to remember the ties of kindred. Blood is thicker than water. America and England are both descended of the loins of England; and though there have been unfriendly passages between us, for family quarrels are apt to be—still in our hearts there is yearning for the old home, for the old mother. I am not the enemy of his country and of the human race who would not, if possible, add another link to the one to bind, in language, and in religion. I close with the sentiment, EVOLUTION AMERICA—CLASPING HANDS ACROSS THE SEA: MAY THIS FIRM GRASP BE A PLEDGE OF FRIENDSHIP TO ALL GENERATIONS!"

THE WOMAN OF INFLUENCE.

SOMETHING must be done.

Speculation in gold and oil stocks had run riot with my once handsome income, and I was brought, unwillingly, at last to consider the wife's project of taking a few select boarders.

And Miriam, dear, good little wife that she was, took all the disagreeable work such as house-hunting and bantering with "agents"—upon herself, leaving me nought to do but loaf in our elegant apartments, and wish myself many times in the Tombs.

At last the "hated thing" was accomplished, and leaving our expensive boarding-place, to save for me the sad care, we had engaged a house on the city suburbs, and, to make possession of a pretty brown-stone house in a fashionable locality, and advertised.

Dame Miriam took up the enormous rent and supply the table on what she would receive from the few boarders she could obtain, and I was to remain, I should imagine; however, as my own folly had swept away a princely fortune, I held my peace, resolving that she should discover her "pet scheme" without interference on my part.

A week of renovation—such sweeping, such dusting, such scouring and cleaning as I never before imagining I had never witnessed—so, not when, a two-headed five-year-old in pinafore and shorts, I was first made acquainted with the domestic arcana.

I was, for the most part, in a state of collapse, and my wants treated with the utmost indifference, until, in the house—like the rest of the world—I was denounced clean. Board, at this season, was in good demand, and our house was specially sifted.

I expected Miriam would fill the two best rooms in the house to a family by the name of Marabeau, whom we had formerly boarded with. Mrs. Marabeau was a woman of the world, and good looking in her day, and was exceedingly vain. She had a husband, a quiet, sensible kind of man, and a daughter—Miss Ella—of the same style of manner. She had made it appear to Miriam that her "influence" alone could fill the house with the highest-toned people. "Mr. Marabeau is a man of culture, Miriam let her have the rooms at a frightfully low price.

"I desire you to be very particular about references," she said to Miriam, "for Mr. Marabeau is the most fastidious person in the world about his associates, and if we have him we are sure to get Mr. Andersons that we've been called exclusive, though they are people, if I read their characters truthfully, that one need not be afraid to know." Mrs. Marabeau is a young lawyer of much promise, and Mr. Marabeau says his father is quite a wealthy importer. Mr. Marabeau is very particularly to himself that one can scarcely tell what to think; and as for Miss Wells, I think she feels her importance quite too much for a governess. She's handsome, ugly!"

"I do not associate with you there," replied Miriam. My views speaking of her looks the other day, and I believe all united in calling her interesting: As far as reference goes the inmates of the house have published very flattering proofs of respectability."

"Oh, I presume you are satisfied; but, as I said before, John is very particular. In regard to your rate, do you think it too low?" she added.

"I have never troubled myself to inquire," replied Miriam.

"Don't you think it would be better for you to change your seat to the end of the table? I think the effect would be much better as you enter the room."

"What! and take Bridget the whole length of the dining-room every time she comes to speak to me? No, I think more of convenience than effect in this case; thank you for the suggestion, Mrs. Marabeau."

"Bridget wouldn't mind taking a few extra steps, for I have spoken to her."

I am not in the habit of consulting my servants in regard to such matters, and must beg that you'll leave them subject to my dictation in future."

"You can do as you like, of course, dear. I know; but, as I said before, I feel interested. Now I think it would look much better to have the tea and coffee brought to the table, and two large pie makes a part of the dessert, a little powdered sugar sprinkled over it improves the looks wonderfully."

"The idea of Marabeau's fastidiousness! It is quite laughable, truly, when one knows the stock they sprang from," I said, when she had gone.

"One would think them the cream of aristocracy to hear her talk; but what do you know of their antecedents?" asked my wife.

"When Anderson came to see about board I exchanged references, and he very naturally asked about the Marabeaus after finding they were to make part of our family. So I made Petersen a call; you know he knows every body—can trace families back to Noah and Eve. Well, he says Old Marabeau—the father to the present one—was a mechanic, and John was brought up to the trade; it is only a few years since they abandoned it. His wife, so pretty, so delicate, so finikey, was a tailoress, and married John Gilmore's step-child Marabeau, captivated by her beauty, married her, and took her away."

"Well, I declare! and she to twattle about high family and society and all that," replied Miriam.

"I presume, dear, the truth were known, Miss Wells's family are far superior to her own."

"Yes, if birth were a consideration, but you know we profess to be a purely democratic people, so we must make real genuine worth our standard of judging. I have learned this much in regard to Miss Wells's pretensions. Her father was a very superior sister of acknowledged ability in a Western city; of course he was poor, for he was blessed with a large family and small salary. Last winter he died, leaving nought but his blessing for the widow and her flock of five children, of which Miss Wells is the eldest."

"Dear me, and that is why she is so sad?"

"Yes, sad and busy; she has by the help of friends obtained a position as teacher in the same seminary she gets copying to do; but it is hard work for a female in these times to support herself, much less provide for a family."

"I do wish I could help the poor thing. Wouldn't Mills give her some writing for the office—you know he is a lawyer?" Mills is a delicate thing to manage, for she is too proud to accept any thing in the shape of a favor from a young man like him. I think the Marabeaus will do."

"Yes, I see him often watching her when she is talking, with a pleased expression on his face, for she is really a pretty girl. Mrs. Marabeau's manner twattle drowns out others. I say, Miriam, it was a woeful mistake taking her into the house."

"I see it, dear, and am sorry for all of her harangues. I believe ere this every one in the house is thoroughly disgusted with her. Why, it was only yesterday that she commenced Miriam in the hall, and while her carriage was waiting for her at the door said, 'Don't you pity me, Mrs. Anderson? Here have I got the most delightful parties, with full carcs, crowded as they are with all sorts of people! I declare I can scarcely endure the thought; but you have your hands full, and your nothing of these troubles.' Mrs. Anderson did not take the hint to broadly conveyed and ask her to ride with her; with all her sighing and pitying she departed Marabeau'ing on the stairs, looking indignantly at her as she was driven away. Then, coming into the drawing-room where I was, she exclaimed, 'What a stuck-up woman! As if no one owned a carriage but herself. I think I never saw a person so fond of dress; and such a fool! Great gift, putting her hair in crimpers and sporting diamonds. I don't see how you can endure her; calling for meals in the evening, and actually speaking at table. She shows good taste in that," I replied; "for if there is any thing I detest, it is a woman whose tongue is ever on the move. Miriam replied, 'We had a carte blanche for that when they came.' 'Well, I think I shall take exception to it. I shall let her know I prefer a table without her after this,' she said, as she laid out to take her detested ride in the city cars."

"And this is the 'woman of influence,' who was to render you so valuable a boarding-house?"

"Yes, I acknowledge I was sadly taken in; for instead of influence I have seen nothing but impertinence and vulgarity in the house. My object in study now is to get her out of it before there is an open rupture."

"That you will find impossible, I fear; for she has got into first-rate quarters, and, instead of leaving herself, is determined to root those out who fail to be her humors."

"We shall soon see who rules," replied Miriam, with a determined look; "and we did see full sooner than we had expected.

The Andersons had been invited to a wedding out of town, and had just returned. When all were seated at the table Mrs. Marabeau, followed by her husband and daughter, sailed in with more than her accustomed pomposity of manner.

Having arranged and spread her skirts to her satisfaction, she began:

"I, too, have been out of town to-day, Mrs. Anderson, and I happened to fall in with some of the party returning from that wedding—such a noisy set! I have always noticed that the vulgar appear when they left the cars at the up-town station. Every body in good society here knows they are very high, low people. I once had the misfortune to board with them, and I must say I considered them exceedingly vulgar. I could but wonder what kind of people are they?"

Mrs. Anderson gave her a hard, searching look; but silent contempt, plainly expressed in the countenance, was all that Miriam vouchsafed.

Determined not to be thus foiled, she addressed herself to Miriam:

"You remember Mrs. Snow, who used to board with us?"

Miriam remembered her.

"Well, I met her to-day, and—what do you think?—that old woman of fifty had been putting her hair in crimpers; as they did not work well, she had the mortification to appear with her head. I told her very plainly that my crimps were natural. I'd be ashamed at my age to use such things."

"You do look rather old for that, Madam," said Burnet, with a merry twinkle in his eye. Mrs. Anderson, as Miss Marabeau's insult had been leveled, bowed him her thanks.

Finding she could make nothing in that direction she turned her fire on Miriam:

"What are your terms for music, Miss Wells?"

"Twenty dollars a quarter, ma'am."

"And what is your method of order?"

"I have had several teachers."

"I think some of having Emma take lessons this winter; but I shall not give her to any one unless sure of their ability and good character. I think parents can't be too particular; I've had several cases come under my notice lately where the morals of young ladies have been injured by their being placed under the influence of teachers whose standing in society was not what it ought to be."

Miss Wells showed no disposition to reply, and she continued:

"You have some acquaintance in the city to refer to, have you not?"

"Why, Madam?" asked Miss Wells, raising her very large dark eyes from her plate and looking her questioner full in the face.

"Before placing my daughter under the influence of any one I should require the most satisfactory testimonials."

"I have no desire to teach your daughter, Madam; when I do, I'll let you know," replied Miss Wells.

"Shut up at last," said I to Miriam, when all but ourselves had left the dining-room.

"Yes, and I could have clapped my hands and cried bravo! I was so delighted; but did you ever see such rudeness as she showed the Andersons? Though they treat them with the coolest of civility, they are not going to put up with such petty annoyances. Either she must leave or they will."

"I had come to that conclusion myself, nothing came up that she did not 'root her nose' to the bottom of it, as Burnet wisely remarked."

"Yes, and I could but wait until to-morrow's dinner-room that evening. Miriam said she was doubtless planning a method of revenge on poor Miss Wells.

"I fancy she'll leave Miss Wells to herself after this, for she is certainly no match for her," I replied. But I was mistaken, as the sequel will show.

Mills, the young lawyer before referred to, had become quite a favorite in the house, particularly with the ladies, for Miriam had somehow fancied that he showed a partiality for the society of Miss Wells, all else was seeing, he would seat himself beside her and busy himself with making "pretty pieces of the dress of ravelings in his hand," and the first of many evenings in the parlor I found myself left alone, Miriam and Mills having gone to the theatre, and Burnet, who was kind enough to bore himself with my company to a play he had seen three times before."

Mrs. Marabeau's manner, so cold as an icicle, having good-morning to every one separately but Miss Wells, who seemed not to notice the omission, kept up through breakfast a conversation with Mr. Mills, who sat at her right.

After all had left the table but Mrs. Marabeau, Mrs. Burnet, and myself, the former said, "Mr. Marabeau desires me to ask if that woman is going to be allowed to remain in the house after last night's bold attempt?"

Miriam was about to reply, but was stopped by the appearance of Miss Wells, followed by Mr. Burnet and Mills, who, I fancy, had heard the last.

"By 'that woman' you doubtless mean me, Mrs. Marabeau," said Miss Wells, looking her steadily in the face. "If Mrs. Simmons wishes me to leave I have now to hear it from her own lips."

"I do not," cried Miriam. "I have always respected you, and never more than at present."

Tears stood in the dark eyes of Miss Wells as she murmured, "Thank you, Madam, for not listening to evil tale-bearers; I have explained my going out last eve to your satisfaction."

"It needed no explanation. I have never asked one," said Miriam.

"And permit me to thank you, too, Mrs. Simmons," said Mills, stepping generously forward, for, trust me, I am not a disinterested party. Were it not for the foolish resolution of teaching a year from which my earnest entreaties have failed to win her—I would this day give her my protection and name, as I have before given her my heart. In your care I leave her," and before any of us were aware what he was doing he caught the weeping governess in his arms, pressed a kiss on her brow, and passed her over to my wife.

When we looked for Mrs. Marsbeau she was gone: how she had made her exit no one had observed. An hour later, and she was served with a notice that her rooms would be wanted at the end of the month; and thus we were rid at last of the "Woman of Influence."

Bernet, who had now got his family in town, took their rooms, and, indeed a hamper to the music of Mills, whose fingers swept the piano keynimbly when the Marsbeaus, bag and baggage, were down the steps and out of the house.

THE ROYAL PULL AT THE BELL.

THERE is a story told of an anonymous king, the moral of which may be well applied by all sovereigns. The old monarch, when dying, called his son to him, put in his hand the sceptre, and then asked him if he could take office as easily as he had taken from his father the symbol of authority.

The young heir, grasping the sceptre tightly, and hinting at the excellence of brevity in council as well as in wit, said, under the circumstances, he could.

"I will be as brief as my father," answered the abdicating monarch, "and that is short enough. You look upon the world, boy, as a house of pleasure: now hear before from me. Why, my lad, tumbles us pulls, and good luck is only distilled in drops."

The son looked about him on the royal side, and found he was dead.

The new king commanded a splendid funeral, and arranged a grand hunting party for the day after. He laughed at the paternal simile, and, to publish its weakness and its own folly, he caused to be placed above his palace a large silver-toned bell; a rope passed down to each one which he occupied.

"I will ring it," said he, "whenever I feel thoroughly happy. I have no doubt that I shall weary my own arm and shoulder before I have done."

For a whole month the bell was silent.

"I have had my fun on the rope," said the king, "fifty times, but I felt I was hardly happy enough to proclaim it to my people; but we have got over our first difficulties, and to-morrow—"

On the morrow, as he was boasting of the ability and friendship of one of his ministers, he learned that his friend and servant was in the habit of betraying the counsels of his master, and was prone to a neighboring potentate, from whom the butler received stars and crosses in return.

The king sighed, "We shall not toll the bell, then, to-day: but assuredly to-morrow."

In the meantime he went over to the house of the ministress of his heart.

"There," he remarked to himself, as he went along at that pace which used to be observed by the pilgrims to Canterbury, and which in England has taken its name from the fact that everybody else can't get across—"there I have found disappointment."

What he did find he never told; but on his return to the palace, when his groom of the chambers looked interrogatively at the rope and the belfrey, the monarch simply twisted the end of the latter into a noose, and angrily muttered, as he flung it down again—

"Would to heaven that they were both hanging from it together!"

On the following day he philosophically reviewed his case.

"I have been unreasonable," he said; "why should I grieve because I have been betrayed by a knave, and jilted by a girl with golden hair? I have wide dominions, a rich treasury, a mighty army, laughing rewards, verdant meadows, a people who pay taxes as if they loved them, and I'm not quite forty-five. I have, it may be happy yet," added he, advancing to the window—"yes, I may;" as he reached his hand to the rope. He was on the point of ringing at it with good will, when he saw a sight without, and heard a voice within, which alike paralyzed. A messenger was at his feet.

"Oh, sire!" exclaimed the bringer of bad tidings, "thou seest the dust, the fires, and the gleam of arms without. Behind us are the Moors in upon the land, and before us defeat and devastation behind him!"

"Now a curse upon kingship that brings a wretched monarch no peace!" cried the King, who wanted to be happy.

The courtier uttered something about the miseries of the people.

"By that Lady of Hate, whose church is in Brittany," cried the prince, "thou art right! I thought to pull lustily at the bell, but will as lustily pull at my sword in the field, for see if there be not virtue in that. How came in the foe? and who commands them?"

The answer to this double query told him that the enemy could not have entered had not his dispatches been betrayed; and that the traitor who led on the army was under the command of a prince whose name was no sooner pronounced by the king than the latter turned red with fury, and exclaimed:

"My friend shall ring the bell again. I will have his life, and the lady—"

He said no more, but went out, fought like a man, dissect that day, and slew, hang the traitor with all his orders on him, maimed the young leader of the hostile vanguard, who was known from Cupid, and returned to his capital in triumph. He had so much to employ his time after his victory, so much to arrange for the restoration of the fortunes of his people, so much to meditate upon for future accomplishment, that when at night he lay down upon his couch, overcome upon his brow but a shade of honest joy upon his cheek, he entirely forgotten the silver bell in his turret, and the ropes which depended from it. And so he grew and grew, never turning from his life's work till the inevitable Angel looked smilingly in his face, and began to beckon him away. He was sitting upright in a massive chair, pale as death, but still in his ministry, till his eyes grew dim, his head sank on his breast, and—he was without, a sound of wailing.

"What voices are those?" asked he, softly; "what is there yet to me to do?"

His chancellor stooped over him as he now lay on the couch, and whispered: "Our father is departing from among us, and his children are at the threshold in tears."

"Let them in! let them come in!" hurriedly cried the king. "God, I do they really love me?"

"If there be a life to be purchased here, O worthy Sire, they would purchase thine with their blood."

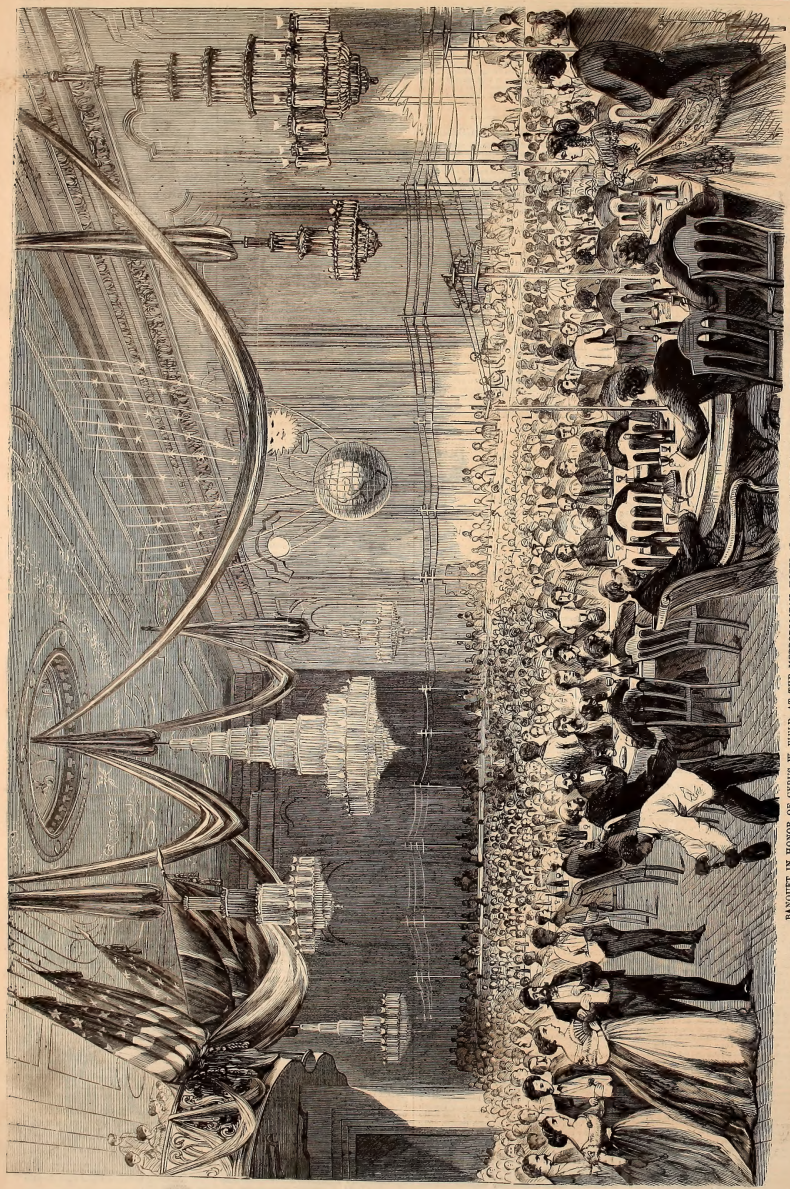
The crowd streamed silently in, to look once more upon the good old king, and to mourn at his departure. He stretched his hands toward them, and asked, "Have I won your love, children? have I won your love?"

One universal affirmative reply, given from the heart, though given with soft expression, seemed to bestow upon the dying monarch new life. He raised himself on the couch, looked like an Implacable, and tried to speak, but failed in the attempt. None the less happy, he looked up to God, gleamed to the turret where hung the bell, extended his hand to the rope, gave a pull, and died, with a smile on his face, as he rang his own knell.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"Great Expectations' Disappointed" might be an appropriate title for a treatise upon the much anticipated Meteoric shower. For months—nay, for years, the scientific world had eagerly looked forward to the brilliant display to have been given by a display of celestial pyrotechnics. The time had been exactly calculated—no doubt disturbed the astronomic mind—on or about the 13th of November, 1866, was the appointed time. Even the precise locality of the fiery shower was specified—the constellation of Leo was the grand centre from which would radiate the sparkling fire. The newspapers took up the interesting theme, and gave special directions to guide the gazeless in their observations. Even the city authorities, with a most unusual spirit and commendable interest in science, bid the multitude go to sleep in peace, promising to arouse them by a special signal of fire-bells when the grand display commenced. To be sure many, choosing to trust their own eyes, and having a little faith in the "science of prophecy," remained, despites, and nightly places generally, and kept a vigilant look-out for the first indication that the "ball was about" that time. But the more sensible went to sleep—leaving one ear open for the tenth stroke of the bell. Half a dozen meteors did appear!—but—they popped up to gaze anxiously into the ethereal space; but no sooner had the astonished beholders cried out, than heavenly bodies they speedily covered themselves up from the chill November air. Not a few awoke in the morning with a sneeze, and a cough, which, after all, they had slept unconscious throughout the fierce and fiery combat. Others were disposed to look at their fast, and a minute investigation of the morning papers, relieved their minds.

Alas for the vain vigils of the weary watchers in this vicinity! Scarcely were there more shooting-stars visible than on any other clear and frosty October night. And although some sections of the country were more highly favored, the grand display seems to have been confined to the region of the Atlantic Ocean. We must be patient and wait until 1899!



It is said, in a Massachusetts paper, that the republican party has a large clothing-house on the principle of most, and are already looking forward to the time when one can get a comfortable best-coat, or roast, or leg of mutton, a coat of pork, without having to pay for it its weight in greenbacks. Great pecuniary profit has frequently been realized by the invention of some toy for children which meets the approval of the juvenile critics. The inventor of the celebrated puzzle called the "Fifteen," in 1880, is said to have realized $100,000. The inventor of the "Walking Doll," which was in vogue about 20 or 30 years ago, made $70,000 by his patent. The decade "Jim Crow" toy, introduced about two years ago, was invented by a Kendall boy, and has made him rich.

Not long ago a strange and uncouth form, for many nights, invaded the back-yards, and disturbed the quiet of the sleepers in the rear of Fulton-street, Brooklyn. It was even whispered by the superstitious that its general appearance was not unlike that usually attributed to the "Evil One;" somebody, however, thinking, perhaps, that it was scarcely safe to risk such a supposition, resolved to watch over such a church, set a trap. The next morning the result was manifest in the shape of a bright-eyed, wiry, indomitable little cat, whose appearance was the signal for the cognomen of "woodchuck." He was duly shut up, and disappeared from the premises, but was at last in the centre of a ton of coal in the cellar into which he had burrowed. The inhabitants of the Heights can once more "sleep of nights," and the cat is in a solid and subdued excitement over the supposition that a cooler and more metropolitic still survives in a box under the church.

A young boy in St. Louis recently made an unexpected and unpleasant voyage through the upper air. He was playing ball with some young companions, when a sudden and violent storm of rain and wind came on. He took refuge under a wagon and entertained his boy, about ten years old, was suddenly caught up by the wind, carried a considerable distance in a mild

A MERE SCRATCH.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER VII.

It was some weeks after the momentous occurrences above related that Mrs. Mulcaster and her fair daughters found themselves together in their pretty drawing-room, following, or attempting to follow, their accustomed avocations.

Mrs. Mulcaster, pale and sweet as a lily that has peeped out in the confidence of May, and been nipped by that inclement season, reversed, of the three, to have made the greatest efforts to be industrious, and to have succeeded least.

Her baby, with one string snapped (a catastrophe that brought the day's practice to a conclusion), stood on one old knee and beat by on the other. Before her was an unfinished landscape, with something terrible in the sky, and, in the fore-ground, an impossible tree-trunk, which refused up the steel in very natural consternation at the weird aspect of things. A perfect apparel of books, blue, red, mauve, yellow, proved that the young lady had tried, by every ordinary means, to exercise the demon of unrest before falling her white hands and yielding fairly to the languid inactivity in which we find her.

It had been a week of much uncertainty and discontent. The mere material absence of George was an evil in itself. Mrs. Mulcaster bore beating like him. Never was a victim whose gentle retorts gave greater zest to provocation! These pleasures had departed, and left a weary void. The house his presence had enlivened must be filled up somehow, and every attempt to do this in a satisfactory manner had ended in signal failure. As for the cause of his absence, that was, by consent, ignored, as a matter at once too distressing for Mrs. Mulcaster, and too absurd for Lucy.

Mrs. Mulcaster had proposed change of scene for her injured darling, and had even written surreptitiously to a friend in Queen St. Colonsh, at Ryde, on the subject of cheerful lodgings; but Mildred, on being sounded, at once declared her intention of remaining by where she was, until—until—no matter— To which period the project was accordingly deferred.

Remarkable to say, had reached The Rise during the past week. That something of an unusual nature had occurred at dusky Grafter could on no account be doubt. But what was it? The hundred tongues of rumor sometimes confound each other, and nothing worse could have been a desperate rout. There was no coherence in the advices from the village with which Gosling was in daily and most intimate relation. If, for example, as alleged, Sir George had shown symptoms of aberration of intellect, how should the cook's having had a dog in the same condition have been the means of he master's recovery? Or how should the present household of Sir George's young lady of enormous wealth, and descent little short of royal, have proved so unacceptable to a very illustrious personage, that he should be favored Mr. Fillmore to decline the publication of the bans for the ensuing Sunday? Again, why should the decease of Sir Jabez throw the cook into killed him, into such a frenzy of despair, that nothing short of the marriage of Sir George with a Miss Jo Splagen, who was a second connection of the burgomaster of Sauerdam, restore her equanimity? The cook, the dog, the lady, and Sir George, seemed, to be engaged in a sort of round," into which the butler, though without a partner, was perpetually dodging and crossing in the most perplexing complications.

Vague and cursory allusions had fallen from casual visitors; but these parties had invariably, like strangers approaching a rpat marked "dangerous," glanced swiftly off into indifferent topics, having that forced flavor that indicates, unmistakably, how imminent had been the peril. Into these poor Mrs. Mulcaster, burning with anxiety to understand what had really happened, was compelled to follow. Come what might of Gosling's love of secrecy in properties, it was not for her to express one word of interest in the matter. But she compared notes in private with her younger daughter, and was at no pains to conceal her disquietude.

"You may smile, Louisa, and arch your brows, but mark my words, Lucy, my child, in his excitement, has done something rash—committed himself, I mean, to some folly that it may tax all the ingenuity of his friends to set right, after all, entail upon him a lifelasting misery."

"Do you say, dearest mamma," replied Louisa, "and mask my words. In another week George will be among us on the same footing as before."

Her mother shook her head prophetcy, but shook her head.

"I know George Gosling," she said.

"And I Mildred Mulcaster," said Loney.

As the ladies sat together on the day we have mentioned, a visitor was given them, the announcement of whose name seemed to create a subdued sensation not wholly unwelcome.

"Miss Shrapnell."

This lady was the last that remained unmarried of the very numerous daughters of the late Lord Bowsey. The deceased nobleman had been a quiet, mild-mannered little man, who had given no trouble to the land. His disposition was so gentle and humane that it seems like a pleasantry to state that his whole existence was passed in the invention of the most terrible agents for the destruction of the person and property of his fellow-creatures.

To him is society indebted for the first conception of that delicate little instrument the Scaquake shell, whose sole function is to hurl the largest human battle ship that ever swam fifty fathoms out of her native element.

To Lord Boombe the world's best acknowledgments are considerably overdue for that beautiful adaptation of steam-power to military ends, which, at the distance of three miles, will effect the annihilation of an entire battalion, colonel, drummers, band, doctor, and all, in the insignificant space of one minute and a half.

Encouraged by obtaining, after a correspondence of thirty-five years, the consent of Government to test the value of this last invention on the very first favorable opportunity, his lordship next turned his attention to the perfecting his balloon-gun, which, calculated to reduce, at one discharge, the most powerful fortress in Europe, when a slight explosion in his laboratory, so trivial as to have been mistaken by the butler for the cat sneezing, shattered his nervous system, and, in fact, extinguished the illness from which he died.

The family mansion, Battery-Boombe, was curious in itself, as representing the old system of living adapted to the residence of a small British family. It had a draw-bridge, moat, and wall, with salient and re-entering angles and loopholes, although it was almost beyond the range of possibility that any rational human being would sally or re-enter thereby. There was a laboratory and a guard-room, besides another apartment or two, the whole made bomb-proof with a covering of earth twelve feet thick, the six young ladies inhabited the casemates, until, finding, in due course, mates of another description, they were discharged—married—like shots fired at regular intervals. The old man, and now the sole, Miss Shrapnell, formed, with her own modest establishment, the entire garrison holding Battery-Boombe, from which she descended, grenade in hand, whenever a fitting opportunity for exploding the same with effect seemed to present itself.

Miss Shrapnell, like her excellent father, had a soft, mellow manner, which went straight forward smiling entrance into the good graces of all who were not forewarned of what was likely to ensue. She had a knack of possessing herself of every species of unwelcome news. She would mould and condense the same into the form of a pill, and, taking her station with a little garden of delight, in which every body was completely happy and at ease, bang went the shot into the very midst, and all was misery, confusion, and bespattered, exulting.

Mrs. Mulcaster was fully aware of this little peculiarity, and felt toward her visitor much the same regard and confidence with which James the First might have welcomed Guy Fawkes, had that gentleman escaped and presented himself at a levee.

Sweetly and softly Miss Shrapnell came melting into the room.

"Dear friends! At last. Hush—stop. Dear Mrs. Mulcaster, dear Louisa, dear Lucy, you—don't ask—don't even breathe! Heavens! what a picture! (She drew a deep inspiration.) Enough! Thanks. I have done my duty, and am happy! Gosling ordered the enthusiastic lady. "What a gift is yours! Without uttered one syllable, without the assistance of a muscle, you have been able to make a poor solitary creature happy for the day. How bright you are!"

"Lonzy, draw down that blind," said Mrs. Mulcaster.

"—how tranquil! how serene! Dear Mrs. Mulcaster, how sweetly this troublesome world glides onward with its fleeting hours, when, like you, it seems to enter into little plots to make certain people happy. Is you not so? dear Mrs. Mulcaster? Confess, now—you not as perfectly content as human heart can desire?"

"I—I am very content and happy—in my surroundings," the lady half addressed, suspiciously.

"Content!" moaned Miss Shrapnell. "Then, nay Heaven forgive you!"

"Well, I hope so," said Mrs. Mulcaster, still on her guard. "But why?"

"Content! Simply content! Your glorious Mildred! Your gentle, twining Loney?"

"I am entirely content," said Miss Louisa, pretending to pout.

"But what blessings as these, my dear Mrs. Mulcaster," continued their visitor, in an admonitory tone, "I hold that contentment nothing short of crime! Did dear one of your daughters—Mildred—for instance? Mildred, darling, you have known what's what. Is that Mildred not happy?"

"Is it a riddle?" asked Mildred.

"No: a question."

"A duck," said Mildred, languidly.

"Nonsense, my dear; a hal—something. Well, the Rise always reminds me of the hal thing. Sunshine and smooth waters, and no rips. Is that your creed?"

Mrs. Mulcaster became seriously alarmed. Miss Shrapnell had a way of saying things which were disgusting the hazard of her gun. If Mildred could only be got out of range all was well.

"Mildred, dear," she said, hesitatingly, "Miss Shrapnell, I am sure, will kindly excuse you. Remember your little work."

Mildred, sweet, was, however, insensible to the danger, and, being indisposed for any little walk, retained her seat.

"Well, I, at all events, must go my way," resumed Miss Shrapnell. "Five minutes with Gosling, whose house does more for me than an hour elsewhere. It tones and braces me. The music of the spheres (which must have been composed by Gosling) must mingle sorely fed a parallel in the quiet soothing harmony that prevails at Gosling's. Good-by all. Do you know I always feel inclined to call it 'home?'"

"I am sure you could not pay it a more welcome compliment than that," said Mrs. Mulcaster, as soon as possible," said the lady addressed, preparing to bow the visitor out on prompter politeness allowed.

"Adieu, then, my happy friend!" cried the affectionate lady, and, to Mrs. Mulcaster's equal surprise and relief, tripped to the window. Still, there was a lurking gleam in her eye, like the glimmering of a port-fire, and Mrs. Mulcaster could hardly bring herself to believe. Fowler, however, had, by this, power with such manifest pains, succeeded in shutting the blind.

Her misgiving was correct. The bonnet of Miss Shrapnell, like the muzzle of a gun suddenly run out, reappeared at the door. She smiled sweetly on the three.

"Heard the news?"

"No!" exclaimed Mildred.

"Sir George Gosling is engaged to his cook."

Miss Shrapnell softly closed the door, and drove away in the highest glee. Never had she delivered a shriller, more unmistakable report. Mildred fainted. It was some minutes before the excellent lady could compose herself ditty to the preparation of another little missile, and, when she succeeded for a while, she had every reason to believe, had money in a country bank that her charges were duly and safely received.

The explosion of an actual bomb in the sewing-room of The Rise could hardly have produced greater consternation. Mildred was pale as marble, and full of horror. Louisa burst into tears. Mrs. Mulcaster, rather prepared for the fatal tidings, thought only of their effect upon her darling—on whom she lavished every consolation her mind could suggest. But Mildred repulsed her mother's every advance. Reticence was the dominant feeling. George had done by what he considered honorable, and had been defied to do. The work was entirely her own.

"I am a vile, wicked, heartless woman," moaned Mildred, "to have driven him to madness. Let nobody cross me—nobody comfort me. I tell you I am all made up of self and folly. Oh, mamma—why didn't you? Why didn't you?"

"My treasure, didn't I what?" said Mrs. Mulcaster, soothingly.

"Punish me when I was little!" retorted the spoiled one, with flashing eyes. "You knew my willfulness."

"Pretty well," sighed poor Mrs. Mulcaster.

"There—you confess it—and with all my life's happiness at stake! Oh, mamma, I wish I could forgive you!"

"Louisa—my child, my child!" said Mrs. Mulcaster, turning to her younger daughter. "Should Providence ever send you children, recollect that too great tenderness may cost you their duty."

"Mildred is not herself, mamma," said Lucy, with some warmth. "I do believe she is mad."

"I thank you, Louisa, for your very kind and sisterly remark," said Mildred, majestically. "I shall at least know where I need not seek comfort or sympathy in my sorrow."

"You told us, dear, you did not want any," replied Louisa.

Mildred put her tiny hands to her face.

"Lonzy, Lonzy!" exclaimed her mother, "surely this is not like you. Be more your former temper, I beg, or must request you to leave the room until my suffering child is better able to endure such rebukes."

"Mamma, dear, I am sorry at all, mamma," said Mildred, bursting into a flood of tears.

"My darling, compose yourself. See, Louisa, what your violence has done! Hark, hark! There's a visitor. Quick, Louisa! Not at home?"

"Not at home," said Mildred, wiping her beautiful eyes, and regaining her dignity. "This must not be. Let them come. Let any body come. Mamma, I am quite prepared to see Mr. Gosling. It is said that your daughter was breaking her heart in solitude because her lover had abandoned her on his civilities!"

"Because," remarked Louisa, dryly, "that would hardly represent the facts?"

"Hush, hush, Louisa," said Mrs. Mulcaster, authoritatively.

And the servant announced

"Colonel Lugard."

The colonel saw at a glance that tidings of some kind were to be communicated. Nevertheless, the smile he had worn on entering did not relax; but, on the contrary, became of a more decided length.

"I caught sight of Miss Shrapnell's pony-carriage," he said, "as I turned into the drive and quickened my pace in the hope of overtaking it. But I'm only in time to restore order. Whenever I can not anticipate my fair neighbor of Battery-Boombe, I make a point of following her up promptly as I can. And you can hardly imagine, my dear ladies, how much I am obliged to Miss Shrapnell for her habit of concise intelligence, straightening distorted facts, and general repairs of a like description. I am a complete subscriber to every number of Miss Shrapnell. Which bit now? Come, tell the doctor. Well, my dear Miss Louisa, you look flushed. I begin with you. The last piece of county gossip conveyed to you related to—to—shall I go on? A wedding."

Mrs. Mulcaster had glanced at Mildred to see how her daughter's calm, fixed look, and the colonel's beaming smile, were affecting the latter. She rose.

"You," he said, addressing them all, "like myself, have heard a ridiculous rumor connecting the name of our young friend George Gosling with one so far beneath him in station that the jest—and a very good one indeed was it was—ought to have been at once apparent."

Mildred's look thanked the speaker so eloquently that his own smile grew enough his heart, for he knew, that unlucky cloud, that there was sure, considerably more, to say. With that radiant glance, too joyful for disguise, entered like the colonel's startled soul the conviction that Mildred loved, and that he himself, proposing for the hand of Miss Beatrix Gosling, from an unworthy rumor, must, if he told his story out, scatter worse confusion than Miss Shrapnell herself.

He knew, in common with many others, that a union between George Gosling and Mildred Mulcaster had been ranked among the very probable events of the county; but of the actual engagement, and its rupture, he had not heard. Mrs. Mulcaster had, at his last visit, mentioned in a rather significant manner that intercourse between the families was prohibited. When, therefore, the report reached him that George was about to be married, and to one of his own dependents, the gentlemanly gentleman had been entirely limited to his young friend's selection. "There has been a very unfortunate mistake in the case of Sir George," thought the perplexed officer, "and of that, her the cook, they know nothing. Halt, there must be secrecy."

But this prudent manœuvre was not to be executed by "there" Mrs. Mulcaster did not permit it. Convinced of the falsehood of Miss Shrapnell's tidings, Mrs. Mulcaster saw no objection to continuing the subject.

"It is curious how circumstantial falsehood has become of late. My only wonder is that we were not favored with all the particulars of the courtship of Geo—Sir George Gosling's courtship."

"Ha, ha!" laughed the colonel. "Gosling, you know, grows like the Highland cairn. Every body adds a stone!"

"Scandalous! Stories like these, devoid of the merest atom of foundation, should be visited with some severer punishment."

"Ahem!" said the colonel—"yes."

"You don't agree with me?"

"Perfectly, my dear Mrs. Mulcaster—yes. Such," added the colonel, briskly, "could not be too severely reprehended."

"Such as this," said Mrs. Mulcaster, fixing him to the point.

The poor colonel winced. His sense of justice, ever a Shrapnell, was keen.

"I—I do not—" he said. "Will Crooke—" (Will Crooke once his orderly, now his groom, was the colonel's reserve in difficulty; but here William could not act. The appeal must be to a still higher authority.)

"I beg your pardon. Will—?"

"Yes. The—the fact is, I am a very poor reliable groom, and am ever ready to make some blunder or other. But Will—Will is the man. That fellow chronicles every family and neighborhood: and sometimes, as we are jogging along the road, gallops up, solutting, and reports some nonsense he has picked up at the kitchen door from an outpost. Well, I must say good-morning."

"You will do no such thing," said Mrs. Mulcaster, decisively, "until you have explained why you hesitated when I said there was no pretext for this wild report of Miss Shrapnell's."

"Did I hesitate?" said the colonel. "No—did I? He glanced round for assistance. He would be tell all he knew, all that the too-reliable Will had been reporting to him, up to the moment that he, the colonel, dismounted at the door?

Relief came from an unexpected quarter.

"Sir George Gosling has not decided to marry his cook," said Mildred, with a perfectly steady voice and look. "Will you tell us, Colonel Lugard, if you are aware of the circumstances that have led to it?"

Had the colonel detected the slightest change of colour, or tremulousness of voice, he would have forced with the question, direct as it was. Taking courage, however, from the speaker's, he boldly admitted—of course, on the authority of Will Crooke—that the young baronet was understood to have made his selection, and that it had fallen upon a young lady every way qualified to grace her future station.

"That is—very well," said Mildred, in the same steady voice; "and—who—" but there the sound suddenly became a whisper, and ceased.

"Who is it?" asked Louisa.

"You remember," replied the colonel, "my mentioning a young person of singular appearance (some might call her handsome) whom I met in the park, and who—and who—"

A cry from Mrs. Mulcaster! Louisa glancing like a white meteor across the room! She was burdy in time, and fell into her sister's arms with a beautiful bair flooding the ground. Her desperate attempt to emab the broken had failed. Nature triumphed.

As for the poor colonel, alarmed yet helpless, as men usually are under such circumstances, and conscious that his position after making a false bound the bell, then toward the window, murmurs of "Will Crooke—Will Crooke!" from his lips, he heard a sound a retreat. While lingering in the hall a message from Mrs. Mulcaster announced that her daughter, on recovering consciousness, had been conveyed to her room, and that she herself begged him to return.

"Can you," she said, "spare me five minutes longer?"

"Can I, my dear lady?" exclaimed the gossip-loving veteran—"I can and will." The colonel then related all he knew from Will Crooke about the meeting in the rose-garden, the encounter with the dog, and the sudden engagement between Sir George and Esther Ives.

"He had known her long?"

"Since five o'clock in the morning," said the colonel; "at which hour they met, quite accidentally, in the rose-glenaure. The acquaintance, however, ripened very rapidly. George's habit of early rise, selected that opportune moment for doing what, in my humble opinion, he has been obliged to do before him. He went mad. The insane parties met, and but for the really heroic conduct of this girl, Esther Vane, would have committed suicide in the lake. She did not actually save his life, she delivered him, at the risk of her own, from a momentary peril. Such was the account before she quitted the house that day. The marriage is to take place almost immediately."

"Most disgraceful proceeding!" exclaimed the lady.

"It was not so purposed," resumed the colonel, reveling in the luxury of narration. "It was to be private. Before George had made up his mind to inform his sister, Lady Boncaffel, of his new engagement, some one of a better set what had let him. Down came my lady as fast as four horses could bring her, to remonstrate. But, no. George was kind, but immutable. This girl, who, he admitted, was the daughter of a nursery governess, but decently educated, should be his wife. Down she departed, telegraphed to Buckfield. (A bad move.) Down comes my lord, secretly furious, and, as the first interview, lest all that slight amount of temper he usually possessed, Gosling had borne with his sister, had he wouldn't stand that; and, to end the account at once, he had left the country with them the assurance that George would resent their ill-advised and worse-managed interposition, by carrying his marriage into immediate effect—a measure to which the young lady could be prevailed on to agree. What impression he had used," concluded the host, "I can not pretend to say; but of this I am certain—Will Crooke knows it to be a fact—that the girl has consented to abandon, very materially, the interval for which, with a propriety for which we can't deny her credit, she had stipulated. Will Crooke, in short, who has removed to a small farm-house a few miles from hence, where her niece will, no doubt, join her, and Miss Shrapnell, I believe, at a little village—Rosedale—close at hand."

"A fortnight, my good friend," said Mrs. Mulcaster, rising nervously, and looking considerably alarmed at the task before her.

CHAPTER VIII.

The report of that active intelligencer, Will Crooke, to his colonel of the proceedings at Gosling Graise was strictly correct, notwithstanding what of reality in regard to the stormy character of the conference that followed Lord Haghead's appearance on the scene. The temper of the latter, however, was not to be described, was not improved by his compulsory jaunt of two hundred miles, nor by the compromising aspect of affairs on his arrival. Thus, instead of interposing with a young connection (George was by many years his junior), he gave such decisive expression to his general displeasure at the proposed match, that George, in his turn having given consent, cut the matter short by declaring his intention irrevocable, and refused to hear another word on the subject. Swelling with rage and disappointment, Lord Haghead had ordered round his horses, and departed on the spot—vowing that nothing on earth should induce him to taste food prepared by the hands of the future Lady Gosling's aunt —but for George's promise that the difficulty should be obviated by removing a significant figure in the cook. It needed all Clara's tact and eloquence to bring about an armistice which should save appearances, and subject at all events to the following conditions, of which the visitors might depart in peace.

George was to marry Esther, but for from happy. He was fond of his sister, and had recently relied upon her for the re-establishment of good relations with his proud and haughty mother, and had been deeply mortified by his projected marriage. But Clara had imbibed something of her brother's family pride, and added to the abrupt manner in which the news (which, she justly felt, should have come from her brother himself) had been conveyed to her, strong feelings against him. He must fight it out alone.

And herself? Under the first impact of long months of this mental solitude, uncheered by the presence of her upon whom every thought of his heart was now centered, she had almost sunk from Clara. A fever of impatience possessed him, to which neither solitude nor exercise afforded any effectual relief. One thing was very certain, he could not wait until the weary interval at Gosling Graise. What if he should bread a letter? Nothing went to bed, nothing of folly.

He was awakened by a cry of alarm and horror uttered by his own lips. He had had a frightful dream. Esther, her fair face torn and disfigured by the fangs of the rabid Swarts, appeared to him engaged in desperate conflict with the furious animal, and shrieking for aid. The vision was so real that he had risen and set foot on the floor before he was convinced of its illusion. In certain conditions of mind things that might else pass for no more than their actual value exercise a most unpleasant and disproportionate excitement. This dream (a mere dream), connected itself with no reasonable fear, and yet was terrible. In vain he strove with the sinister presentiment. In vain he busied himself with traveling preparations.

A conviction fastened upon his mind that to quit her now would be to bid her an eternal farewell. At length he took the resolution to write to her one passionate appeal, in which, after describing the doubt and trouble that possessed him, he implored her to abandon, for his sake, the interval of delay for which she had stipulated, and accompany him to Italy as his bride.

While waiting her reply, George occupied himself with the arrangements rendered necessary by what would, in any case, be a prolonged absence from home. He took measures for selling his horses and quitting his establishment. Mrs. Mapes, the housekeeper, rendered totally ineffective by continued mesmerism, had resigned, and in this circumstance had made it peculiarly easy for Mrs. Turnover should, for the present, retain office. Although George, who, in the strange aspect of affairs, disliked to see her in a menial capacity, would have preferred to have her remove at once to a pleasanter and commodious cottage he had purchased at the pretty village of Rosedale, whither he hoped Esther would come to join her.

There was nothing now to prevent this arrangement being carried out, and George, after waiting several days in vain for an answer to his letter, determined to quit Goslin Grange on the morrow.

He should have parted cordially with Mrs. Turnover.

"I trust you will find every thing to your satisfaction, my good old friend," said George, "and that what your illness may be personally to abandon her teaching and come to learn—learn housekeeping, I mean, under your able tuition, at Rosedale. Thus I shall perhaps see you both before I begin my travels."

Mrs. Turnover was in tears; she didn't know why; she always did cry when people went away, she seemed to imply a range and time of immense magnitude and duration.

"Wishing you the best of 'ealth and sperrets, Sir," sobbed the good lady: "and, if I may be so bold, don't go to-night. Let me 'ave a bit of supper and a wedge in each pocket. Did I ever tell you, when you was a boy, them words of Mr. Turnover? They was the last."

"His very last?" asked George, suspiciously.

"Well, dy, I 'ad been silent so long that we thought he was actually gone; and the nuss, which had been promised another job, wanted to put him in the coffin be'd cooled for about three days before, when, as he was aguin', T, opens one eye and crooks his little finger, which meant 'Lift me up and put a wine-glassful of gruel, not too hot, with half a dozen drops of brandy in it.' That was giv', and he says, 'Don't chuck your relations 'ome. Host horses and sell.' He beat a swaggling every twenty minutes since I was five year old, I'd have seen an 'ithy individual now. Adoo!"

Mrs. Turnover bobbed and departed.

Little did the kind-hearted manor of the house that night. As he flung open the casement and welcomed the dawn a fancy seized him to visit the rose-pleasaunce which had first taken the hunting-voice that now seemed forever speaking to his soul. Autumn was now well advanced. But a rose was to be seen which George could have picked out the very tree by which Esther had stood—almost the very thorn by which she had been wounded—and, with the idle finger-pressure of lovers and lunatics, snipped off the spray, thorns and all, and put it in his button-hole! Sitting by the tree from which he had issued to surprise the trespasser, he strove to conjure up the fairy face, and, having done so, fell into a reverie gloomier than any. He knew that, in writing to her as he had done, he had broken the compact they had made, and that henceforth (for this was the fifth day) left him seriously to fear that she would act upon her threat and consider their intercourse at an end.

The sound of the little gate opening disturbed his meditations. He, familiar with the post-boy.

The butler announced that breakfast was on the table.

"In half an hour," said George. "I will read my letters here."

His eye had already detected a strange handwriting. It was a firm, fair hand, an Esther-like hand. He hesitated for an instant, then tore it open, and with a glance devoured the contents, which were of the briefest.

The blood dew to his forehead.

"She is mine!" he exclaimed, clasping the letter aloft in his exulting hands.

To explain this satisfactory result we must return for a moment to Esther herself.

When that inflexible young lady went back go her to sincere old friend Grimble's, she did so with the full intention of peremptorily dismissing from her mind all such recollections as were at all likely to interfere with the performance of her accustomed duties. Finding, however, that these comprised every word and incident that, in the remotest degree connected themselves with her late visit to Gosling Grange, Esther came to the conclusion to regard the whole affair as a bestial vision, which might, or might not, have reference to some future event, but by no means justified an idle apprehension. And such was the influence of woman's mind, that the calm and unimaginative Esther shortly brought herself to believe that she had been the victim of an illusion! A glance at her woundedhand, however, always restored the reality.

"What's a pain to-day at your hand as often for, Miss Vann?" said little Maud Grimble. "Is it—Oh, Miss Vann, how bad it is!"

"Nonsense, dear, it's nothing. A mere scratch," replied Esther, mechanically putting it to her lips.

But Maud's examination had attracted me, who had come clustering round to examine the hurt.

"What a long scratch! Does it pain you still, dear?" said little pupil.

"Not at all. I like it. I love it!" replied Esther, impatiently.

Esther couldn't afterward the wondering circle.

"What did I say? You are making me mad, I think," said the young governess. "Go on with your lesson, Maud. The products of Staffordshire are—"

But little people are observant; and that brief dialogue, and the wound that was "liked," were not forgotten.

This story must be frankly told. Poor Esther, despite her gallant struggle to regain her mental mastery of thought and duty, was destined to fail. One haunting doubt, that nothing could exorcise, pressed itself more and more, infesting even her innocent dreams, so that she would awake under the consciousness, as it were, of some accusation to which she could oppose no sufficient answer. Suppose, something whispered, George's host love her repented of her precipitancy and learned a letter remorse that her heart was all his own? Suppose that this fact should be made known to George? Would it revive the sentiment he long cherished, so lately overcome? Could she put faith in her lover's present feelings? Nay, ought he to rely upon his own? Even if it were so, had she, Esther, acted honorably in assisting to neutralize all hope of a reconciliation between person separated only by the caprice of one?

This state of doubt and perplexity began to influence her bodily health. Headaches (to which she had hitherto been a stranger) and a strange nervousness, with protracted palpitations of the heart, occasionally fainting, assailed her. In spite of every effort at self-control, she found herself becoming querulous, irritable, impatient. This cost the poor girl many penitent tears, and weeping renewed her headache, until she grew heart-sick, to the detriment of pupils upon the whom to exercise it, which had long since healed, by way of balm to the dull pain that now lay deeper than the wound within.

Such a condition of things could not be favorable to the progress of Grimble education. Mr. and Mrs. Grimble, though good-hearted people in their way, had been raised to their present position of comfort by poverty. By plushing close could they maintain what they conceived to be their dignity. Because they had not hesitated to avail themselves of the services of Esther, both as nurse and governess, for their six children, without any additional salary than her board and lodging. They knew that, save for her worthy aunt, Mrs. Turnover, Esther was without friends or stable of assisting her, and kept the secret of their jewel governess so tightly that, I am sorry to say, when once an opportunity arose for placing Esther with a far superior position, Mrs. Grimble so successfully under-estimated the young governess's attainments as to retain her in the family. Of this circumstance Miss Vann had been somehow made aware. And warming with gratitude to her benefactress over the personal kindness she received from her employers, she had willingly remained in the position in which we found her.

"Do you know, Grimble, I am not quite pleased with Esther of late?" said Mrs. G. to her host. "Not since her last visit to her Aunt Turnover, when she stopped away all night and sent no word. I thought it was like a changed girl. I am afraid she neglects the children."

"And why do you think so, my dear?" inquired Mr. Grimble, with whom Esther was rather a favorite.

"I've had it on my mind some time, my dear lady, and to-day I resolved them all. They have not advanced one bit. Margaret's still in simple long division; Esther's hardly begun the Kings and Queens of North Wales; and Tommy had a theory that eggs were the invention of Archbishop Cranmer, when, instead of his pernicious white looking for the pulpit, I shall speak very seriously to Esther on the subject."

"Of the eggs, my dear? I suppose so. But it's more than I would promise to do," said her husband, laughing. "But," he added, "do you think that Esther is quite well? She looks very pale at times. Besides, she is a good girl, and remember, mamma, we don't pay her governess's salary."

"We give her all she wants, and we treat her as an equal, which is more than they would do at any of your grand houses, I'm certain. But, still, she ought to do her duty by us according—"

"—Eg my love," put in Mr. Grimble, who, since Esther had been in the house, had grown particular in his grammar. "Well, so she ought. Give her a jog. If you like, just to-day, or to-morrow. You know, that's all."

On the day that witnessed this conversation, headache, and that strange sense of uneasiness before alluded to, had compelled poor Esther to seek her own chamber, where she lay, with throbbing temples, cheeks, striving vainly to compose her troubled thoughts. She no longer attempted to banish from herself the strength of the feeling that possessed her. She loved with a wild, inextinguishable love, the depths of which she had never fathomed before.

"—I can not bear this," she gasped, with a choking sob that seemed to give her pain. "I will not bear it. Dare I believe him? Oh, if he can not love me, let me die!"

"Miss Vann! Esther! A letter for you, dear," said a small voice outside the bolted door, and the sentence was skillfully passed under it, the bearer skipping away.

Esther snatched it from the ground. It was not a letter-letter. It had the compact form of a note compended at a glance.

It was her lover's letter, coming like an answer to her prayer. Enough to say that George had set forth, with all the illogical but convincing arguments true passion will suggest, the reasons which existed for a speedy termination of the present condition of suspense. He implored her to place herself under the affectionate care of her relative, in the home he had provided for the latter, to permit him to visit her there, and to sanction the arrangement by some action at the earliest moment to which his prayers might induce her to accede.

Thereupon began a fresh tumult in her soul. Despite its passion there was apparent in George's letter an honest frankness, before which doubt dwindled and dispersed to air. The temptation to listen to his pleading was strong, while her own heart ceased not to whisper: "Esther, you would yield at last!" On the other hand, her sense of delicacy recoiled from the suddenness of the step. Should she not take some consolation, still more the fact of his having so lately erred in the same relation toward another, demanded delay. Still, would pause upon it, and Angel Honor on direct her judgment right!

Her meditations were interrupted by a tap at the door, just sufficiently imperious to denote the mistress of the house. Placing the letter in her bosom Esther hastened to admit her.

"Oh, we feared that you were unwell," began Mrs. Grimble: "but you are looking better, my dear, I must say. So I may say, without fear of increasing your indisposition, what I came about. Your care of the children, Miss Vann, has occasioned much of late."

"Ma'am," faltered Esther, conscious that the charge was not entirely without foundation.

"Pray don't be offended, child," said Mrs. Grimble, coldly pursuing her advantage.

"—I have not been myself lately," replied Esther, pressing her hot hand upon her brow.

"I have just made the remark that you look even better than when you arrived, Mrs. Grimble, statedly. "I will thank you not to contradict me, Miss Vann." (Esther quivered.) "I do not wish for any words with you. I have merely to remind you that, in return for the peculiar advantages you enjoy in being at all times treated as a member of my family, I have a right to expect that your undivided interest and attention be centred in my children. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly, ma'am," said Esther: "and I have to thank you for the most opportune visit, which has enabled me to decide upon a point of distressing difficulty. I am going to leave you."

"How! What! leave me, child!" exclaimed the alarmed lady. "Whither could you go?"

"Not to Mrs. Marjoribanks," said Esther, quietly. (The name brought a slight color into Mrs. Grimble's cheek.) "I am going to my aunt, who is now residing at Rosedale."

"And—and the chil— Nonsense, Esther. It was only looking."

"I am not," said Esther, steadily. "I should not sold such a parting day. I love your children, and am indebted to you, and even more to Mr. Grimble, for an amount of kindness not always shown even to those who can give no substitute of gold. But my mind is made up. I will remain, however, for a few days, if you think it, but my supply may not be deprived of such inefficient teaching as I can still afford; for, indeed," added Esther, rather appealingly, "I am not so well as you suppose, Mrs. Grimble."

Poor Mrs. Grimble was fain to accept this concession, and the interview terminated, leaving on the hands the unpleasant duty of informing her husband that not only had Miss Vann refused to be kept "up to nothing," but had found out of a disciplinary.

Rosedale, whither the last scene of this strange, circumstantial confidences, was a pretty, sequestered village, in and around which more than one of George's ancestors had held property. Hence, though it was somewhat secluded, the Hale Hall Grange would have preferred—about four miles—he had selected it as an eligible residence for his faithful old servant, and provided her with the prettiest cottage-dwelling in the district. Every thing requisite for comfort— even many objects of luxury, had been liberally supplied; for George trusted it might prove the temporary seat of a daughter that he hoped would be soon found to prepare the way.

He was not disappointed. Esther came; and the first meeting in the world of these simple lovers took place in the little pleasance George had caused to be planted, in imitation, perhaps, in imitation of that at The Grahe. Happy beyond expression they lingered in the autumn-tinted wood-walks, or sat beside the drawing-room fire, which, in honor of the inglory, superintended the preparation of those marriage ceremonies, after the due wedding could be prevailed upon to give but slight attention.

Esther's new-found peace seemed to impart a new beauty to her face. Her yesterday's wreck that fell sometimes when the feverish flush would reappear, and a subdued grief in the luminous eye indicated some morbid action lurking in her sensitive system.

One day, when George, who had been absent a little longer than usual, returned to her in her walk, freed from his horse and clasped her hand, she gave a little involuntary cry. He looked down in surprise at the cause, and in doing so, noticed the peculiar feverish and excited expression we have mentioned.

He learned that Esther yesterday struck her hand accidentally against a book-case exactly upon the spot left by the wound of Gosling Grange. It had given her more pain than was easy to be accounted for, seeing that that former wound had long since healed; and, examining the present tenderness on the spot itself, she had since suffered from severe shooting pains, followed by a feeling in the arm, the surrounding nerves up to the very shoulder and neck.

George looked at the scar. It was no longer white, but a dark, livid hue, which, not only at the seat of the recent bruise, but throughout its entire length.

"My darling," he looked by," he said, "this blow has touched a nerve. This terrible wound! When will it cease to reproach me, I wonder!" He kissed it tenderly as he spoke.

"Do you know that even the touch of your lips gives me a tingling pain, dear Father, implored?" "But, what matters, dear? After all, a mere scratch!"

George lingered long that day, as if he could not be tormented Esther's pain. But he returned, whose spirits were higher than common. Wit and fancy sparkled through her conversation, and when George reluctantly departed the night through which he rode seemed dark enough.

When he was fairly gone Esther turned deadly pale and burst into tears, trembling, and at intervals sighing heavily. Then she sank down upon a chair. She was over, frightened, insisted upon her going instantly to bed; and to make sure, saw her tiffiter.

But Esther could not sleep. Something oppressed her breathing. The shooting pains in her hand and arm became more frequent and acute. Soon the very silence seemed to grow intolerable, and she rose and opened the window. The moon was near the full, and as Esther gazed upon it all the mystery sadness of smoothly and dimly through the fields of air a sinister and violent object seemed to break her frame. Alike of a child she closed the casement, and once more sought her pillow. This time she slept, indeed, but it was only to be the more terribly haunted.

Wretched and unrefreshed she rose almost with the dawn, and was shocked at her own strange looks. With a strong effort she threw off the sense of unconscious that tormented her, and, calmed with prayer, walked out into the garden. The morning was dull and overcast; but this, perhaps, from harmonizing with her present condition of mind, seemed more soothing than the sunshine. All events she felt herself growing better, when a little girl, who was proud to call her by name, approached, tripped up the garden and placed a letter in her hand.

The writing was strange. She opened it, read—the blood rushed to her head, almost blinded her—but she had caught the meaning!

"Beware of the step you are about to take. A captain, hitherto unknown to you, entrapped for a moment to hearts long and loyally united. But for you all had been well. Avoid him, and the conquest you think to have made. It will be a noble sacrifice and will be amply rewarded."

There was no signature. But a legion of witnesses could not have brought home the truth more indisputably to Esther's mind than this letter.

"This, this, then, was the coming horror?" she cried aloud. "I will not be starved. Yet still, my heart—I dare! My love so perfect, my soul! I—I will go to, and seek—"

With fatal, feverish steps she made her way to her chamber. Hardly entered, she was seized with a convulsive paroxysm, and, unable to reach the bell, sank on her bed, she sank upon the floor. In doing so she struck her hand slightly on the ground. Instantly an acute pang, accompanied by a sickening shock upward, till it ended with a piercing shock, as if a nail had been driven into her very brain. The faintness increased.

"Water," she thought. "If I could only reach the water!"

She did manage it: but, although longing to cool her burning throat, dashed the half-filled goblet from her. A glass of water, a refreshing, convulsive sensation in her throat, threatened suffocation. She tried to cry out, but could not. She could only mutter—

"Must I die? What—what is this?"

As if in awful answer, a pang, more severe than any that had preceded it, shot from her wounded hand, succeeded by a convulsive tremor pervading her whole frame. She looked at the scar. It was red and angry, surrounded by one spot, and even now living out an ichorous fluid. The truth flashed upon her.

"I am lost!" gasped the unhappy girl, sinking on the floor at the bed-side.

After a second or two she rose and made two or three wild steps toward the door, as if to seek for aid, but, if so, the consciousness that no human help could now avail stopped her, and her thoughts flew to George. Even in that hour of anguish no selfish thought visited her. It was for him she had incurred this end. But who—who was there should tell him? What was to be done? Might Heaven send the needful strength, and keep her senses clear! She scarcely doubted of the latter, for, accustomed with the anatomic phenomena of this fearful disease, she recollected that the senses and faculties are rather stimulated by it than impaired.

Although medicine could not cure, it might alleviate, might relieve. It was the consciousness that assured her. Esther laid out her scheme: for time was brief indeed, and nothing must go wrong. She next vowed to her aunt that she should return to breakfast in half an hour; then, putting on her thickest veil, hurried to the house of the village doctor.

Mr. Wolford was a young practitioner, with a wife who looked like a child, and several children, and who looked as if they had no business there at all. He was alone in his surgery—he generally was—and thither Esther was conducted.

Throwing back her veil, and displaying her flushed cheeks and glittering eyes, the visitor held out her hand:

"Can you tell me, Sir, what is the matter with me?" she asked him, steadily.

Mr. Wolford smiled at the abruptness, but his look changed as he observed the pallid hue of the cheeks and the tokens, manifest even to him, of unwonted disarrangement. There was fever, he thought, but his patient declined to have her pulse felt, and he could not be very inquired thereby. He recommended expose of a sick lady, and proceeded to read immediately what he considered needful.

He quickly prepared the things of which he spoke. Mind once more in possession of itself, Esther had extended her home, but this she declined.

Mrs. Turnover was waiting for her darling, impatient to show her something that awaited her approval. Esther mechanically followed the good lady, but the sight of the little cradle she brought with her put out in state—was, in her overwrought condition, too much for her. Hurrying to said deceptive article, she stood upon the ground, surrendering herself for the moment to all the grief and horror of her position. Disguise was no longer necessary. Time was no longer necessary, for the safety of others, to warn those around of the prohibited nature of the thing in store for them.

The grief and terror of poor Mrs. Turnover would have turned her brain, but that, fortunately, the horror of the sight had brought with it the belief that there was literally no hope—that a creature so fair and young, so tender and beautiful, could find no welcome remedy, and such a death! But the intrepid girl herself was the first to regain composure. She had to take the most active and brief interest, especially the sedatives had obtained, and at once began her mehanical duties.

She wrote to George, in terms such as the purest of fiction alone could dictate, informing him frankly of her condition, and entreating him to come to her that night. This letter was not to be dispatched to him till past noon; she had something else to do before they met.

Accordingly he only received it on his return from the afternoon ride in which he had found it well attempt to exercise. In his despairing anguish, one almost akin to distraction, he thought only of her. He remembered having heard, or read, that an eminent London practitioner, Sir Albert Ray, had, in his experience, met with two cases of admitted rabies, which had, notwithstanding, resulted in a cure. Catching desperately at this straw, he dispatched an hasted express to London, imploring Sir Albert, who was an old friend and schoolmate of his father, to hasten to Rosedale with all speed possible. His fingers could hardly form the terrible word that was to warn Sir Albert how necessary was that speed. "More than one life depends on your coming," wrote George, yielding to the illusory hope: "She is my betrothed wife; I can not live without her." Concluding his swiftest horse, he flew to Rosedale.

Esther was not at, after writing to her lover, was to order a carriage. Nobody thought of remonstrance. There was something in her manner that forbade interference of the kind. She might be ill, but she had veiled she got into the carriage, and was driven to The Grahe. Here she was met by Mrs. Grimble—hurried to see Miss Mulcaster alone—or, if not alone, with her mother.

Miss Mulcaster was alone, in the garden, but she had been somewhat indisposed. The servant hesitated.

"I tell you she would," said Esther, sternly, severely, and, lifting her veil, disclosed a countenance now white as a shroud. The servant turned and led the way.

Mildred was walking pensively on one of the side-terraces. She turned with some surprise to meet the unannounced visitor.

"Forgive, I beg of you, this intrusion," began Esther.

The face and voice sufficed: Mildred waved the servant away, and came on.

"My object is three-fold," said Esther: "to see you—to entreat your pardon—and to repair, if I may, the injury I have done to you and to others. My name is Esther Vann."

"Esther Vann!" exclaimed Mildred, the color rushing into her cheeks, "and you come—"

"Suffer me to speak," said Esther, "and do not interrupt me as I speak. I am dying. I have but a few short hours to live, and these, perhaps, marked with such agony as to make death a humiliant as it is, can hardly. Again I pray you not to fear, but to charity to bear my words. I am dying from the poison of a mad dog's fang delivered into my wounded wrists on my hand. You turn pale, and look pitifully on me. Spare your pity, and hopeful, for my sake," she pressed her hands forcibly on her bosom: "I must be quick. Miss Mulcaster, you were to have been George's wife. He loved you—will do still. As for me, it was a short and transient dream. If he has wronged you, my forgive him: has not he something to forgive? Take back from my dying hand the treasure I had no right to win. He—he is coming to night: he have written to him. Let him not see me, I entreat. Let me have this comfort—dying as young—that I have reunited those hands that should but now have been sundered. Let them, never to part again until we all meet beyond the tyranny of doubts, and pains, and fears." As she concluded she sank at Mildred's feet.

The latter, weeping, stooped to raise and embrace her, but Esther refused.

"Speak, only speak! Answer me, do you grant my prayer? What shall I say to him when he comes?"

"Say," whispered Mildred, drowned in tears, "say that I have nothing to forgive, much to repent of."

"Enough! I will go," said Esther, rising with difficulty to her feet; and resisting, with a sort of mingled fierceness and entreaty, Mildred's eager offers of support and succor, made her way to the carriage and returned to Rosedale.

All that day the convulsive paroxysms recurred at intervals, the progress of the disease being apparently but slightly checked by the palliatives to which she had recourse. The patient became more and more intolerant of light; the slightest touch increased her suffering, and the mere mention of any fluid nourishment brought on the convulsive tremor.

It was dark when George arrived. It would be needless to depict the young man's passionate despair. In vain he had striven to nerve himself for the meeting. The sight of her he loved dying in such a manner, and for him, broke down his manhood. Of the two, Esther was the more composed. She made him sit beside her, and, having somewhat calmed his sorrow, told him, after due preparation, what she had done that day, ending by entreating him, as he would impart some comfort to her dying hour, to accept the peace she had prepared for him, and seek, in the renewal of his earliest—perhaps most warranted—attachment, forgetfulness of this sharp but transitory grief.

George heard her with doubt and bewilderment, as if he hardly understood her words, or thought them expressions of delirium; but she convinced him to the contrary, and pressed her entreaties in such wise that he at length gave way.

"If it be my misery to live," he said, in a broken voice, "I will do it. I will do any thing that you command."

"I am happy," said Esther, softly. Soon after she sank into an exhausted sleep.

To the surprise of those around there was on the morrow no aggravation of the symptoms. The dread march of the disease seemed to be arrested. But Mr. Wofford warned them against any delusive hopes, adding, with truth, that such periods of relief were known to occur.

George's express returned from London almost as swiftly as he had sped thither. He brought a letter from Sir Albert Rex, containing—as might indeed be expected—but little comfort. The eminent physician had cases on his hands so urgent, if less distressing, but would use his utmost endeavors to comply with George's summons. He cautioned his young friend, however, to expect no real benefit from his coming; and, adverting to the cases instanced by George, owned that there was reason to believe that the parties in question might have been inoculated with the virus producing rabies at some antecedent period unknown to themselves. He added some brief suggestions for the patient's medical attendants.

"Just what I am doing," remarked Mr. Wofford, with a satisfied air.

It was not until the fourth morning had dawned that Sir Albert Rex drove up to the cottage. His eye caught the open windows.

"She lives yet!" he thought, with some surprise.

The next moment he was beside the bed of the fevered-tossing patient. George was astonished at the calm, confident, almost cheerful face with which the renowned physician gazed upon a case which every one felt to be hopeless, and he presently descended to the drawing-room, there to await the word of doom.

When Sir Albert rejoined him the look of confidence had vanished. He pressed his young friend's hand.

"No hope!" murmured the latter.

"There should be none," replied the other. "I shall see her again, when I have spoken with her medical adviser—Mr. whom did you say—Wofford. He is sent for, I think. This is, you say, the fourth day—for fourth?" (George assented.) "That is unusual.....

but there is no absolute rule." And the doctor fell into meditation.

"Has this poor lady made frequent allusion to the cause of her attack?"

"Very frequent."

"Is she acquainted with the ordinary symptoms of the disorder?"

"Too well, I fear!"

"Hem! It may be so," said Sir Albert, thoughtfully. "Has she complained of a rising—a globular feeling (if I called it by its name, clavus hystericus, you wouldn't understand me) in her throat?"

"From the first."

"Where the dence is Wofford?" said Sir Albert, starting from his chair. "One question more, by-the-by. Had she suffered from any sudden and violent impulse of emotion?"

"None that I am aware of," said George; "but—"

"Stay you here," said the physician, and vanished. The ten minutes that followed seemed interminable. When his step was heard returning George's heart stood still.

"Can you bear hope?" were the first words he heard. "Mind, I say hope—no more. Then," continued Sir Albert, without waiting for an answer, "give me a magnifying-glass. Look at the toy they offered me above." (He showed Mrs. Turnover's spectacles.)

"Nay, as I'm a living doctor, here's my own. How come I—I remember. Come with me."

They went up stairs. Esther was sitting up in bed, pale as death.

"There's a complexion for you!" cried the doctor, exultingly. "Talk to me of rabies, with a face like that! Woford was a baby, and, 'faith, I'm not much better for listening to you all instead of attending to my work myself. Come, miss, I must have another and a closer peep at that hand. Out with it!" He applied the glass very carefully, looking at it again and again. Then he fumbled a little with his waistcoat-pocket, and presently saying, sweetly, "Now don't scream," probed the open wound with a touch that absolutely wrung from the patient the shriek he had deprecated. It was but that single touch. He waved something aloft.

"There's your mad dog!" he shouted. "Rabies! hydrophobia! Hydrofiddlestick! A rose-thorn and a lacerated nerve. In no more danger than I am! A sudden emotion brought on hysteria. Her own imagination did the rest. The case is uncommon. Keep her quiet—light solids. See, I am going to lie down for two hours. If, by that time, my lady here is not drinking like a little fish I'll resign my diploma."

The doctor was right. In two hours he had departed, carrying with him countless blessings.

It was the fifth morning. The lovers—such, alas! they were—sat together for the last time, for Esther was inflexible. George's oath and promise must be held as sacred as though her own life had not been ransomed from the fearful doom that seemed to threaten it. Her whole soul was devoted to the task of reconciling him to the separation, which was inevitable, and must be immediate.

How far she succeeded there is no occasion to relate. The trial was not decreed.

George was summoned away for a few moments, and in his place there was kneeling a veiled figure. The veil was thrown aside, and never did Mildred's angel-face look more angelic than while she whispered:

"My darling! I come to give you back your own. My compact was not made with the living Esther, but the dead. He is yours, and my blessing with him; for you have taught me a noble lesson, that shall not be lost upon this selfish heart. And do not fear or grieve for me. When we meet, in pleasant days (I hope) to come, I shall be able to confess that my happiness, which deserved a deadly wound, has, like this dear hand, after all, sustained but a mere scratch."

LITTLE PAT AND THE PARSON.

He stands at the door of the church peeping in,
No troublesome beadle is near him;
The preacher is talking of sinners and sin,
And little Pat trembles to hear him:
A poor little fellow alone and forlorn,
Who never knew parent or duty—
His head is uncover'd, his jacket is torn,
And hunger has withered his beauty.

The white-headed gentleman shut in the box
Seems growing more angry each minute—
He doubles his fist, and the cushion he knocks,
As if anxious to know what is in it.
He scolds at the people who sit in the pews—
Pat takes them for kings and princesses,
(With his little bare feet—he delights in their shoes:
In his rags—he feels proud of their dresses!)

The Parson exhorts them to think of their need
To turn from the world's dissipation—
The naked to clothe and the hungry to feed—
Pat listens with strong approbation!
And when the old clergyman walks down the aisle,
Pat runs up to meet him right gladly—
"Shure, give me my dinner," says he, with a smile,
"And a jacket—I want them quite badly!"

The kings and princesses indignantly stare,
The beadle gets word of the danger,
And, shaking his silver-tipped stick in the air,
Looks knives at the poor little stranger.
But Pat's not afraid, he is sparkling with joy,
And cries—who so willing to cry it?—
"You'll give me my dinner—I'm sure you're a poor boy:
You said so—now don't you deny it?"

The pompous old beadle may grumble and glare,
And growl about robbers and arson;
But the boy who has faith in the sermon stands there,
And smiles at the white-headed Parson!
The kings and princesses may wonder and frown,
And whisper, he wants better testing;
But the white-headed Parson looks tenderly down
On the boy who has faith in his preaching.

He takes him away without question or blame,
As eager as Patsy to press on,
For he thinks a good dinner (and Pat thinks the same)
Is the moral that lies in the lesson.
And after long years when Pat, handsomely dress—
A smart footman—is asked to determine
Of all earthly things what's the thing he likes best,
He says, "Och! shure, the master's odd sermin!"

VISIT OF THE POPE TO THE EMPRESS CARLOTTA IN ROME.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE OLD STORY.

I WAS a woman, and I'd a heart,
And I raved of love and of constancy,
And he saw the tears to my eyelids start,
For he was the world to me!

He whisper'd low when the spring-time flew,
Of the tangled paths in which men stray,
And around me all his arms he threw,
His eyes were on fire that day.

We parted: yes! but I clung to him,
And I put up my lips to be kissed again;
But the laughing eyes of the heav'n grew dim,
And were swollen black with rain.

They came to me when my love was gone,
And said he was poor and toiled for bread;
They talk'd of rain and tears alone,
And my heart was dull as lead.

And then they laid their bribe at my feet—
'Twas the same old tale that is often told—
They play'd on the strings of my heart's conceit,
And dazzled my eyes with gold.

I sold myself to a loveless thing,
And I walk'd to the altar and there I lied;
For my heart was away with the primrose spring,
And I by my husband's side.

And now you ask me what of the lie?
I've paid full dear for my girlish greed;
'Twere better, I think, for a woman to die
Than to live the life I lead.

I am alone, but still I can sing,
And pray for the ruin of winter's rain,
For the scent of the primrose-crown of spring
Will return to me again.

THE OLD STORY—"I SOLD MYSELF TO A LOVELESS THING."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

WITH the changing season and the confirmed cold weather a change is taking place in the form of the chapeau, which now covers more of a lady's head than has been the case for many months past. Velvet promises to be the favorite material, and blue, black, and gray, of every variety of shade, are the colors chiefly in vogue. The trimming is extremely simple, and consists either of jet ornaments or glass beads and lace, with occasionally a small ostrich feather, a bow of ribbon, or a single flower at the side. Bonnets of pale blue velvet, trimmed with white lace, and having white satin strings, are much in favor. Those of black velvet are frequently bordered with a narrow cerise-color piping, and are occasionally turned up very slightly at the edges. The trimming in this case is merely a simple rose at the side. Strings, which are worn extremely long, are, according to the shape of the chapeau, tied either under the chin or else beneath the chignon. Spite of the sharpness of the weather, the chapeau Mantille-Maintenon, which is rectangular in front, perfectly flat, and is made either of crape or tulle, with occasionally a hanging border of lace, is a good deal worn. The strings, which are passed over the top of the chapeau, cover the ears, and are tied tightly under the chin, generally in a very large bow, or else they are embroidered over with glass passementerie, and hang loose below the chin, à la chaine Benoiton; in which latter case a second pair of strings of narrow ribbon is tied under the chignon, the ends of which, being very long, float in streamers down the back.

Casaques, which are still worn short, are made of velvet, cashmere, and cloth; the fashionable colors being maroon, deep violet, and black. Those which are of black velvet, and covered almost entirely with jet ornaments, seem to be most in favor. The lower edges are still cut into the most fantastic shapes; the sleeves at times fit close to the wrists; at others they are full and open, the cuffs being slashed in some fanciful form. The lining is invariably of some brilliant color, such as crimson, pale blue, mauve, or Magenta. Casaques of astrakan are likely to be much worn this winter, and attempts are being made to introduce pardessus of black silk, lined throughout with fur. These invariably hang loose upon the figure.

For robes, velveteens, trimmed with jet buttons, are getting much in favor. A new robe, called the Clarisse-Harlowe, after Richardson's immortal heroine, promises to become very fashionable every where this season. It is made a guese, and is of satin, moire, or taffeta, and may be worn indiscriminately for visiting, dinner-parties, soirées, etc. The front of the jupe is perfectly straight, without plaits, and behind is a long train. When trimmed with dentelle Cluny this robe presents a most elegant appearance; it is, however, generally worn extremely plain, with the corsage and jupe to correspond, the bottom of the jupe being perhaps slashed with satin of the same shade of color as the robe. For evening-dress we have sea-green foulards spotted over with small white-shaded flowers and trimmed with taffeta; with a square corsage cut à la sevigne, and an embroidered canezou and long muslin sleeves with entredeux of Cluny. For walking-dress a new black silk has been introduced, entirely free from gloss. The robe is made without plaits and à queue; the front is trimmed with a bande of velvet satin bordered with white dentelle Cluny spotted with black. The corsage à basque is trimmed like the robe, the sleeves fitting closely, and being similarly trimmed in stripes.

ARTIFICIAL ANIMAL PRODUCTIONS.

THERE is a French legion called the "Zephyre," which is composed of vagrants, who are compelled to serve as a correction for offences committed by them. They are, nevertheless, for the most part jovial, amusing fellows, of whom the direliest stories are told. We note among others, as an artistic invention of a Zephyr, the phenomenon in Natural History which so puzzled the wise heads of the Parisian learned men; the celebrated long-snouted rat.

This animal has a proboscis like an elephant; that is to say, a long cartilaginous apon the nose of about two centimetres, and hairy like the rest of the body, the most remarkable feature of which is that it is thicker at the tip than at the upper end; an arrangement which is entirely opposed to the ordinary laws of Nature. Only recently a number of these long-snouted rats was exhibited before an immense crowd of people upon the Boulevards in Paris and sold for six francs apiece. Twenty of them were enjoying themselves quite contentedly in a cage when some incredulous person, fearful of deception, pricked one of them in the snout with a needle. The animal, whose feet and mouth were held fast by the purchaser, squeaked and writhed with pain, and a drop or blood issued from the wound. The experiment proved conclusively that the productions was a real appendage which was organically connected with the warm system of the animal. The long-snouted rat is nevertheless a production of art, which is accomplished in the following manner. Two rats are taken and tied by the feet to a board, the nose of one being close to the tail of the other. An incision is made in a small knife in the nose of the blinder rat, into which is firmly inserted the point of the other's tail; the mouth is then firmly bound together with the amputated tail, and both rats are left in the same position for forty-eight hours. After the lapse of that time the living flesh has taken root and grown together, two or three centimetres length of the tail of the blinder rat is found to be fast fen. The mouth of the other is unbound, but it is still tied to the board and fed, and in the course of a month the wound is so completely healed, that the sharpest eyes could never detect a trace of the operation. The old Cronyn who exhibited these rats sold them all with great rapidity, and it is said that a scientific man bought a pair of them for the purpose of propagation. They no doubt will produce many, but the probocis will be wanting.

A RELIABLE ADVERTISING AGENCY is that of MR. S. R. NILES, No. 1 Scollay's Building, Boston, Mass. We have had business transactions with Mr. NILES for a number of years, and he has uniformly been prompt and honorable in meeting his engagements. LETTER FROM MRS. GENERAL GRANT.

THE following letter, addressed to the GROVER & BAKER Sewing Machine Company by Mrs. General GRANT, expresses the opinion of every lady who has ever used a GROVER & BAKER Machine:

GENTLEMEN,—It affords me great pleasure to bear witness to the excellence of the Family Sewing Machine manufactured by your Company. I have had one of them in my family for some two years; and from what I know of its workings, and from the testimony of many of my friends who use the same, I can hardly see how any thing could be more complete or give better satisfaction.

The machine I have is one of the most elegant I have ever seen, and I understand to be by friends who have chased it at the Sanitary Fair at Philadelphia in 1864.

Very truly yours, &c., MRS. U. S. GRANT.

The Republican Court;
OR,
American Society in the Days of Washington.
By RUFUS W. GRISWOLD.
In one volume, royal 8vo, containing 441 pages.
The design of the "Republican Court" is to give an interesting and faithful view of the "Private and Social Life of this Country in the Days of Washington." Referring as briefly as possible to political affairs, it introduces the great characters of that illustrious age in their personal connections—in the parlor, ball-room, the theatre—in anecdotes, descriptions, and details of every-day existence. It embraces particular narratives of President Washington's celebrated Tour through the Eastern States, with all its festivities, parades, &c., and of the subsequent Tour through the Southern States, with the imposing and enthusiastic reception in Charleston, Augusta, &c.

THE DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN OF OUR COUNTRY'S DEFENDERS.
GRAND CHARITABLE FAIR
AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL
IN AID OF THE
HOME AND SCHOOL
FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF
The Destitute Children
OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.
AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

This HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1863 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are rapidly increasing, and are from all parts of the Union; the spirit of usefulness is constantly increasing, the children now numbering over 150, and there are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied, solely for want of room to accommodate them. The old and unsuitable building on Fifty-eighth Street, New York, now occupied, must be replaced by the erection of such a Home as necessity demands; and this call is made upon the public with a firm belief in the patriotism and generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the Little Ones, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, which shall stand in the case of humanity as a fitting rebuke to the trite assertion that "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.
We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and cooperation in our FAIR AND FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

THE PRESENT NUMBER commences the TWENTY-EIGHTH VOLUME of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The Conductors congratulate themselves upon the favor which their efforts have received for so many years by the Press and the Public, and hope to deserve and receive the like favor in the future. The aim shall be hereafter, as it has been heretofore, to furnish a larger amount of the best reading, more profusely illustrated, wherever the Pencil can aid or supplement the Pen, than is contained in any other similar periodical in the world.

Terms for Harper's Magazine and Weekly, 1867:
MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year.... $4 00
WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year.... 4 00
An extra copy of either the Weekly or the Magazine will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance, or Six Copies for $20 00.
Bound Volumes of the MAGAZINE, each Volume containing the Numbers for six months, will be furnished for $1 00 per Volume, and sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each Volume containing the Numbers for One Year, will be furnished for $7 00, freight paid.
☞ The POSTAGE on the Magazine is now 24 cents a year, and on the Weekly 20 cents a year, payable quarterly, semi-yearly, or yearly, at the office where received.
☞ Subscriptions from the British Provinces of North America must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, and 20 cents for the Weekly, or United States postage.
Subscribers to the Magazine and Weekly will find on each wrapper the number with which their subscription expires, as entered on our books. In renewing a subscription, it is requested that the paper with which it is to commence should be stated. The name with which a subscriber, and his Post-office, County and State, should be distinctly written. Those receiving subscriptions to Magazine or Weekly commencing with Number ——, John Adams, Jackson, Flat County, Ohio.
In changing the direction, the old, as well as the new address should be given. Change address of (Magazine or Weekly) From John Adams, Jackson, Flat County, Ohio, To John Adams, Franklin, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania."
The Magazine and Weekly are always stopped when the term of subscription expires. Thus no necessary to give notice of discontinuance.
The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and DECEMBER of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first NUMBER of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.
The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the NUMBER next after the receipt of his order.
Back Numbers of both Magazine and Weekly can always be supplied.
In remitting by mail, a POST-OFFICE ORDER or a DRAFT upon NEW YORK, payable to the order of Harper & Brothers, is preferable to bank notes, as should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be received without loss to the sender.
☞ Persons are hereby cautioned against counterfeiting, or in any manner using the printed Notices, or Heads of Numbers, of the Publishers of this work, in order that the Subscriptions-Book may not be kept standing.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. X.—No. 519.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"THE CHARITY PATIENT."

THIS is the latest and one of the most beautiful of those groups of statuary for which Mr. ROGERS has justly celebrated. The atmosphere about this little group almost glows with human love and melts with human pity. There are no violent contrasts presented to the eye; the charity which is here figured is not that of Wealth coldly stooping down to object Poverty; it is that charity which lifts up its object reverently into the light and warmth of its own love. Thus the features of the group are made to blend together into one feeling. The Doctor's pity is lost in loving sympathy; and the poverty of the Mother and Child also is disguised by their participation in this exaltation of love. We have never seen a happier artistic representation of Christian charity.

OUR FIRE DEPARTMENT.

A YEAR ago we gave an illustration of the first annual parade of the Metropolitan Fire Department. On the 21st of November the second annual parade took place, of which we give an illustration on page 772. We desire especially to draw the attention of our readers to the progress made in the Department during the last year. We can show what this progress has been in no better way than by quoting a portion of Commissioner ADEE's speech on the occasion of this second review:

"Many," says Mr. ADEE, "of those I now have the pleasure of addressing were present last year when the Paid Department made its initial parade through the city. At that time several companies were unable to appear in line because of incomplete outfit, and many of those who did parade on that day labored under considerable disadvantage. We then presented a newly-organized, intruised, and partially incomplete Department. We have now shown you, all the citizens of this great metropolis, an organization so perfect in all its assignments and details as almost to defy criticism. The Department survived all opposition, and is now fully able to cope with any danger or emergency that may occur. As an old volunteer fireman, I would not for a moment insect that noble and now disbanded body of citizens with any act of wicker or crime committed in those early days of the present system, but I do hope them upon that lawless class of rogers-on who so frequently tarnished the reputation of the active members f the old Department, and at the sam time point out the fact that no sochiass now exists. I do not intend making an extended speech, and will onlyask your indulgence for a moment more. In common gence for a mbrnment ore. In common with the other members of our Board, I feel a natural pride i the great success that has throughthe cordial cooperation of every deprtment in our City Government, attended our humble efforts to order that though sincere efforts In order that you may know the prese strength of the Department and itsprincipal advantages, I will briefly numerate the more salient features. We have now in active service the 12 hook-and-ladder 34 steamers and 12 hook-and-ladder 34 steamers and 12 hook-and-ladder 34 steamers and

THE SOLDIER'S GRAVE!

WHERE willows weep, where birds are still,
Where infants fold their little hands,
A warrior's tomb—a grassy hill
In yon old village corner stands!

No subtle carving on the stone
Shall tell us who is 'neath the sod;
Below the body rests alone—
His soul is in the ranks of God!

The scent of one white rose's breath
In sorrow floats amid the air—
The rose of Hope, and Love, and Death
Her widowed hands have planted there!

How often there a woman sits,
While tears are in her soft brown eyes!
The odors that pale rose emits
To her are airs of Paradise!

The laughers can not laugh at her!
The idle pause with eyes intent
On those clasped hands that never stir—
The knees that in a prayer are bent!

Along the village path she strays,
Nor lingers the wild flower to take;
Through those long winding meadow ways—
By hedges hawy for his sake!

Then lighter, softer is her tread:
Her tears are falling there at last!
Her fingers clasp the rose—her head
Rests, dreaming of the sweet, sad past!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1866.

IMPARTIAL SUFFRAGE AND GENERAL AMNESTY.

WHEN a country has been convulsed by a domestic war which has torn up old social systems by the roots there is no short and easy path to universal tranquillity. The danger to be apprehended is an attempt to reach arbitrarily and impatiently those results which can never be attained except by deliberation and time, or by the operation of the laws of nature and human society. Therefore a wise man reads at present in our political almanac, "Look out for all kinds of political panaceas and nostrums during this time." Among these a very loudly advertised specific is Impartial Suffrage and General Amnesty. But a very suspicious fact is, that it is recommended by two classes of persons—Italian men whose advice was timid and wrong in every crisis of the war, and Southern sympathizers who were the most desperate and unscrupulous of public enemies.

The qualification of the suffrage which is recommended is education. Nor can there be any question of the vital importance of intelligence to voters. But the question of the suffrage must be regarded by us at this time in its bearings upon the national security. Now the strength of the Union sentiment in the unrepresented States is undoubtedly among the colored population and the poor whites, as in parts of Arkansas, Tennessee, Georgia, and North Carolina. The strength of the disloyal sentiment is among the educated classes. An educational test for the suffrage would enfranchise possibly six or seven per cent. of the colored citizens now, and it would disfranchise probably half of the poor white classes of the States we have mentioned. It, therefore, a plan of an educational test of suffrage and a full amnesty were adopted as a substitute for the Amendment proposed by Congress, we should have introduced and fortified the enemy, and we should have secured political power to the class most hostile to us.

The truth is, that the matter is much too complicated to be successfully dealt with by a phrase, however symmetrical. It is utterly useless to combine the two propositions of qualified equal suffrage and general amnesty. Equal suffrage in the disturbed States be essential to the national security, the national authority should establish it. That is one thing. If general amnesty be compatible with national security, let the national authority proclaim it. That is another thing. But it certainly does not follow that if it be necessary to establish equal suffrage, it is wise to reinstate rebels; for the consequences of one process may very easily paralyze the intended results of the other.

The whole matter is a question of statesmanship. The object is to prevent the resumption of political power by the party lately in rebellion, and still frankly hostile to the Union, by such measures as are not incompatible with the principle of the Government and with the national safety. The Congressional Amendment proposes to do this by basing representation upon the number of voters, under certain conditions, and by making certain rebel leaders ineligible to office at the pleasure of Congress. This last provision is that which stings the hostile sentiment most, and that which the general amnesty would remove. But in any system of reconstruction that inability is essential. Whether Congress leave the actual settlement of the suffrage to the States or directly ordains it, and whether the suffrage be qualified or universal, the official ineligibility of the leading political chiefs at the national pleasure is indispensable. Nor is it very wise to say, as the Tribune does, that because ultimately the ban would be removed, therefore it may as well be removed now. A thief sentenced for twelve months will be released at the end of a year. Should he therefore not be sent to jail at all?

The object of the demand of equal suffrage and general amnesty when it proceeds from the Copperhead organs is plain. The convenient classical line which warns us to fear the Greeks bringing gifts may be liberally rendered, Look out for the cat in the meal-tub. The Copperhead calculation of the situation under this policy is, first, the recognition of the present State organizations in the late rebel States, which are now entirely in the hands of the late rebels; and, second, the disfranchisement of the great mass of the loyal men in those States, and the consequent perpetuity of political power in its present hands. Was the war fought, and were the late elections carried, for such a result as that?

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

THE late interviews between the President and the Chief Justice of the United States were immediately reported as conferences upon the subject of reconstruction. It seems, however, much more probable that the subject of conversation was JEFFERSON DAVIS. There is no reason whatever in the President's character or antecedents to suppose that he would wish to advise politically with Judge CHASE, while the Chief Justice is his natural legal adviser upon the disposition to be made of the State prisoner at Fortress Monroe. Probably the embarrassment is mutual. The President would like to open the door of the prison, and yet fears the popular outcry; while the Chief Justice probably feels a solemn judicial opinion upon the subject to be desirable, and yet he sees plainly the hazardous risks that must be encountered in reaching it. Unfortunately the President has put it out of his power to act upon the matter with any dignity of public manner. His predecessor would long ago have found a solution of the difficulty in which the country would have supported him.

The difficulty it undoubtedly is, notwithstanding the question which is so indignantly asked whether laws are of any use if they are not to be enforced against the strongest people. Laws can only be enforced lawfully. The greatest criminals can only be punished upon conviction under the forms of law. And the simple question is, whether the people will to submit the question of the lawfulness of the late war upon the part of the Government to a jury of twelve men of the vicinage. If it is to be indicted for high treason, the forms of law must be scrupulously observed. The case must go to a jury. One man can prevent an agreement. But if the jury can not decide, or if they acquit the prisoner, the United States are convicted.

At the close of the war, and immediately upon DAVIS's capture, there was a universal feeling that, as the arch-criminal, he should be instantly brought to justice. The President distrusted said so, and certainly the party in power generally took the same ground. But as time passed, and the actual circumstances were gravely considered, opinion changed. It became evident that the war was not exactly such as the criminal law of treason contemplates. The object of that law is to make treason odious in the person of traitors, and to save the state from murderous conspiracy. But when treason has swollen into general and terrible war, waged by all the methods of war and prolonged through years during which the millions of citizens become liable as traitors, and which ends in the complete victory of the Government, although technically every man who bore arms against it was guilty, nevertheless the wisdom of a prosecution becomes a matter of high state policy; and if a possible or even probable result of the prosecution in any instance would be a reversal of the decision which the whole nation has made by the last appeal of arms, it is an unwise policy to press the prosecution.

Besides, there is a very general perception that no judicial affirmation will add the least weight or dignity to the decision of the war. That attempted, as conferences upon the question, and will not be tolerated, is a point finally settled. If the Court says so by the conviction of any accused person, it echoes a verdict infinitely more imposing and absolutely irreversible. If the Court questions it by the acquittal of the prisoner the decision is none the less fixed, and only the more conclusive of lawful right glimmers forever over rebellion. Moreover, the trial invests with a foolish prominence the chief actor in the drama. At present DAVIS is an utterly broken-down, baffled, blood-stained political gambler and adventurer. Give him the melodramatic setting of a state trial and he acquires dignity from association. Technically he is a person accused of treason, and to be tried by his peers. Actually he is a criminal, whom no verdict can acquit in the heart and conscience of his country and mankind. Yet we do not believe that the public sentiment would justify the execution of the penalty of the law, even were he convicted. Under such circumstances, therefore, what could the trial be but a farce?

If the Chief Justice went to the White House, and if he talked with the President, and if DAVIS were the subject, we do not doubt that the rat should amuse the great house such remarks as these.

THE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL IN MEXICO.

THE Mexican empire is evidently settling itself so rapidly that there is nothing a little surprising in the mission of Lieutenant-General SHERMAN with Mr. CAMPBELL the Resident Minister to the Mexican Republic. We can not but admire the peculiar character of either gentleman inspires profound public confidence that the wisest course will be adopted. Mr. CAMPBELL is known to the country only as an adroit local politician wholly devoted to the President's view of public affairs. The Lieutenant-General, whose heroic name is already historical, is not a man to his almost political discretion and moderation as remarkable as his military sagacity and valor. And both Ministers are sent out by the Administration signally protected before the country and naturally anxious to relieve its fortunes by some emphatic diversion.

If the intention be to furnish an opportunity for fine bluster toward any foreign Power, we trust it may be doomed to disappointment. It is always a shallow and criminal attempt which would appeal from real domestic dissensions by manufactured foreign hostility. There certainly can be no doubt that LOUIS NAPOLEON wishes to get out of Mexico as swiftly and as safely as possible, nor can we see any reason for Lieutenant-General SHERMAN's presence or offices pending the French departure. There will be no fear to be felt of the contending parties in Mexico will attempt to injure our citizens or to invade our territory; and an army of observation upon the frontier need not be large, and certainly does not require the Lieutenant-General to command it until it takes the offensive. Nor does there seem to be any good reason why the United States should undertake to do for DAVIS among his own people what France tried to do for MAXIMILIAN among foreigners. A Mexican protectorate, after France withdrawal, would be a protectorate of one domestic party against another, and that is not a business congenial to the principles or practice of the United States.

Of course when an empire falls, however much of a mushroom or toadstool it may have been, a wise Government looks to the care of the property which is left among the ruins. But no such consideration explains the necessity of such an envoy as the military commander of the country. Even the assertion of the Monroe Doctrine does not require him. For the Monroe Doctrine, as it is generally understood, is being vindicated by events. Whether it be wise, comprehensive or a domestic necessity which has sent him to Mexico we shall probably soon learn. But the fact which should make every citizen watchful is that the absence of any party in this country would not be averse to a foreign complication.

COMPROMISE.

IT is gravely suggested that the President shall offer to Congress a compromise. A compromise of what? Of his veto upon the question? Of what are the relative forces? Where is the necessity of composition? The people of the United States have deliberately proposed the plan upon which the unrepresented States may return to Congress. If those States prefer exclusion, they will probably continue to refuse assent to the plan, as they are doing now. But a compromise is impossible. Is it proposed that the people shall make the conditions more agreeable to the States in question?

The truth is, that there are a great many people in this country who have heard so much of the compromises of the Constitution, and of the necessity of every body yielding a little to make secure the whole, that they instinctively trust every thing which is called compromise, and are as much appalled at the thought of acting upon a simple principle, unfettered by compromise, as if young lady at the idea of eating a beef-steak uncooked. It would not need a very subtle argument to show that the boasted compromises of the Constitution were the seed of the late war, and that we shall have permanent peace only when they are entirely extirpated from that instrument. But we are far from asking that the whole, or mutual concession, is not often essential to success. It is no more possible in politics always to move straight toward the end proposed than it is for a ship to sail straight before any wind from New York to Liverpool. The ship must do the best she can with the wind she has, and she will probably never make a voyage without tacking. Yet tacking is compromise.

It is not, therefore, compromise to which a wise man objects. "All government," says EDMUND BURKE, "is founded upon compromise. But in all fair dealing," he adds, "the thing bought should bear some proportion to the purchase paid. Who would barter away the jewel of his soul?" In every free government there is something that is priceless, which can not be bought or sold, or made in any way whatever the subject of trade. But our fathers unluckily forgot it, or, remembering it, they thought that in their case there was no danger. Slavery was evidently expiring. They might, therefore, safely make a grant which would revert in a few years. But the cotton-gin was invented in the Constitution, and they fought from the cradle.

Material interests may be compromised to the utmost, but moral principle can never be compromised—it can only be surrendered. When the two are opposed, and principle yields, there is no compromise—there is only a sale. A father who makes an eligible match for his daughter without consulting her feelings, does not compromise her—he sells her as a cult is sold in the market. So a Congress or a Convention which makes laws, upon any pretense whatever, that necessarily destroy primal human rights, sells liberty in the open market. Now the pending Amendment provides that the enemies of equal rights in this country shall not have disproportioned political power in the Government, and that those who led the rebellion to destroy the Government shall not resume power under it except with the consent of the loyal people in Congress. To set off one of those necessary provisions against the other, or to evade either under any pretense, is not compromise, it is betrayal.

A MARGIN WANTED.

WE were speaking last week of the new Croton Reservoir and we wish now to suggest that the waters of the city require an entire command of the first in population, commerce, and power on either continent. This great fortune requires ample command over the whole bed of the river and its tributaries, with enough of its margin to build all the necessary reservoirs and prevent the throwing of offensive matter into the waters of the Croton. Already in London complaint is justly made that the health of the city is seriously impaired by the impurities mixed with the water of the Thames and carried through pipes into dwellings. And if we wish to avoid a like fate, we must acquire a margin of lands on all these waters.

Numerous properties already reach them, and these will increase with the growth of population in the attractive region watered by the Croton. The backward flow produced by the main dam near Spuyten Duyvil and by the Croton several miles; but yet the city owns only what is covered by the water and has no right to exclude hurtful dispositions of the shores extending down to the lake. No part of the stream flowing in has ever been acquired, and hence it shares the fate of being used in all the ways which convenience requires. An act of the Legislature authorizing thority to acquire such margin of land as we have mentioned, to be taken from time to time as it may be wanted, would assume no notice offend any object, and prevent very expensive improvements or any use of the land inconsistent with the wants of the city.

In condemning the land on the west branch now to be taken for the new reservoir, the city will need to obtain title to a burying-ground already in active use, as the cemetery is, as we judge from a cursory view of its tombstones, from one to two hundred bodies, the removal of which will of course made a charge to be added to the assessed value of the land. The water of the new reservoir will flood this burying-ground, which would be unless selected for a resting-place in the first place it would be no free from intrusion apossible; but the wants of a great city break up arrangements for final repose which numerous families have made, and they must be respected. There is much more certainty against the inexorable demands which expose to disturbance the sleep of "their rude forefathers."

We submit to of manufacturing inventors the construction of a wheel, which, we suppose, would not be large than a watch, to be used in connection with the Croton for the dwellings as a power for working a sewing machine. It would of coup be applicable in all cases where water is divided into houses through pipes from the reservation, as it would be used for light knitti or spinning machines, and various other proses of domestic industry; thus opening women a new field of labor, and creating in mities the old spirit of industry which insult that species of independence which the pow to supply our own wants be-fore. It is a power now used extensively here there well be a demand for water which the whole flow of the river would not more than supply.

But whet it shall be deemed feasible or otherwise tese the water for such purposes, the considions in favor of acquiring in time all the land that may be needed to make the Croton available in the best manner for our wants, prest and to arise, must be so evident as to impe on the Water Board—now forin-nately managed by a competent engineer—the duty of obtaining such legislation as may secure this important object.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

AT a late meeting of the trustees of the Cornell University at Ithaca, in this State, the Hon. ANDREW D. WHITE, of Syracuse, was unanimously elected President. He is precisely the right man in the right place. In this State and at the West, where he was Professor of History in the University of Michigan, Mr. WHITE is known and honored as one of the most accurate, practical, and accomplished scholars, and our readers may remember his striking and original oration before the Phi Beta Kappa of Yale College last summer as a timely and powerful lesson of the hour. His career in the Senate of New York has been marked with such good sense and ability that his friends have a right to anticipate for him the most brilliant political honors; while from the first he has been the confidential friend, in this great work of the University, of its founder, Mr. EZRA CORNELL.

Familiar with the intention of the foundation, inspired with the most humane and lofty conviction of the true scope of a great University, and possessing the most practical academical management, we do not know to whom its Presidency could have been so wisely intrusted. Mr. WHITE has the entire confidence around him the best men in every department. The institution will be truly a University; and beginning under auspices so favorable, it can not fail to become wholly worthy of the State and country.

HOW SHALL WE SLEEP?

As we spend about one-third of our lives in sleep the circumstances under which we do it should be well ordered. The most important should be of such size and have such arrangements as to secure a proper supply of fresh air. From our own observation we have no hesitation in saying that even among well-conditioned people those provisions are not adequately attended to. Most of them sleep in rooms that are both too small and shut up too closely. A gallon of fresh air every minute, let it be remembered, is the requisite for each person. Scarcely can not be furnished to any one in a closed room of ten feet square, and yet this is a very common limit of sleeping accommodation, while in the latter this air except by crevices. The case is worse than it is with apartments for the day, for in them the doors are opened frequently, and thus some considerable change is effected in the air.

Very often the sleeping accommodations are even more limited than we have mentioned, especially in the case of children. Several of them put into even a good-sized apartment do not receive enough fit to be cleaned, as they do not when they are put into a small one, as they often are.

It is quite important that with ventilation there should be a proper degree of warmth, and hence it is much easier to secure thorough ventilation in rooms for sleeping than when the inclosure is warmed from a furnace than when it is not. And here we would say that it is a false notion that no air is good except that which comes immediately from outdoors. That which comes from the open passages of the house is as good as that which comes through open windows. The air which comes from the pipes of a furnace is as fresh, that is as pure, as fully charged with oxygen, as cold air is. Heating it does not injure it. If the object be made to secure ventilation alone by letting down the top of a window, there is great danger that cold will be taken, especially if the room be small. That is better be only one of the means of ventilation, and then there need not be so wide an opening as to have this liability.

Night is the time for sleep, as day is the time for work. This is nature's indication, and harm always comes from not following it. Sleep in the morning is not as refreshing as that which is had in the night, when we have nature's favoring circumstances, the darkness and stillness. When we turn night into day, either with pleasure or labor, we do violence to nature, and, of course, inflict more or less injury on our physical systems. Many a clergyman is tempted to sit up late at night in preparing his sermons, partly from the quietness of the hour, and partly from the necessity of securing the preparation in time. But every time that he does this there is an impairment of the health, and particularly of the nervous. Saturday night, because the injury is enhanced by the labors of the following day.

Sleep may be imperfect. It may be broken by impressions made upon the senses, or by mental operations. The more one dreams the more imperfect is the sleep, for mind and brain are in action in dreaming, and they do not have entire rest. There is difference in dreams as well as in wakefulness, and in the amount of exertion. Sometimes dreaming amounts to real mental labor, and so impairs greatly the rest which sleep is designed to give.

Of course the less perfect the sleep the longer is the time which it ought to occupy. It is a matter of economy, then, for those with whom time is of value, to have the sleep as perfect as possible.

How, then, can sleep be secured? There are various circumstances to be regarded in effecting this.

When we sleep we should sleep. We should make a business of it. There should be no mingling of the wakeful and the sleeping condition. We should dismiss the thoughts and business of the day. We should have a habit of doing this. There is much in this point. The thing is quite within our control, and a habit of passing readily from the wakeful state into sound sleep can be formed by a proper attention to the circumstances that will favor it.

Regularity is important here. There should be a regular time for retiring, and also for rising. If this be not done, there will not only be much time often wasted in getting to sleep, but the sleep will be apt to be imperfect. We do not mean that one should retire precisely at the same minute every night—this would be making one a slave to time, and the very exactness would prevent the sleep.

Much may be done by sheer will. We can will to have the business end, and dismiss trains of thought. If we can not do this directly we can indirectly. We can supplant thoughts which would keep us from sleep, and thus pass quietly and brain into the sleeping state in a wearied condition, by indulging in thoughts of a diverse and lighter character. Reading is good for this purpose for the night. How very commonly the contrary course is pursued! The business man goes to bed thinking of his business, or else for making money, or for solving some perplexity; the professional man is busy with some train of thought connected with his daily employment. And in the evening the mind is kept up to the last of his wakeful moments with some portion of to-morrow's lesson.

All besides all this, and above all this, the arrangements of the day have a decided influence upon the character of our sleep. That sleep may be had the business of the day should be done as together in the day, and the evening should be the time for relaxation and diversion. In this way there will be a proper preparation for the wakeful, perfect sleep. All mental employment in the evening should be gentle and amusing. It is no time for hard work. It is the time for rest in the evening, especially by the young, does harm to both body and mind, and one way in which it does this is by impairing the sleep.

The encroachments which fashion makes upon nature's time for sleep are a large source of disease in its victims. The language of the text also tells what the misspent hours have done, and this often repeated, taking something each night, will be a sad record and an overwhelming lesson decidedly the general vigor, and thus prepares for actual disease. In strong contrast this with the refreshing sleep of the early days of the pioneers of society which we have indicated. When will the truly rational and conscientious exist the dictates of nature, and not even among well-conditioned people those provisions are not adequately attended to. But they are the honest and independent judgments of the author. We are willing to acquit Mr. SHARKS of that petty prejudice which nearly all war-correspondents have allowed to influence them in writing about General SHERMAN. Still he persistently belittles that General. If SHERMAN is more universally popular than any other of our heroes, as Mr. SHARKS says he is, then it is certainly unfair to pronounce that it was not "his brilliant success as a leader" which made him so, but rather his strongly marked characteristics of person and mind." Now, it is SHERMAN'S success, and the brilliancy of his successes which, if any thing, has made him so popular. Success alone, and brilliant success, is the only reason why the people care to know about SHERMAN'S personal and mental characteristics. SHERMAN, according to Mr. SHARKS, was the great strategist of the war, but, as he says, "how, this immediately suggests to us the fact, that in the whole war, and particularly in the West, there seems to have been little display and little making money, or for solving some perplexity; the professional man is busy with some train of thought connected with his daily employment. And in the evening the mind is kept up to the last of his wakeful moments with some portion of to-morrow's lesson.

LITERARY.

"The Sanctuary: a Story of the War" (published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York), is a novel by GEORGE WARD NICHOLS, author of "The Story of the General Sherman." The subject of the war has had a more striking success than NICHOLS'S "Story of the Great March." Newly published editions have been issued by the press of Harpers, and the book still maintains its popularity. The author had made the march, as one of Sherman's Staff officers, and was in the best position he knew well that to make his story interesting he had only to tell it truthfully. Fidelity to the picturesque could be counted upon to secure the intense interest of the reader. In the "Sanctuary" Colonel NICHOLS'S object has been of a higher character, though he has not neglected, as in the "Story of the Great March." The latter confined itself to grand military movements and to the personal and military individuality of Sherman, or to the characteristic features of the country through which the army moved. The "Sanctuary" is a domestic story. It has a single individual and not the army stands foremost. The pictures are more minute, and relate rather to the every-day events in social life, or the incidences of personal heroism, than to great movements or critical battles. The careful fidelity with which the author has executed these, and has made the book one of great interest and value. But it is not the portraiture of the external life of our soldiers which gives the chief interest to Mr. NICHOLS'S novel. Heroes have hearts, and Romance is nearly allied to War. The story which the author has spun about the historic background of this work is pathetic, and abounds in striking situations, yet never overleaps the boundaries of probability. Of some of the chapters our best authors might well be proud. The description of HOSAVENTURA and of DALTON'S walk to Hastings have been unsurpassed. The story of the Zimri's revenge has all the interest of a tragedy, and the character is well drawn. The "Sanctuary" is a beautiful idyl of the South. Mr. NICHOLS'S style, as regards style of printing, quality of paper, and external appearance, is one of the most elegant books of the season.

"Personal Recollections of Distinguished Generals," by HENRY E. G. SHARKS, has just been issued by HARPER & BROTHERS. "No man is a hero to his own valet," says the proverb, "and generally true for the same reason, that no General is a hero in the eyes of a newspaper war-correspondent. While pens like these last, we may have some special reason for adulation; but he not unfrequently looks upon the commanding officer as a humbug, and sometimes as a knave. The author of these sketches was undoubtedly the most able and judicious. The work which he has given us could not be written by any one else, and the reader find so good portraitures of the great military leaders in the war for the Union. We can not indorse many of his judgments, which, though they

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AMERICANS are not chief politicians as one of their national characteristics, but a correspondent of the Times in Steinway Hall, had an opportunity of witnessing and of being excessively annoyed by one of their political pluckes the other day. It was a ugly defiant as "real kinkies." The correspondent of the Times, who had known how to hold her tongue, spoke three words, and was driven from the room. From the commencement of the concert she persisted, not merely in whispering to her talking brutify, in spite of continual hushes, "hushes," and even faint "hisses," until the audience in her vicinity were thoroughly roused to anger at being thus cheated out of the sweet strains of music they had come to enjoy. Several gentlemen earnestly requested her to allow them some quiet; but she (New York ladies will blush for their sex) rudely declared, "I have come here to talk, and I will talk if I please." A gentleman came from the box-office, and addressing her, said he had been sent for to request her to cease talking. Several gentlemen in the vicinity immediately arose and thanked him for coming. But the young person who made all this disturbance, though hushed for the moment, continued with the utmost nonchalance to talk and laugh throughout the performance. If the managers at the Philharmonic don't think this a case for the police, or for somebody in authority, we would merely advise lovers of music to avoid in future any proximity to a certain blue plush cloak and white lace bonnet.

Perhaps many of us might learn a lesson of forbearance at concerts, and avoid the too common practice of whispering during the performance.

We learn from Paris that the goods for the Exhibition of 1867 are beginning to arrive. One hundred and sixty packages from St. Petersburg arrived in one day last month. A great variety of curious articles from Morocco will be sent to show the progress of art in that country, and gorgeous specimens of oriental luxury will add to the attractions of the Exhibition.

During the past year some fifteen hundred different children have been taught, fed, and clothed in the "Five Points House of Industry." A family of more than two hundred is constantly maintained in the House, the transient being sent to situations or friends as opportunity offers. Here is one avenue, among many others, through which the benevolent may send their contributions. Children may put their pennies into the contribution-box seldom have any definite idea of the use to which they are applied. If parents would take the trouble to explain to their little ones that two dollars will supply food to a child for three months at the House of Industry, they will understand that some good is done with the money. Many other charities are equally worthy with this, and may be made just as definite to a child's mind; only let it be remembered that if little ones are to be made benevolent, they must understand the effect of giving.

Since 1859 forty-four thousand and seventy volumes have been added to the books contained in the Astor Hall of the Lenox Public Library. Of this number eleven thousand one hundred and ninety were received under a grant of the late Mr. JAMES LENOX, besides twenty-five hundred pamphlets received under the same bequest which have since been bound, and are now accessible to the books.

A London journal, under the heading of "Rather Precocious," quotes the following passage from a New York paper: "Miss Burgess, daughter of the popular preacher, accompanied Queen Emma to this country. Miss Burgess is on her way to the Sandwich Islands, in the hope of being able to instruct the natives in the doctrines of Christianity. She is twelve years of age, has a fine intellectual face, and very prepossessing manners." "This paragraph," adds the journal which makes the quotation, "will do rather amusing to the friends of Mr. Spurgeon, who is only thirty-two years of age, having been born in 1834."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SOUTHERN LEGISLATURES.

GOVERNOR WORTH'S Message to the North Carolina Legislature complains of the exclusion of Southern members from the councils of the land, and of the Constitutional Amendment. To the latter it objects that the Amendment is not Constitutional, submitted to the States; that, although it consists of eight paragraphs manifestly having no connection with each other, it altogether incongruous, it must yet be ratified as a whole, or not at all; that it especially endangers the powers of the General Government to a malicious extent, and that it imposes no penalty for its rejection will secure restoration. Governor WORTH insists that the South Carolina bill is void, that the circumstances willing to sacrifice the honor and rights of the State, and that the people, embracing scores of the Occupation of Nashville, the Great Battles and Chattanooga and Lookout Mountain, the Campaign of Atlanta, the March to the Sea, and the Great Raid through the Carolinas. These photographs are views of important places, of noted battle-fields, of remarkable men, and, for the rare and judgment in selecting the points of view, for the delicacy of execution, for ease of treatment, and for fidelity of representation, they surpass any other photographic views which have been produced in this country—whether relating to the war or otherwise. The whole collection has been taken with the greatest care—they are splendidly mounted and bound in a single volume, and the most elegant album we believe that only a very limited number of these volumes are issued; but although, from its expense, the book can not be in common, those who can afford to pay one hundred dollars for a work of fine art can not spend their money with more satisfactory results than would be realized in the possession of these views. Before seeing this collection of Mr. BARNARD we could not have believed that there were such remarkable photographs in an art so purely mechanical as its mode of operation. Even the thin and cloud-scenery of the sky are exquisite in delicacy and truth. We regret that we have not the space to enter into a more detailed description of the separate views.

CAPTAIN DUNCAN.

By GEORGE WARD NICHOLS.

THAT quality called bravery, or courage, has been so common, so almost universal in our army through the war, that its possession is no longer regarded by the soldier as a mark of special merit. Captain Duncan, however, had peculiar traits of character which distinguished him among a host of heroes. Call it daring, rashness, indifference to danger, or what you will, he had something that made him a man of mark. I do not know that he was more self-possessed than others on the battle-field; in truth, I am inclined to believe that Duncan was rather opposed to close proximity to flying shots and hurtling shells, and that the line of battle had no special fascinations for him. But if General Howard desired to know the position of the enemy, their numbers, their movements; if he wished to send an important dispatch across the country or through the enemy's lines, he selected, with perfect confidence, Captain Duncan for the perilous duty.

Let us see what sort of a man the Captain was, or is; for he is alive somewhere to-day, if a shrapnel has not fallen and crushed him; if he is not the victim of that modern Juggernaut, a New York omnibus; or if, after surviving the shocks of war, he has not succumbed to some of the ordinary ills that flesh is heir to.

The Captain was attached to General Howard's head-quarters as commanding the General's escort, or, rather, as chief of scouts. He is a man of small stature, wiry and muscular. His light hair is cut close to a well-shaped head; a full mustache lightly overhangs a sensitive, well-formed mouth; his dimpled chin is nicely rounded; his nose is full and finely shaped; his eyes are light blue, with a womanly expression. The face is altogether a frank and open one, but with no marked distinctions, nothing to really indicate the energy and daring, the courage and cunning, which mark a career at once eventful and romantic.

Duncan's disguises were as various as the characters he assumed. At one time he was a cadet of the military school originally at Marietta, but which might have been termed a traveling academy, for it accommodated its movements to the advance of our army. It was first at Atlanta, then at Milledgeville, afterward at Augusta; and its final resting-place, I think, was in the rebel army. At another time our hero appeared as a furloughed soldier of Lee's army, and again in the prim gray-and-red uniform of one of the "home guard"—an organization which had a brief existence in different parts of the South. Then again he would roam over the country in the motley dress of rags and dirt that distinguished Wheeler's cavalry. In all these costumes and disguises he managed to accomplish the objects of his missions. He was frequently captured; and although he was never a denizen of any of the infamous prisons of the South, nor long in captivity at any time, always contriving to escape, yet his face, after a while, was readily recognized as that of the famous and fearless Duncan, making each succeeding expedition more fraught with danger to him than the last.

A volume might be devoted to the narration of his dangerous adventures. One of these, of recent occurrence, will associate his name in history with the "Great March" of General Sherman. When the army arrived before Savannah the necessity of opening communication with the sea, and the establishment of a base of supplies, was of vital and immediate importance.

If one will think for a moment of the needs of a city of seventy thousand inhabitants—of the amount of food which the people, horses, mules, and cattle require for daily consumption—he will understand how rapidly an army of that magnitude, with thousands of refugees hanging upon its skirts, would devour the food and supplies brought with them. Provision, literal and instant provision, must be made, and that by communication with the Atlantic.

The country around Savannah is of that low and swampy character peculiar to the Southern sea-coast. For hundreds of miles these swamps, dreary and monotonous, stretch away. Here and there, where some wealthy planter has rescued the salt-marshes from the overflow of the sea, dykes have been raised and canals extend for miles through the rice fields. At intervals on the horizon may be seen a clump, or avenue, of live-oak trees, which mark the residence of the planter, who passed his winters here with his subjects—for like a lord of feudal days the rich man-owner regarded his slaves.

The Ogeechee and numerous tributary streams wind in and out in every direction, and force themselves sluggishly through the slime. Where the marsh or swamp has not been redeemed, tall rank grass and weeds grow in profusion. Where the tide reaches, the marsh is filled here and there with frightful holes and bogs, and covered with a black, thick bed of mud, through which it is almost impossible for man or horse to wade or walk. But as the anxious Union soldiers gazed toward the distant sea, where the marsh-line melted into sky, they were conscious of other foes than those of nature. On one side was Fort M'Allister, its frowning ramparts crowned with heavy guns, sweeping in every direction; on the other were the fortifications at Beaulieu, covering the approaches to the Little Ogeechee.

All these dangers stood between us and the fleet, when, one morning, General Howard called for a messenger to the sea. A thousand officers and men were willing to make the venture, but he selected Duncan, who, in a dark and stormy night, with only an old negro for his companion, started on his perilous mission. How he dragged his boat over the black mud, pushed through the creek and into the bay, floated unharmed past sentinels, past torpedoes, and how joyfully he was received by the brave sailors of Admiral Dahlgren's fleet, is subject-matter for another story. The following incidents, which came under the writer's observation, occurred in North Carolina:

The enemy held the old city of Fayetteville. How much of a force was there, and by whom commanded, was a matter of doubt; but four columns of our infantry and one of cavalry were pushing rapidly upon the place. As usual, Duncan and his brave band of men were in the extreme advance. It was always an important object to save the bridges, so that we could speedily cross large bodies of troops. To do this it was necessary to press closely the retreating foe; indeed, in several instances in the late campaign of General Sherman, the Union soldiers would gain an entrance upon a bridge when the rear of the rebels had not reached the other end. Duncan all the morning drove steadily before him a party of rebel cavalry. It was sturdy, sharp fighting, in which the rebels slowly and designedly gave ground, and, as Duncan thought, with the intention of getting all their forces across the bridge and then burning it. As they neared the town the Union soldiers could see the splendid arsenal, which crowns a height. The sight fired young Duncan's blood, and he at once resolved to make a dash into the place and save the bridge, if possible.

REV. DR. CHAPIN'S CHURCH, 42D STREET AND 3D AVENUE, N. Y.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD & CO.—SEE FIRST PAGE.]

The infantry column he had led all the morning was several miles in the rear, and he knew that he must, with his few men, sustain the fight, if there was to be one. A few words spoken to his men, pistols reloaded, girths tightened, and away they charged.

Wildly but grandly they went down the sunken road, up the hill, over and through a squad of cavalry on guard there; across the bridge they clattered and thundered into the town, with a yell and hurrah, and then Duncan turned and found her sixteen of his men with him—the rest were killed or prisoners.

There was no return, so he rode on. As he passed the main streets he saw large bodies of rebel cavalry, some halting, others moving here and there. He had arrived altogether too soon, and had ridden into a town occupied by thousands of rebel soldiers. Luckily, his own and his companions' uniform was of "mottey wear," partially rebel, so that they escaped general observation for a time. What was he to do? He dare not go back, and he could hear the shouts of the surprised rebel guard who were pursuing him. There was nothing left but to make an attempt to pass through the town.

In trying to do this, as fate decided it, he unwittingly chose the main street of the city. Turning a corner he came to a large hotel, on the steps of which stood General Hardee and Wade Hampton, while a crowd of staff-officers were waiting on the porch, ready to mount. The quick eye of Wade Hampton saw at once that these were Yankee riders, and jumping on his horse—an animal of immense strength and great speed—he, with his officers, shot away up the street in a direction opposite to that taken by Duncan, whose force was now narrowed down to half a dozen men.

Meanwhile the fearless scout, urging his horse by voice and spur, and firing his revolver right and left at those who opposed his progress, rode rapidly on. One rebel, who saw them approaching, deliberately aimed and fired at Duncan, but missed him. Then, in his flight, he clambered over a neighboring fence, presenting a broad yet peculiar mark for Duncan as he passed. The temptation was irresistible, and the Captain fired, with fatal effect.

I saw the man lying dead there two hours afterward, and wondered not a little at the peculiar nature of the wound, and the cause thereof, till Duncan subsequently told his story.

By this time the whole town was in an uproar. The rebel soldiers on all sides were mounting their animals in confusion. The women rushed wildly into and out of the houses, screaming with terror, for they all believed that poor Duncan and his few men were at least a legion. Duncan had given up all hope of escape. Not knowing which way to turn, he turned to the right, when he should have taken the left—and rode straight into Wade Hampton's arms.

That chivalrous brave was completely disgusted when he ascertained that he had not captured a general officer, but it was some consolation to know that his prisoner was the noted scout Duncan, who was recognized at once by some of the officers and men.

"He shall never have another chance to ride into a place occupied by my legion," said Hampton, and Duncan and his men were at once placed under a strong guard and marched across the river.

Let us leave him for a while, trudging along through the mud and over the rough roads, robbed of his clothing, barefooted and bareheaded, and return to Fayetteville, which a little while after his capture was occupied by our army.

General Howard's first inquiry after he entered the town was for his valued scout, Commander Duncan. He soon learned the truth, and congratulated himself that Duncan had not been killed in the fray: "For," said he, "they can't keep such a prisoner; he will get away from them in a few days; I'm sure of it; he has been in the same scrape repeatedly, but always manages to escape."

Several days followed. The Union army had crossed the Cape Fear River; they had met the enemy in force everywhere, and had driven them back to a strongly-intrenched position. Our headquarters were pitched close to the line of battle. Around them deep sleep by the heavy cannonading firing which had reopened with the dawn of day, I stepped out from my fly tent, plunged my head in a bucket of water, and by five minutes' energetic rubbing, since they were originally made for a boy of some ten years of age; coolies and babies, his face close shaved; his head hairless—a sorry-looking figure altogether, who might have been taken for a rebel prisoner if he were not at liberty in the camp of the general commanding.

"How are you, Major?"

Looking curiously at the man, whose person was entirely unknown to me, at least in that shape, I replied: "You have the advantage of me, Sir; who are you, are you not?"

"I'm Duncan."

"Duncan! With all my heart I'm glad to see you! I never should have recognized you. But when, how, where—that is, when did you come in, how did you get through the lines, and where have you been this week past?"

And thus this brave man told his own story from the point where we left him on the road just out of Fayetteville:

"Well, Major, I've had a tough time of it. The rebs chuckled a good deal when they caught me. They said I shouldn't get away this time, sure, and so they handcuffed me to another man. Hot, ugly work it was, marching in the sun, barefooted, along those wretched roads. For the first day or two I had a strong guard, and although I had found out that I could slip my hand through the iron ring, which must have been made for a negro, yet I thought it risky business to make a run for it. But a chance came when we were passing through that thick growth of bushes, in the swamp back here a piece, about a day's march, I reckon."

"I remember the place," said I.

"Well, when my guards turned their heads I slipped the iron and made a clean jump for the bushes. Crack, crack, crack! Three shots before I had gone ten feet. All of them came near enough, but all missed me. Ten feet more and I was up to my arm-pits in the softest of soft mud. Turning my head, I had the exquisite pleasure of gazing into the muzzle of a rifle-barrel. 'Now you needn't shoot, old fellow,' said I; 'if I can get out I'll come along quiet enough.'

"I suppose it was the perfectly matter-of-fact way of stating the situation that induced the reb to raise his piece again. 'That was a bold push o' yourn,' said a bystander.

"'Yes; but you'd do as much to get free, wouldn't you?'

"'Yas-s—cum along!'

"So I went along, a miserable and muddy object, till we reached a little place near Raleigh, where we were turned over to the provost guards at the only 'milish'—good fellows enough, and brave, perhaps but they couldn't keep my prisoner; and so I told the boys when we were locked up in a close room in a well-guarded house.

"It was cold that day, and we clamored a great deal, swearing that they meant to freeze us. So they brought us in some wood.

"They had examined all the doors when they were first brought in, and stationed guards at the only possible places of escape—that is, all the places they saw; but I had noticed a closet in the room. You know all these houses have closets in the upper rooms, or piers, several feet above the ground. When the wood was brought in the boys made a good deal of noise breaking up the sticks, while I was tearing up the floor in the closet.

"An opening was soon made. Screwing upon my voice not yet to take outside, one by one we slipped cautiously through the floor, and, at a given signal, rushed out. One of the guard caught me by the leg as I jumped out from under the house. He was frightened, as he had a right to be, and dropped his gun, which he ought not to have done. I seized the gun—here it is—gave him a blow in the face and put for the woods at my very best gait. A dozen shots or so were fired in chase or the other, or all of us; but I think all have escaped.

"Of course I traveled for this army, which I knew ought to be somewhere in this region. An ordinary runaway, or one new to the business, would have pushed away from the rebel front; but I've been to the same scrape before now, and have learned the ropes. I met bodies of rebel cavalry trying to get away from the fight. I came through the lines last night without much risk, but somewhat disguised."

"So I should think," said I, wondering, if he considered himself "somewhat" disguised, how he would look when he was completely disguised.

"Jolly that! isn't it now?" continued Duncan. "Since I left Fayetteville I have cursed thieves have stolen the clothes off my back three times—as often as I could beg or buy a new suit. But here I am, safe and sound, and they will have a hard fight before they catch me again."

Duncan subsequently captured a fort which covered the crossing of Cox's bridge over the Neuse. He did good service in the battle of Bentonsville. Where he now is, or what he is doing, I do not know. I am very sure however that he was looking on the gauntlet of greater dangers, have shown truer patriotism, more exalted heroism, or who have accomplished more of valuable service for the cause of the army than Duncan, who, when I last saw him, still wore the shoulder-straps of a captain.

LITTLE GIBRALTAR.

IT was a lonely place. Every day, and all the day, as it seemed, the wind blew steadily from east to west, for the Gulf of Mexico lay there, and never toward the sunset. On three sides the sea broke sullenly against the rocks of the small promontory, and went back again, repulsed and discomfited. The house and grounds which occupied the whole of this sea-girt nook formed an estate which was called Little Gibraltar. The name was not inappropriate. Thousands of years, doubtless, had the waves stormed those gray rocks—thousands of years had the rocks stood there and thrown them back again into the sea. One could imagine the small going on forever—the repulse eternal.

Ten years ago it was a fine place to live first. I had a friend at school who was such foothold in my affections as no girl had ever won before. We were not intimate, as schoolgirls often intimate—We had no secrets to tell, or, if we had, we told none. We made no rash vows by starlight and moonlight, but we liked to be together, and we had mistes and fancies in common. I have always loved beautiful women, and this Margaret O'Connor was a beautiful exceedingly!

It was not until I had known her a long time that I learned my thing of her history. When I did, I ascertained that her father was an Irish gentleman of considerable wealth, who had fled to this country years before with his bride, the daughter of a noble family. Here they had settled, not against her will, from a convent. Leoline was the young wife's familiar name. She had died five years after the birth of her first child, Margaret, taking with her to the world of spirits an hour-old baby. My friend could just remember her mother, and she told me that her manners were so winning and her beauty of so rare a type that the life-long effect of her loss upon the husband, who idolized her, was by no means unaccountable.

Soon after her death he had purchased Little Gibraltar, and having arranged the grounds and built the house after a certain fantastic plan of his own, had retired there with his young daughter, an efficient housekeeper, who also acted as a sort of nurse or superintendent to little Margaret, and a corps of good servants, who had ever since retained their situations.

Margaret's description of her home had abundantly excited my interest and stimulated my curiosity, and I accepted with extreme satisfaction her invitation to pass the long summer vacation—our last before graduating—at Little Gibraltar. At first I hesitated lest my intrusion should be unwelcome to the master of the strange domain: but when I was assured that his consent had been solicited and obtained before the invitation was extended I set aside my scruples and anticipated only pleasure.

The last week in June school closed. A staid servant appeared for Margaret, and took all the trouble of our baggage and bundles. We had a five hours' car ride, and then we got out at a little station-house, and the driving man attached, went to a stable across the road, and came back with a sort of family coach drawn by two powerful black horses. We got inside, and he mounted the box, and off we drove. It was three miles, I should think; but long before we reached our journey's end we could see Little Gibraltar gleaming proudly on its rocky height, with the sea climbing forever at its base. Margaret pointed to it, as she said, with more eagerness than she had been speaking before:

"Home, Aria!"

"Is it home?" I remember I asked her. "It looks to me like an enchanted castle of Mrs. Radcliffe's times. It is strange, and, in a weird sort of way, very beautiful; but it does not seem homelike."

"Perhaps it isn't, as most people reckon homelike: but it is home to me, and to my father since I was old enough to remember. I don't know where it was that I lived with my mother. It is singular that I should remember her so well, for she was very beauty and wayward grace. There is one thing I ought to tell you, Aria. My father, sane enough except when he drinks, declares that he sees her now—that sometimes she comes and calls him, and he goes out and keeps tryst with her. I know not whether it is delusion, or a clearer vision than hee been given to others."

Margaret's face had kindled as she spoke, and there was more than the answering look in her eyes that I should not have been surprised if she had told me that she, too, had this clearer vision which could penetrate the veil of mysteries.

We were near the place by this time, for John drove rapidly. The house was a rambling, castle-like building.

"With its battlements high in the air,
And the turrets thereon," built of some pure white stone, which glittered in the sunset. It was set in a striking style from the entrance hall to the carriage road below, and at the foot of these steps stood, ready to welcome us, Reginald O'Connor, not but lifted, his whole manner full of courtly grace. Unconsciously I had formed an idea of him. I had fancied him a sad, silent, elderly gentleman, and had wasted by grief indifferent to all the small observances of life.

Not so; instead, the handsomest man, the stateliest gentleman I have ever met.

He was not yet quite forty, and he scarcely looked ten years older than Margaret. He had dark eyes, piercing, with a curious, dreamy, speculative look in them. His heavy black hair was brushed back from his high, thoughtful brow—I know a little more than a little waving in the indications of combative force and strength, without which a man may be good and gifted and gracious, but never great. I had been interesting myself in Spurtheim and Lavater, so I analyzed his head and face, while he stood waiting, before the carriage stopped, and decided that he was the temperament of a poet—that he had ideality, veneration, and a wonderful power of personal magnetism—that he was capable of great love, but that he lacked fortitude, and perseverance, and hope —that there was a certain weakness in his character which would yield with the highest physical courage, but which made him helpless before such mysterious something which, for want of a better name, I call power. He could never, therefore, rise above a great sorrow. If I had not made this analysis then I should never have made it afterward, when I was studying what hate, as I found presently, a certain nameless charm, which held criticism.

As the carriage stopped Margaret jumped from it into his arms. He gave her a quick kiss, and then turned to me.

"This is so kind of you, Mrs. Germond," he said, as he helped me out.

"Not the first kind thing he has ever visited at Little Gibraltar. You had need courage."

"It did not require a great deal of courage to take so well-behaved a—"

He looked at me inquisitively, as if he wondered how genuine my words were. Then he smiled.

I believe from that hour she honestly love each other, in spite of all the sneers about girls' friendships. I can answer for Margaret. I have heard, in the years since, that Aria, until I have learned the sweet name by heart."

He had given me his arm, and was leading me up the steps. The entrance hall was running on before us, greater than I had almost ever seen her. She looked back, nodded laughingly, and said:

"That's right, papa. You're Aria for my devotion."

In a moment we stood in the entrance hall—a fully apartment, large, fine, and in the midst of which a circular staircase went upward. It was paved with tesselated marble, and hung with costly pictures. Afterward, Colonel O'Connor had himself painted. On one side a door was thrown open into a conservatory full of choice flowers, beyond which was a spacious library. On the other side another door opened into a large, lofty drawing-room. Into this latter apartment my host had, having arrived by the train, introduce me to Mrs. Walker—the housekeeper, to whom I have before referred, who continued to matronize and superintend the establishment. Margaret lingered a little to talk to her, and the Colonel and I walked into the drawing-room alone. Opposite the door an immense pier-glass filled the space between two great windows, and as we stepped in we saw ourselves reflected in it; I still leaning on his arm, and he bending toward me with his air of courtly deference. A sudden and curious presentiment thrilled me like a suggestion from some one unseen—a presentiment which told me that in some mysterious way my fate and his were linked. And at the same time I heard a whisper, distinct yet low, as if it came from far—"BEWARE!"

I turned, in some way to know that no one else was present for me, but for my companion. I felt sure that he heard it also, for he released my hand which he had been holding since I came in, and offered me a chair. I saw that his face was pale, and his lips had a nervous quiver. Then Margaret came in, and Mrs. Walker, and a well-dressed, aged lady's maid, ready to show me to my room, and her father told us that dinner would be served in half an hour. I thought he was glad to have us go up stairs.

My room opened out of Margaret's, and looked like the tasteful, exquisite, shimmering room I refused the maid's assistance, and when my door was shut sat down a moment to look out of my window and think. I waited but a minute. The phosphorescent glow and glitter. They seemed mysterious and infinite as the fathomless sky which hung above those mysterious waters—as infinite, as unfathomable as immortality. What puppets we human beings are for Fate to play with! I thought—beneath the influence of actors—and knew not whether I was one or whether it were tragedy or comedy in which we should be called to perform—whether the play were to its acts or in scenes.

My vacation was to be two months long. I felt as if I were going to live more in that time than I had in my whole life before.

I opened my trunk. My drams must begin, like many another, with dressing and dining. I had been born alike to decide whether I should be handsome or not—though I knew my style was unique. I was certainly not that which those indulged youth, who haunt the theaters and the pit and the boxes of boarding-school misses, most delight in; for I had never received a compliment in my life, unless the look in Colonel O'Connor's eyes this afternoon had been one.

I had a low brow, round which the dark hair drooped heavily in a clear, dark curl, and a color-ing in all respects of a brunette, except that my eyes were blue as turquoise—a bright, light blue. This contrast between my hair and eyes and the tint of my face made me striking, peculiar: I must try my power before I could tell whether or not it made me fascinating.

I put on a black dress which suited me, for it fell in heavy, rich folds about my figure, which was full but not fat. Soft, old lace drooped over my hands, and was fastened round my neck by a brooch made of an Egyptian scarabeus, and which glittered like an evil-eye on my throat. Then I brushed and and had ten minutes more, while I was waiting for Margaret, in which to wonder as to the meaning of the strange whisper I had heard. She came for me at last, and we went down stairs.

The drawing-room was lighted now, and I noticed, as I had not before, the extreme richness and elegance of all its appointments. One would not have thought that in furnishing it the master of Little Gibraltar had been harrassed by any thoughts and grand festivals, instead of fitting himself up a refuge in which to hide away his sorrow.

One reception-room we have traced of this exacting ideality which would not be satisfied with less than perfection. At the farther end of the room folding doors were thrown open into a dining-room, where a table glittered with the best of crystal. Colonel O'Connor met us at the door, and, giving me his arm again, led me in to dinner, Margaret following. The dinner was a somewhat ceremonious stateliness, and, watching the highhearted creature in her home manner, I understood in what school Margaret had acquired that perfect composure which had been at once the envy and the despair of all the younger Minivy's young ladies.

Just here I begin to feel that I have undertaken a hopeless task. I was successful, possibly, in conveying to you the impression of the house, fantastic but superb—of my stately host, and the friend whom I loved so well. So far we have been sure; but I see now that I have failed in my real purpose. They will not render the subtle shades of that midsummer experience. I can not tell you of the strange spell which drew me toward Reginald O'Connor. Fascination does not at all express it—it was at once finer and stronger. Sympathy, magnetism, psychological power, all were combined in it. I only know that I felt, in my very soul, that I had met the one man in the universe whose power over me was potent and fatal.

I did not deceive myself about him in the least. I knew he was not wiser, or grander, or nobler than other men—more or grand, perhaps, in the world's sense at all. But, just such as he was, I felt as if I would rather have been loved by him, and die, than be the living darling of any other man. And in time, too, there was the sense of entire hopelessness—the belief that he had loved as he would never love again—that his whole soul was buried in the dead the whole living world. We passed all the days together—we three—riding, driving, rowing; and, after a while, I sitting for my portrait, and Colonel O'Connor painting it. It was after one of these sittings that Margaret said to me:

"Aria, I like my father is beginning to love you. I have never seen him as he is now before. If he were not too old for you—if you could care for him—I think it might be to him like the elixir of life. To me, you know what it would be to have you with me always."

"You deceive yourself," I answered, with forced composure. You have told me the effect which your mother's loss had on him, and how his whole life since has been a life of nothing but her memory. He will never love again."

She looked at me curiously. I knew what my face was turning crimson under her gaze. She sprang up and kissed me with impulsive fondness.

"My darling," she cried, "I believe that you could love him! With you the mistress of Little Gibraltar, what a different thing life would be to me!"

She went out without giving me time to answer her; but after that she left me more alone with her father.

He painted on at my portrait, and grew absorbed in his task. He was never satisfied—he said my face changed with every change of my moods. He made me give him sitting after sitting. Some days he deepened the eyes, to-morrow he altered a wave in the hair, or changed a curve of the lashes. I began to believe that I was beautiful, as I saw myself glowing, a radiant vision, upon his canvas. One day he threw down his brush. It was the week before we were to go back to Madame Miniver. He cried, with a sort of suppressed passion,

"It does not suit me, Aria; it never will! You must give me yourself, Aria, child, darling—"

He stopped as suddenly as if an unseen hand, cold with the chill of the grave, had been laid upon his lips. His face turned white.

"Forgive me," he said, "I must go."

He went from the room. I remembered what Margaret had told me—that sometimes his dead wife called him, and he went out to keep with her a ghostly tryst. I believed that he had gone now in obedience to some such summons. I sat on where he left me. I did not dare to think what I was doing. I had a vague feeling, which I would not suffer to crystallize into a thought, that there was a rivalry between me and his dead bride for his love. Had not I a right to win? I remembered what Margaret had said. I believed that he would be better and happier with a warm, living love, in place of this haunting, ghostly memory. But I knew not which would triumph; I could only wait. At last I heard the door open, and he came to me softly in the gathering twilight.

"Aria," he said, "I love you. It is Heaven's own truth, and I have a right to tell it to you. But I am not free to ask you to be my wife—I do not know that I ever shall be. I promised Margaret's mother, when she was dying, that I would never marry again. I am bound by my vow unless she releases me from it. I thought then, Heaven knows, that it would be easy enough to keep. I vowed her so well that I fancied there was no danger of my loving any one else. I should have found loving you, least of all—you, yet in your girlhood, and my daughter's friend. But it was curious the charm you had for me from the very first. As we stood in the drawing-room that first night a whisper came to me, which I knew was Leoline's warning—'Beware!' To-day, when I began to speak to you, I heard her voice again—a sudden, imperious call, which I could not resist. I went out and saw her, as I always see her, walking to and fro upon the balcony, with her baby, a little white snow-flake, in her arms. Aria, I begged her, as I would beg for my life, to release me from that vow. She could have answered me—she has spoken to me often enough—but she only looked at me, with eyes full of reproachful pain, and her lips uttered no word."

I remembered the whisper which I too had heard, that first night, and wondered that I had not also heard to-day the voice which summoned him. Perhaps that first warning had been meant for me as well as him; but I had not heeded it. A ghostly, humbling terror began to creep over me. I sat still and did not answer him.

"For Heaven's sake, Aria, speak to me one word," he said, coming close to me. "Am I a man or a monster? I loved Leoline. She had a right to my constancy; and yet, God knows, I love you. Oh, why did you come here?"

"I was going next week—I will go to-morrow."

The words seemed to drop from my lips against my will. They sounded cold and hard. I felt as if life and sense were failing me. In a moment some other Colonel O'Connor was kneeling beside me.

"Don't look at me so, Aria. You are turning to stone before my eyes. Don't hate me—it is enough that I must hate and scorn myself—that I, who thought my honor stainless, must live to know that I have broken at least the spirit of my vow. And yet, am I to blame? I could not help loving you. But I am old and sad—I could never have won a young, fresh heart like yours."

The misery in his voice touched me indoorribly. It was like the turning of a weapon in a wound. It tortured me into a sense of keen life, and gave me power to speak.

"I don't blame you," I said. "It was fate. But I could have loved you. It was a vain dream. Let us forget it and live!"

"No, I am ready to curse fate and die."

He looked into my eyes.

"Aria, this is bitterness beyond what a man can bear—to feel my happiness so near, and yet so out of reach—to love you, to feel that I could win your love, and yet to renounce you!"

He bent forward and drew me with firm hands close to him. I felt his lips on mine for one moment—fond, quivering, thrilling to the centre of my being. Then he released me.

"There, Aria, that is all. Forgive me if you can. You will not hate me I know. And you will not go back until the time comes; but you need not see me again after to-night. We should never have met, or we should have met in some other sphere. Well, child, it is possible to bear most things. Come, we can not escape life. We must go to dinner."

At the table a strange gayety seemed to possess him. He ate nothing, but he covered his lack of appetite and mine with quip and badinage and brilliant turns of thought.

After dinner he went into the library to look over the evening mail, and presently sent for Margaret.

She was with him a few moments and then came back. She looked me in the eyes like an inquisitor as she said:

"Papa has received a letter which will take him away from home to-morrow morning; we shall probably have to leave without seeing him again."

I expressed my regrets courteously, but I made no sign, nor did she ask me any questions.

We went back to school. What a mockery it seemed to me, with girlhood lying so far behind me as infancy! My thoughts ran tumultuously in one channel. I cared for none of the old delights or ambitions. I could not study. I had learned a lesson which swallowed up all others, as did Aaron's rod the rods of the Egyptians.

In the midst of term an epoch came which gave me independence—my twenty-first birthday. I was three years older than Margaret—late in finishing my studies, on account of my extreme delicacy in childhood, I had been late in commencing them. I was an orphan, and at twenty-one I became mistress of myself and my fortune. I should have left Madame Miniver's, but I had no tie any where so strong as the one which bound me to Margaret, and I staid on for her sake.

Early in December she came to my room with a letter in her hand.

"Aria," she said, "I am summoned home. My father is failing mysteriously. He wants me with him, and he says, 'Come alone.' I do not understand. I must not ask her to come, though her presence would be the greatest comfort?"

What to me was "my own sake" in comparison with his comfort? What if I suffered a pang or two more? The worst suffering of all would be to leave afterward that he had missed me. I went with Margaret.

We got there in time to see the last of him whom we both loved so well. We watched beside him night and day for three days, and then, in the wild winter midnight, "he heard the angels call."

He had been speaking lucidly enough about his plans.

"I have given Little Gibraltar to Aria," he said to Margaret, as she bent over him. "You will be rich enough without it, and you would not care to live here. It will have a deeper worth, a different significance for her."

Then he sent her from the room, on some pretext, and talked to me.

"It is all a mystery," he said, "strange as sad. Can a man love two women? I loved her. Heaven knows it, and my long, solitary years since her death have borne witness to it. And yet, if it be not love for you that is wasting my life away, what is it? We shall understand it all in the next world, I think."

"She has come to me often, since last summer. She waits for me always on the balcony outside, and I know she is there by the tune with which she hushes the baby on her breast—always the same strain she used to sing to me in other days. I go out when I hear it, and meet the sad upbraiding of her eyes. But she has never spoken to me since that day. I have pleaded a hundred times for release from my vow, but her lips will never open. I wonder if she will turn from me with horror in her eyes as the world of spirits; or whether, for her baby's father, there will be pity and forgiveness? Wrong or right, I could not help loving you; it was my fate."

I could not answer him, but I beat and pressed my lips to his mouth. Now, with him floating away from me on the unseen sea, I felt no scruples. But at the moment my lips touched his I heard, as distinctly as I ever heard any sound in my life, a strain of soft, sweet music—as I had never heard before. His eye kindled with recognition as he caught the sound, and he tried to rise. I turned to listen to Margaret, who was opening the door.

"Aria, the tide is going out," she said.

I looked back to the bed, and answered her:

"He has gone out with the tide."

And we heard the music, both of us, fainter, lower, farther and farther away, until its sweetness died on the waiting air.

Believe my story or doubt it—it does not matter. I have told it because a firm conviction of myself has caused to constrain me. I have never loved again—it does not seem to me that I ever shall. You see me in the winter of my years, sad, lonely and careless; but I go every summer to Little Gibraltar and dream over again the old, passionate, troubled dream. Margaret comes, sometimes, with her husband and her children; but I like best to be alone with the dead days in that nook haunted by memory, where the Atlantic thunders forward which the sea climbs eternally, where the white walls glitter, and the wind blows all the day, and every day, from the east toward the setting sun.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SAILOR being asked how he liked his bride, replied, "Why, d'ye see, I look her for to be only half of me, as the parson says, but dash me if she bean't twice as much as I. I'm only a tar, but she is a Tartar."

A modest minister out West marries for a drink of whisky, a dozen eggs, and the first kiss of the bride.

Two Dutchmen, who built and used in common a mill where ran a good stream which ran through their farms, had a dispute concerning some repairs which it required, and one of them positively refused to bear any portion of the expense necessary to the purchase of a few planks. Finally the matter was laid by at a neighboring lawyer, and, placing ten dollars in his hand, said:

"I'll give you all dish money if you'll make Hans pay for his vair as well."

"How much will it cost to repair it?" asked the honest lawyer.

"Not more ash five tollar," replied the Dutchman.

"Very well," said the lawyer, pocketing one of the notes and giving him the other; "take this and go to the bridge repaired: 'tis the best course you can take."

"Yaw," said the Dutchman, slowly, "yaas, dat ish more better as to quarrel mit Hans;" but as he went along home he shook his head frequently, as if unable, after all, to see quite clearly how he had gained anything by going to law.

HOW TO OVER CHATTER.—"As to opening oysters," said old Hurricane, "why nothing's easier, if you only know how." "And how's how?" inquired Straight. "Why, sir," answered old Hurricane, very seriously, "Scotch snuff! Bring a little of it over so near their noses, they'll encase their lids off."

What is nothing?—A footless stocking without a leg.

We have wondered why the Southern young men were so anxious to go to Brazil. A letter from General Wood satisfactorily explains to us the cause. "Young ladies on being introduced to a stranger inside upon being embraced, heart throbbing against heart."

"Take this dirty fellow out of the ranks and lave him in the waters of the Quadlua!," said a grandiloquent colonel during the Peninsula War. After some time the corporal assigned to the wash returned. "What have you done with the man I sent with you?" inquired the colonel. Up flew the corporal's right hand across the peak of his cap—"Sure ain't please y'r Honor, and didn't y'r Honor tell me to lave him in the river, and sure enough I left him in the river, and there he is now, according to y'r Honor's orders."

A Western farmer, being obliged to sell a yoke of oxen to pay his hired man, told him he could not keep him any longer.

"Very well," said the man, "I'll stay and take some of your cows in place of money."

"But you can't do," said the farmer, "when my cows and oxen are all gone?"

"Why you can then work for me, and get them back."

An enraged parent had jerked his provoking son across his knee, and was operating on the exposed portion of the urchin's person with great vehemence, when the young one dug into the paternal legs with his venomous little teeth.

"Blame! what are you biting me for?"

"Well, dad, you begined this here war."

"Has your sister got a son or a daughter?" asked a son of Erin. "Upon my life," was the reply, "I don't know whether I'm an aunt or an uncle."

A "green 'un," who had never before seen a steamboat, fell through the hatchway down into the hold of one, and being unhurt, loudly expressed his surprise: "Well, if she darned thing ain't loaden!"

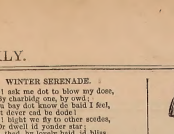
A PRISON.

No sun, no moon,
No morn, no night,
No sky, no earth I'm in,
No distant-looking view,
No road, no street,
No father side the way,
No dawn, no dusk,
No proper time of day,
No east to any row,
No top to any steeple,
No inclination where to go,
No sight of familiar people,
No cheerfulness, no healthy ease,
No butterflies,
No Nothing!

We have heard of an old Dutchman who whipped his son for swearing at him. The whipped boy still cursed, and the father whipped him again. Then the spunky little chap was silent, but looked as if the devil was in him. Thereupon the old fellow, applying the whip once more to his shoulders, exclaimed: "You don't say nothing, but I know you dink dam, and I'll wip you for dat."

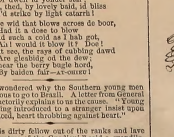
A Cincinnati paper says: "Rogues find no quarters here." To which Frenzied replies: "Very likely; they might search half the pockets in the city and find none."

"Isn't there an awfully strong smell of pipe in the room?" asked Smith of Jones. "Yes," replied Jones, "that's because the wind's from sow-west."



A lady, who painted her face, asked Parsons how he thought she looked. "I can't tell, Madam," he replied, except you first smooter your face."

A writer, dwelling upon the importance of small things, says that as many lakes notes even of a straw, especially if there happens to be a cherry-cobbler at one end of it."



Artists have adopted different emblems of charity. We wonder some of them ever thought of a piece of India rubber, which gives more than any other substance.

"Look here, Jem, there is a hole knocked out of this bottle you gave me." "Why, here's the hole in it now. If it was knocked out, how could it be there?"

ONLY.

Beware of an "only," "'tis but," and "just one!"
These phrases hide many a coward evidence.
All Troy for one woman in ashes was laid:
One tree another free into ruin played.
One crack will suffice that a vase be not sound;
One spark, and all London on fire was found:
One worm-eaten stick is enough for a wreck:
But one step too far, and to death we reck;
From only one word many quarrels begin:
And only the ace leads to many a sin;
Only a penny wastes many a pound;
Only once more, and the river was drowned;
Only one drop many drunkards has made;
Only in play many gamblers have said;
Only a cold opens many a grave;
Only read many evils will save.

Two ladies from the country, on a shopping excursion, dropped into a hardware store, where agricultural implements are sold, and incidently inquired for cradles. The storekeeper said it was rather late in the season for the article, and he had still all he purchased. The ladies looked at each other wonderingly, and whispered, laughingly, when one, turning to the blushing storekeeper, remarked: "Out of season! I thought babies were always in season."

PERFECT REST.

In the quiet of the church-yard
The weeping willows wave
Their slender, drooping branches
In the chilly autumn air;
And the withered church-yard grasses,
Above each lonely grave,
Utter sad and mournful whispers
O'er the dead who slumber there.

In the golden months of summer
Comes the honey-laden bee,
To hum amid the clover
His drowsy, murmurous song;
While the yellow-hearted daisies
Grow thick and fair to see;
And the sky looks down upon them
With a smile the whole day long.

Then, at times, I love to wander
Among the peaceful dead,
Where the golden-netted sunbeams
Sleep gently on the grass;
And to think on friends departed,
And the years forever fled;
While across the marble's whiteness
Falls my shadow as I pass.

What calm, unbroken slumber,
What sweet and perfect rest,
In the quiet of the church-yard
For everyone to lie;
With the tired hands gently folded
Across the pulseless breast,
In summer and in winter,
While the fleeting years go by!

Not any thought of sorrow,
Nor shadow born of care;
No eager, restless longings,
Of this busy life a part;
No dream of proud ambition
Can ever enter there;
Or the turbulent emotions
That crowd the beating heart.

Sometimes when very weary,
When the days seem dark and dreary,
And my heart beats low within me,
By a sense of grief oppress'd,
Then the graves within the church-yard
More beautiful appear,
And a longing fills my bosom
For the sweet and perfect rest.

ISAAC PENRITH'S THANKSGIVING.

The clock had just struck three. It was no trifle of bronze or ormolu; neither was it one of those quaint old specimens of dark wood and tarnished gilding that you sometimes encounter on antique stairways, keeping ghostly guard over the tread of generation after generation. It was a trim, compact little clock, hanging where its dial, like an eye, seemed to look through the four deep-set windows of the circular stone room, and watch the tides as they swung back and forth, murmuring discontentedly around the solid masonry that upheld the lighthouse. A strange place, a dreary, desolate place it seemed, prison-like in its isolation, and terrific in its frowning strength. Yet even there the sense of woman's presence cast its visible sign and token. Upon the pine table a vase of late autumnal flowers glowed in velvety carmine and gold, and a woven mat, decorated with the scarlet wing of a tropical bird, lay beside it.

Lucy Penrith was looking from one of the windows—a slender, pretty girl, with touches of faint crimson in either cheek, and violet-gray eyes, where the deep lights seemed to swim. Her black stuff dress was a trifle short; but there was a flutter of vivid scarlet ribbon at her throat, and a bunch of coral-red berries in her shining brown braids, bearing silent witness to the genuine love of the picturesque that exists in every woman's heart.

"I don't think the sea is very rough, father," Isaac Penrith's daughter deliberately folded his newspaper inside out, and commenced on a new column. He was a hard-featured, rugged old man, with iron-gray hair, and eyes where the wrinkles stood out like knotted cord.

Lucy stole across the stone floor and put her dimpled face between the printed page and her father's spectacles.

"Now, father, you will row me across. Oh, father, I never can spend Thanksgiving evening in this dismal place, and I promised them at the farmhouse!"

Rash promises is better broken than kept," sententiously answered old Isaac.

"But it is such a rash promise, father. All the young people are to be there, and Philip Martin—"

She stopped abruptly, checked by the dark frown that corrugated her father's brow.

"Philip Martin! I tell you, Lucy, I'll hear no more idle nonsense about that boy. It was Philip Martin who first tried to be keeper of the light in the house in my stead—a bad, black-hearted man—and the boy is a branch off the old tree, I'll go bail. And—"

But Lucy was crying, with her head on her father's knee. Isaac's heart relented within him.

"I'm an old bear, I know," he made haste to utter, "and I'd ought to be a little more kerful what I say. Don't cry, little one—there—there! I'll row ye 'cross, if ye say so; 'tain't over dark yet, and it is rather hard on a young gal like you to live in this stone dungeon year in and year out. I wish I hadn't had Sam he could have this to himself. But never mind; I'll be back long afore lightin' time."

Lucy had brightened up like a rose after a shower.

"Oh, father, I am so glad! I did so want to go!"

She tripped backward and forward, adjusting the round hat with the scarlet wing, folding the brown shawl, and rearranging the coral berries in her hair, while old Isaac, with his fur cap on, and his hands in the pocket of his sailor coat, watched her with a proud, amused sense of proprietorship.

"She's more like one o' them foreign birds with plumage like fire, and little, gaincin' ways, than she is like a human critter!" thought the light-house keeper. "I know I'm goin' clean agin' all rules and regulations, havin' the place alone, but there'll be but for a few minutes, and I don't like to disappoint the gal, her heart's so kind o' set on it! I've got to be father and mother both to the child—and she is a good gal, and a pretty one too, if she does happen to be Isaac Penrith's darter!"

"If you take the flowers over, father," said Lucy, removing them from the vase, and wrapping a bit of paper round the damp stems, "I'll gather as much bird in the farm-house garden, and they'll help to make the Thanksgiving-table gay. Now, father, I'm ready!"

And so Isaac Penrith pulled the shell-like little boat out to sea, with the long, steady, vigorous strokes that betokened the daily habituation to life on the ocean, he fell into a musing remembrance of the far-away Thanksgivings of his youth, with their rains of red and golden leaves, and their odor of sweet fern in the pastures, and the old red farm-house among the bleak New England hills! And, unconsciously, the roar of the green, translucent tide became the wail of winds in upland forests, and Lucy's blooming face opposite him seemed her mother's smiling out from the mists of years.

Nor was the salt drop on old Isaac's cheek the spray from his steadily dipping oar.

Lucy Penrith sprung lightly to her feet as the keel of the boat grated softly on the smooth, shingly sand of the beach.

"You will come up to the house with me, father. See how high the sun is!"

Isaac stooped and secured his boat to a huge projecting rock by means of a loop of heavy rope.

"I'll go," he said, briefly, adding within himself: "and if Phil Martin's there, I'll bring her back with me again. I don't like his father's son."

The old brown house stood a little way back on the beach, with a smooth stretch of silvery sand in front, and a cluster of blackened sheds in the rear, tossing their plumy heads about in the blustering, salt-scented gale, and a group of merry-makers, young and old, in their Thanksgiving holiday-trusts, were in the porch awaiting the arrival of the new-comers.

"Oh, Lucy, we thought you never were coming!" said a bright-eyed little damsel, whose hair was blowing about her face like a mist of rippled gold! "What made you stay so long, Phil Martin?"

Lucy's appealing, frightened glance stopped the half-uttered sentence short; but Isaac Penrith had caught its meaning.

"Lucy," he said, drawing his daughter aside as the whole group hurried merrily into the house once more, where a fire of drift-wood blazed red in the huge old-fashioned fire-place, and the "old people," in caps and brass-buttoned suits, were purring over the genial glow, "Lucy, what's the meaning between you and—and Dorr Martin's son?"

She colored and turned her face away, while the old grasp on her eyes.

"Tell me," he urged, sternly grasping her arm; "I will have no more half-confidences! Has he asked you to be his wife?"

"Yes, father."

"And you—what answer did you make?"

"Father," simply answered Lucy with her violet eyes raised to his, "I love him!"

"Child," said Isaac Penrith, "conquer this idle folly as best you may! I never will give my daughter to Philip Martin. So now you know my will and determination in the matter."

"But, father—"

He turned abruptly away, releasing Lucy to the demands of half-a-dozen pleading, bird-voiced girls, who "would briefly remind" Isaac Penrith of his duty offers of hospitality that beset him on every side.

"I must be goin' back, friends," he said.—"Tom Lyle's right to-night to keep the light, and I want to set on't, and I mustn't lose no more time. By the looks o' the clouds we'll have a stormy night, and the sea will help them that are out to sea along this cruel shore!"

And so he bade the revelers a "Good-night!" and locked last at the ruddy glow of the hospitable fire and Lucy's sweet face, flushed by its radiance or something else—as she stood adjusting a late rose in Barbara Cliffe's gold-colored hair.

"I'll walk down to the shore with ye, neighbor Penrith," said old Truman Cliffe, pulling on his thick overcoat. "Seems to me, now, I've got a notion or long, I can't bear to keep indoors when the wind is blowin' up like it does now!"

The late autumnal sunset was fringing the overhanging clouds with sullen fire—such fire as burns itself out in stormy reflections, leaving a track like bloody footsteps across the waters, and dark words of meaning sullenly along the barren shore, and the distant thunder of the ground-swell sounded like the solemn bass chords of the "Dies Iræ."

"You're right, Isaac," said Truman Cliffe, "it's goin' to be an awful night! There's mischief in them clouds; and if there's a vessel near in the sound o' the breakers, it's there to-night! Why, what's the matter?"

For Isaac Penrith had uttered a cry that made the old sailor's blood grow chill in his veins.

"The boat! Merciful Father! the boat is gone!"

It was true; the boat had somehow become loosened and the little bark was rocking somewhere on the waves, beyond sight or sound.

"Truman, I must have your boat, and be quick as possible. The sun is nearly down; but I can reach the light-house yet before lighting time!"

He spoke in a hoarse, hurried voice, the beating of his heart seemed like the strokes of a muffled drum.

Truman Cliffe turned a white, dismayed face toward his old companion.

"Our boat is down to Kilcoran, with Jared and his girls: they won't be back till to-morrow morning!"

There was an instant's silence, then Isaac spoke, still in the same hoarse, unnatural voice.

"Is there no other boat I could get?"

"There's Hugh Donnelly's down to the Point; but that's two miles off!"

"I'll go for it!"

Truman stopped him, as he was turning blindly toward the shore.

"No, Isaac, you're lame and stiff, and I'm a good walker. Keep your strength for the hard rowin' you'll have to do. I'll be back as quick as mortal man can go and come. Sit down on the rock, old friend, and rest—you've tremblin' like a leaf!"

Isaac Penrith obeyed, mechanically, and dropped his head upon his hands, sitting motionless while the bloody track upon the waves grew purpler and more indistinct, and the dull thunder of the groundswell seemed to mutter menaces in his ear.

Two miles away! and the brief twilight was already setting in! How slowly Truman Cliffe plodded along; and yet those idiots on the shore had always called him a swift walker. He would go himself, and he started up, but only to sink back again weak and helpless.

"I have no strength left," he thought. "I must wait. I must wait for that mail to creep along the sands. They were right; it will be a fearful night at sea! And there is no light in the light-house to warn home-returning and ships off the reefs!"

As he closed his eyes he could almost see the stately ships drifting upon their death, and going down beneath the moaning waves, while their crew were looking out in vain for the red signal star of danger! He could hear the creak and groan of straining timbers—the cry of mast and yard-arm—the dying shriek of human creatures! He shuddered convulsively.

"And I shall be a murderer! O God! why did I desert my post?"

And in this moment of agony and repentance Dorr Martin's mocking face rose up before him, full of evil exultation.

"He always said I could not be trusted, and he was right!"

Dorr Martin's triumph was the bitterest drop in the bitter cup that Isaac Penrith drained to the dregs that autumn evening.

"The sun has set—the hour of grace is past," he muttered to himself. "I will not live to have Dorr Martin's wrecking be one of the baleful chronicled on those reefs—I will not look little children in the face and hear them whisper that I murdered their fathers! I will not see Dorr Martin triumph in my ruin! No, better a quiet grave at the bottom of the deep sea than a life of remorse and dishonor! But Lucy—she had better mourn me—dead than live to blush for me! Good-by, my fairhaired darling! I shall never see your bonny face more!"

How the wind blew his gray uncovered hair about, as, murmuring a faint half-forgotten prayer, he crept down the rocks, and crept to seek his death, where the cruel, white-fringed waves writhed up along the shore! An instant he paused, to look a last look at the light-house, the far-stretching shore, when all of a sudden a wild hourse shriek broke from his parched lips.

For like a red star rising its glory along the tumultuous sea, the light of the light-house streamed upon their view! The danger signal—the steady finger of fire held up to a hundred crafts: "Beware!"—the beacon for which many and many an anxious helmsman was gazing out into the night! He was not drowning—the waves were not below him, yet the light was all ablaze in its huge crystal lantern, and he was guiltless of the weight of crime and misery that had so nearly weighed him down forever.

When Truman Cliffe rowed up to the shore, an hour afterward, Isaac Penrith was kneeling, bareheaded and wet sand, with his forehead against the chill white rock.

"Well, I say for's!" ejaculated Truman. "You hain't been to the light-house and back, 'cause you hain't wings, and none but a bird could ha' done it! Why look up!"

"I don't know. Give me the oars, Cliffe."

Truman stared, but made room for the keeper and gave up the oars. And so it came to pass that between them as Isaac rowed with giant strokes, and the little boat danced over the troubled billows with still light, a floating leaf. Nearer and nearer glowed the gigantic star—closer and closer its glory seemed to shine—until at length Isaac Penrith sprang upon the rocks, and bade his friend wait a few minutes, while he went into the lantern-room.

There, with his feet on the fender, composedly looking over the columns of the newspaper, sat a young man. He rose as Penrith entered the room.

"Philip Martin!"

"Mr. Penrith!"

"You—you lighted the signal?"

"I did. I came over to bring Lucy to shore, and I found the light-house empty. Of course I concluded something was wrong, so I went on duty myself until I should learn from some of you."

Isaac Penrith wrung the young man's hand.

"Philip—if—if there had been no light on the Reefs, and a vessel with your father would have been keeper to-morrow, and I should have been a ruined man!"

The deep color rose into Philip Martin's cheek.

"If I had been a villain, Mr. Penrith, I should not be Philip Martin!"

"God bless you, Philip; God bless you!" murmured the old man. "I shall never forget this kindly office you have done me!"

"And Lucy?"

"Lucy is over at Cliffe's. Take the boat, Phil, and go join her! Truman is below! And, Philip—"

"Sir?"

"Tell her—well, tell her what you like."

The old man smiled feebly as he saw the warm flush deepen on Martin's bronzed cheek, and the next moment he was alone.

Phillip knew that the coveted prize was his at last—and the little boat flew back over the waves almost like an enchanted bark.

Isaac throughout all the length and breadth of the rejoicing nation that night there was no Thanksgiving half so fervent as that breathed in the lighthouse when the signal star threw its fiery lines far out to sea, and the fog and mist brooded like a phantom over the face of the great deep.

NOT BORN FOR WORK.

WHEN I first commenced the practice of medicine in Dogwood, being unmarried, I boarded at the American Hotel in that village. There was a waiter at that house who was sufficiently peculiar, and owned so many gentlemanly accomplishments, of that sort calculated to adorn and enliven the daily life of a man of wealth and leisure. He was a fine singer, a fair pianist (though he played only accompaniments to his own vocalism), and he could make a capital after-dinner speech, when called on to do so, as he often was. He could also write very fair poetry, and not a few of his songs were of his own making, both words and music. Yet (strange to say though), very rarely though he was asked in any way to make his talents serve him pecuniarily. He waited at table with consummate grace, and never did any other work. His hands were white and slender. His personal appearance was fine, and his clothes always of a certain shabby-genteel sort—never—a new garment seen at his dining; George Cantwell never possessed; his wardrobe being composed wholly of the cast-off apparel of gentlemen who boarded at the hotel.

George was a universal favorite among the guests at our house. His manners were usually extremely winning, while the accomplishments he possessed made him a pleasant companion. In common with the rest I also liked George, and before I had known him long, I commenced the attempt of trying to get his confidence, and if possible "make a man of him."

One evening I was a bit unwell, and George brought a tray of tea-things to my room. It was on this occasion that I resolved to drop a sounding-line.

"George," said I, "you are a man of too much ability to be living at a hotel as a table-waiter. Did you know that, Sir?"

George only smiled as he replied, "Sweet is flattery, doctor."

"A man that can be flattered is a fool," said I.

"Oh, not necessarily," said George, "though it's true you can generally make one of him."

"Well, I was trying to make a fool of you, George. Quite the contrary. I'd rather make a gentleman of you."

"I beg your pardon, Sir; but you'll excuse me if I say that a gentleman is a gentleman naturally, and there is no making one out of a clown. Nascitur, non fit, is as applicable in this case as in that of the poet, Sir. If a man is a gentleman, no mere external circumstances in life can make him any thing else."

Not even the circumstance of his being a tablewaiter. I see what you mean, and I beg your pardon, George. Certainly there is no reason why a table-waiter should not be a gentleman. I hoodwinked—I used the wrong word—I meant to have said that I would like to "make a man of you," and you know just what that phrase signifies. You are fit for something better than this. It is a shame that a man of your parts should rest contented, year after year, in the position of a hotelservant."

"Did you ever know me to say that I was contented, Dr. Benson?" spoke up George. "I am biding my time, Sir. My luck will come some day."

"Your luck will come! What do you mean by that? Luck in this country of ours does not consists in taking hold and working out your fortunes with the ability that lies in you. Luck! That is a word for children and idiots and fools alone! There's the word for a man who means to be a man. Well-directed and persistent labor will fight its way to success, while luck, or waiting for waiting and waiting, like Micawber, for 'something to turn up.' Turn up something yourself—that's the rule! 'Work and wait,' I say. If you don't you'll be a table-waiter all the days of your life—provided you don't chance to get too supercanuated, and have to play jester in the poorhouse. That's the road luck leads a man."

Cantwell stood biting his nails. It was plain I had touched his pride, and that was just what I meant to do, supposing that he had any true pride in his character at all.

"Dr. Benson," said he, in a low, earnest voice, such as I had never heard him use before, "your language is such as to tempt a man to reply in a like strain. I don't want to be a table-waiter, I'm sure. Sir, I try to bear my place always in mind, though it isn't often that I'm as strongly tempted as I am to-day to stand up straight and assert myself as good a man as any other. But I haven't kept my secret all this time to let it out now. I'll say this to you, however, that I was not born for work. I am biding my time, as I said before. The day will come when I shall not need to lift my hand, and until then I mean to do just as little work as I possibly can. I hate it. Men who have got their way to make in the world may work if they want to, and wear themselves to skeletons for it—it is my belief that I was born for a life of ease, and I'll do nothing to trench on my future capacities for enjoyment when my luck does come."

During this speech I stared at the young man with growing wonder. Such a case of stupid infatuation I thought I had never witnessed. When he was done, however, I only said:

"I suspect you're talking nonsense, George. That'll do." And I pushed away the trey.

He gathered up the tea-things and left me.

I was puzzled by the confident manner of the man. It was clear to my mind that he was laboring under some strong hallucination. I wondered if he bought lottery-tickets.

When I asked him about that he put aside the imputation with a quiet smile; he had no need to buy lottery-tickets, he said.

What could the fellow mean?

My practice was one of the most prosperous that ever fell to a country physician, I think; and even (it was not long after the conversation above cited) I decided to make another effort to lift Cantwell out of his slough by offering him a place in my office.

"I will give you every opportunity for study, George, and will pay you enough to keep you respectable in the mean time. With your readiness you should be qualified to commence practice as my assistant before a great while."

"Medicine," said Cantwell, in reply, "is an eminently respectable profession; but it is far too latent a science for a man obliged to you, Doctor, but I have no occasion to accept your kind offer."

I was nearly disgusted with the man.

"Well, go your way," said I. "I give you up."

"I hope you're not offended with me, Doctor," said George, wistfully.

"Offended! No, it's your own affair, man. You hurt nobody but yourself by throwing yourself away. You might as well be old Dan' (a well-known idiot about the village) "for all the use your abilities do you. What benefit is it to you, George Cantwell, that you can set a table in a room with an elegant speech, or sing a song, or dance as you are nothing but what you are? Old Dan uses the talents God gave him at least!"

"And do I make no use of what I have?" said Cantwell, in a low tone. "I have just one object, Doctor, to make the people I come in contact with like me. I have any talents that can help me in that direction, I am very glad. More than that I don't ask. I am pretty well liked, am I not?"

"Yes, after your fashion, no doubt—just as they like a dog that can do smart tricks; but they don't forget that it is a dog. They don't respect you, George. They would, though, if you acted like a man, and made something of yourself."

"They will respect me fast enough, Sir, when my—when the time comes. I'll hold up my head with the best of them yet."

"George's luck" grew at last to be a favorite byword among the young men about town. "If only George Cantwell comes into his fortune," was a popular way of promising my thing that the speaker had not the remotest intention of performing, or expressing the superlative of incredulity regarding the success of any chimerical enterprise.

Meantime, you could see George bagging about the public room of the hotel any day, between the hours for meals, with his shabby-genteel broadcloth coverings, with his face clean shaved (except for his long, sleek side-whiskers), and a tooth-pick between his lips—talking about horses, about dogs, about women, about any thing that hotel-loungers are in the habit of idly discussing. He was an fait in the art of small-talk on all such matters, and one could scarcely resist the impression that he was some eccentric man of property, capable of investing untold sums in those objects of his fancy, if he only would. Newly-arrived strangers, traveling gentlemen, have been often known to get into conversation with him of an evening, and impress him to be some just such gentleman of leisure, and manifest respect for him accordingly; and when they saw him the next morning at the breakfast-table with a white apron on, they would stare at the apparition with a high degree of astonishment. I recollect almost such case in conversation with such a stranger once, when I took occasion to speak to George because I saw him spit blood, and my professional instincts were awakened for the moment. He said, however, that he thought the blood came from his teeth, and when I alluded to his lungs, he laughed at the idea of their being unsound, with his vocal power. certainly he seemed robust enough.

It was about the time that Professor Carlincourt Lowe was making his preparations for that grand balloon-voyage to Europe, which never came off, that a group of men were discussing the novel project, sitting in the shade of the American piazza, on a warm summer afternoon.

"Yes," remarked one, sarcastically, "I believe he'll get to Europe—I don't as firmly as I believe in George's luck. They will be synonymous happenings, will those two interesting events."

The unconscious cause up the street at that moment, bringing from the post-office the letters for the hotel by the afternoon mail.

"Letter for you, George," said the boy, selecting one from the pile in his hands, and tossing it to Cantwell.

George tore the letter open eagerly, glanced over it, and turned pale. Then the blood rushed to his face and he sprang to his feet.

"It's arrived, last!" he cried.

"What has?" queried the sarcastic individual, giving him a sharp look.

"What do you echoed George. "What has? Why, Lowe has—and his balloon—they've arrived in Europe! Ha, ha, ha!" and he laughed like a crazy man.

"Hanged if the fellow isn't gone mad!" said the other. "Let me see that letter, George."

"That letter, Sir!" said George, with a lordly air, "is the private property of George Cantwell, Esquire, at present of Pagefield, next of kin to the late lamented Philip Cantwell, of Cantwell Manor, Lancashire, England. Come and drink with me, friends! George's luck has come at last for sure!"

Yes, George had really come into his "luck." We could with difficulty believe it. But if we had entertained any doubts as to the genuineness of the letter, we could have none as to that of its inclosure —a draft for $500 in gold on a well-known New York banking-house. The letter was from a Manchester lawyer, and inclosed the above sum to enable the heir to take passage at once for England and enter upon the possession of his property, a vast estate in Lancashire.

"So I was right, was I, Doctor?" George asked me that night, with glowing eyes and a flushed face.

"It seems so, George," said I, "right to the extent of having expected a legacy, and having received it. I congratulate you."

"I mean your congratulations, Dr. Benson," George responded in a somewhat grandiloquent tone—he had been drinking, I perceived—"and I have but one favor to ask of you, namely, that you will remember that my name is Mr. Cantwell now, and that 'George' went out with the white apron this day morning."

"All right, George," said I, laughingly; "I beg your pardon—Mr. Cantwell."

He bowed gravely.

"When do you leave us?" I added.

"In about a week," said he.

"So long! I'm glad you are in no hurry, George —that is, Mr. Cantwell—for I want an opportunity for some sober conversation with you. But I conclude I expected you would be off by to-morrow's train."

"So I should have been, perhaps," said he. "But the truth is, the citizens of Pagefield, and more particularly the guests of the American hotel, are going to give a complimentary dinner to George Cantwell, Esquire, on the occasion of his departure for Europe."

With this sublime announcement George walked away, puffing a choice cigar. He had scarcely been a moment without a cigar between his lips since receiving the news. Also, he had grown sober at present. Habitual drinking had never been one of George's faults; but now he spent most of his time in the bar-room, standing treat to any of the young men, who rejoiced in the sunshine of the whilom table-waiter's "luck." Popular as he had been before, he was far more popular now. For yielding to the influence of this sort of thing on the first day of his sudden wealth I was not disposed to blame George harshly. But when I saw the thing resumed next morning I felt grave fears for him. But was it my place to lecture him on his habits? My position entitled me to guide him had been thrown away. While I was still undecided on that point, however, chance gave me an opportunity to whisper a word in his ear, and I spoke on the impulse of the moment:

"It seems you are saved from the danger of becoming a pauper, George; beware lest you become a sot."

He was under the influence of liquor at the moment, and his eyes flashed an angry look on me; but he said nothing. The word was not wasted. George checked himself, and set about the arrangement of his affairs becoming dignified soon. It was an affair of his own conscious importance, it is supposed; but he had many assistants in carrying out the plan he new-born estalities. At his express mands of invitation were issued, and the forth-coming feast was duly heralded in the Pagefield Times, which had a very flattering item on the "Singular Freak of Fortune" in its current issue.

The dinner was an elegant affair. George presided with a grace that seemed to sit upon him naturally. There were toasts and speeches and songs, of course; the necessary duty of the occasion is to me a blank in all things save its catastrophe.

In response to a toast to "Our departing friend—may joy go with him!" George arose in his feet, his face blazing red with wine and enthusiasm.

"Ladies and gentlemen—kind friends all," he said, "I need not tell you, in the hackneyed phrase in which words very ear to them, that this is the last this moment is the proudest of my life. It is a moment of triumph to me. For years I have filled a position in life that circumstances thrust upon me, and, confident in the ultimate arrival of that goodfortune which I knew fate had in store for me, listened with patience and without repining to every sneer to the jeers which invariably accompanied all allusions to 'George's luck.' The word has been a favorite phrase in life, and who is confident of his future, can rise superior to all external influences which seek to swerve him from his course. That word, I have seen those—and here the speaker turned upon me a meaning glance—" who sought to induce me to use my little influence for their good, as much, I say to you and to all the world, let those labor who must. That it is my part of man's duty to labor I boldly deny. I am born to command, not to toil. For myself I hate it with an honest hatred, and I have never in my life performed any menial task than I thought I was under peculiar circumstances. If the truth were known, I strongly suspect that this sentiment would be found to be a natural prevision of my future, and not a dislike to labor because they feel their necessities goading them to it. But as for me, confident in the traditions of my childhood, I knew I was born to—not work; why should I exhaust or impair my life-energies by toil? No! From the earliest dawnings of a conscious appreciation of life in its true sense I have had but one end in view—the husbanding of my life-sources against the arrival of my coming good-fortune. Now, that day has come! It is my day of triumph! And who shall say to me in this proud hour that I have neglected my duty in the part by avoiding toil and care? I speak here today in abounding health and strength, with all my capacities for enjoyment sharpened to the keenest edge by the patient waiting of these years. Friends I have many; enemies I have none; with health and wealth, an uncorrupted heart, and a head untrammeled with the musty webs that base toil spins for its victims, I shall realize the height of all that is desirable in this world provides for its favored enjoyment which this world provides for its favored sons. Before me there stretches the alluring and delightful avenues of Pleasure!"—his voice rising steadily as he spoke, his excitement deepening with each rounded period, his arms now outstretched eagerly toward the vision his fancy was picturing, while his eyes glowed with a wonderful light—"the goddess of mortal delights beckons me, and my soul responds to her enchanting gestures! Henceforth, these goddess beautiful, I am thine, and I spurn the prevailing oath that would enchain me! Thine—thine—"

He faltered as he stood, and groped in the air with his outstretched hands like one suddenly stricken blind. Then a crimson tide gushed from his mouth, and he fell to the floor, his fall broken by my arm as I sprang to his side. In five minutes he was dead. Under the influence of this strong excitement he had burst a blood-vessel, and was almost instantly suffocated by the copious effusion.

I have not told this story, said the Doctor, with any direct purpose of "pointing a moral." Stories and poetry "prove nothing." But I must confess that my respect for labor has been in no way lessened since that hour when poor George died at the gate of his fancied Paradise; nor have I ever in my life, since that hour, felt the shadow of discontent flit across my heart at the lot which tells me I was born for work.

THE WAVE.

A WAVE came rolling in to'ard the land,
To the level beach where the yellow sand
Shone in the red sun's golden light:
Tall, majestic, and full of might,
Crested with silver and looking so grand,
Came this wave of the sea to'ard the beautiful land.

High it lifted its sparkling crest,
Smote with an arrow out of the west;
Where the spirits dwell by the wind uprolled,
Their turrets dunning with sunset gold,
Stood like castles around the sea
Whose broad and blue day was nearly done.

Out on the ocean white sails were seen,
Flashed with the sunset's rosy sheen;
Some were in the offing, some near bar,
Bright and clear shone the Evening Star,
As crested the wave and looking so grand
Came that wave of the sea to'ard the beautiful land.

High and higher it rose in its strength,
Near and nearer it came, till at length
It swept the edge of the shining shore
With a sudden leap and a sullen roar,
And scattered its spray in glittering strand
The tidings of wrecks it had brought to land.

And I thought as, silent, I gazed on these
Of some fair ship sailing the boisterous seas,
Lifted aloft on a towering wave
While the cold storm beats and the wild winds rave;
Of a golden wind without moon or stars,
Of shattered masts and of broken spars.

I thought of passengers crowding the deck
Of the doomed ship fated to be a wreck;
Of faces stony with mute despair;
Of the thrilling cry and the muttered prayer;
Of struggling forms that the cruel wave
Enfolds in a wild and watery grave.

And I thought in turn of the ocean of life
Of storms and shipwrecks and the infinite strife;
Of the countless wrecks that are drifting there
Each with its tale to the voyage with hope so fair,
That are drifting on toward the unknown shore
Of that land unseen which is lying before.

On wave of the sea that came rolling this way,
Bringing its tidings of the close of day,
What tidings of wrecks are these you have brought?
What merchant-land has the ocean wrought?
But no answer came save the sea's dull roar
As the blue waves broke on the darkening shore.

THE DUTIES OF AN ENGLISH LADY'S MAID.

One of these not-to-be-envied persons, a race which may be classed with that of governesses, has recently made disclosures concerning the miseries it is the lot of women of rank in "Old England." "Much is required from us in London," she writes. We must, above all, be very punctual. Fashionable ladies change their dress at least five times a day during the season. We must have our clothes ready, be we ever so much thirty-five years, and always be cheerful and good-tempered, although we may be at any hour kept without sleep until four o'clock in the morning. Punctuality is also equally imperious to eyes and lungs. We are expected to cut and curl the hair in the most improved fashion, and to dress hair for the morning, evening, and dinner-party in the space of half an hour. We have to read, write, cipher; to speak French and German, and, if possible, to learn Italian. There is still another function of a lady's maid which is supposed to be a modern introduction, but which is in fact merely the revival of an ancient one. We must be able to paint in pastel, not indeed after Nature, but upon her. To beautify our mistresses we must redden the cheeks, put antimony upon the eyelids, pastel upon the brows, introduce belladonna into the eyes in order to enlarge the pupils, paint blue veins upon the temples, and use minon paint and pearl white upon the neck of the skin. We must change the hair to a reddish brown by means of a corroding material or of henna wetting. In such a case we need a precursor for that purpose; and we must be possessed of great skill in applying all these ingredients, as their use is universal with the old as well as with the young.

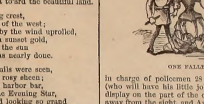
WINGLETS.

FROM OUR "CORRESPONDENT ON-THE-WING."

Dear Harper's Weekly:

I read up a little about two weeks ago, according to the recommendations of the Astronomers and the newspaper men, to see the "stars fall," or as the Astronomic Shower." I don't think it paid me. I have heretofore found no difficulty in "taking" the falling meteors: but to sit up till 3, or perhaps 5 o'clock in the morning, to see such a shower as there was a star fall, and no more to it, required one to be in the spirit. The following "Ditty," which I kept off this important astronomical event, will do to refer to in all future time, as well for the Philosopher as for the Director of the Fire and Police Telegraph:

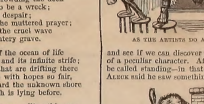
TEN O'CLOCK P.M.—Mary commenced setting the table in the library and Nan making observations as to reference to the stars. I asked her for the key of the side-board, that I might look there for my opera-glass. Did look there, and removed some other glasses to the table. I did not see the opera-glasses.



Looked out of the window and saw but one "star" in the street—Policeman 28.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK P.M.—Door-bell rings. Arrival of Nan, who came according to promise to watch the stars with me. Nan thinks they are best seen through "smoked glass," as the night might otherwise hurt our eyes. We therefore lighted our cigars, and began to smoke the glasses and the window-curtains. Looked out of the window; even "star" 28 had disappeared. Nan suggested that we try

LOOKING THROUGH THE GLASSES.



TWELVE O'CLOCK, MIDNIGHT.—We are now joined by Alice, who is of the opinion that the stars might fall in advance, and that we had better watch very closely the first hour of the morning. Alice was shown the glasses we had prepared for the purpose, and looked through one of them. We heard a noise in the street, and all rushed to the window, and there was in charge of policemen 28 and 46, which Ned said (who will have his little joke) was a Meteor (his) display on the part of the city stars. We all turned away from the sight, and Alice proposed that we go through some calculations, and examine the glasses, and passed a glass to me for my inspection. After examining the glasses, looked again out of the window, and found the atmosphere quite hazy.

ONE FALLEN STAR

ONE O'CLOCK A.M.—It became more apparent from the phosphorent appearance of things that the stars or something is going to fall. Ned suggests that we all look out of the window and see if we can discover any thing in the heavens of a peculiar character. After standing—if it might be called standing—in that position for some time, Alice said he saw something that looked to him like

AS THE ARTISTS DO AT THEIR PICTURES.

THE CONSTELLATION OF THE "SON OF COFFIN."

We all finally saw it, when it sank suddenly below the horizon and disappeared. We put down our pair pollons, feeling a little unsteady from over-exertion in the cause of science, when we again returned to examine our glasses, found them empty, filled them, and again commenced our observations.

TWO O'CLOCK A.M.—Things becoming more hazy, both indoors and out; evidences of the "meteoric display" begin to thicken, as the dew was everywhere in our room. The glasses now looked and tasted smoky. Alice called my attention to the street lamps, which began to "shut" and other things in the street, and as the things in the room began to manifest signs of unsteadiness. A strong haze around the gas-burner prevents me from lighting my cigar. Nan has gone to sleep, purposing to awaken when the fire-bells strike. Alice and I determined to sit it out.

THREE O'CLOCK A.M.—No stars now visible out of the window; we therefore shut the blinds and try our glasses. Alice says it would be better for the eyes if the glasses were colored. We both color them with a decoction of logwood and other stuff. Both begin to think that we see stars.

THIS IS ABOUT THE TIME WE SHOULD SEE THEM.

They two more colored glasses, and the display becomes beautiful. Alice moves a vote of thanks to the "Astron (ish) astronomers, and to Telegraph for their kind notice for the bona-bona (his) beautiful (his) display.

Nan can think we hear a ringing in our ears, which we take for the alarm-bells, signifying that the "shower" is taking place. We shall see. We can't find the window. We conclude, therefore, to postpone looking out of doors for the present, and to continue our observations indoors in the colored glasses, as our success heretofore has been altogether in that direction.

SEVEN-AND-A-HALF O'CLOCK A.M.—It is now morning. The time since three o'clock has passed very rapidly. With Alice and Nan it is still passing, as their morning is audible in every part of the room. The chairs and movable furniture bear evidences of a very restless night. I myself do not feel entirely rested, and many of the articles that were spent in manipulating metarical phenomena is not warranted by the results. Will you say print these for me? I think they will help the cause of science, of which I am a devoted disciple.

Your own C. O. W.

THE VETERAN ROOSTER.

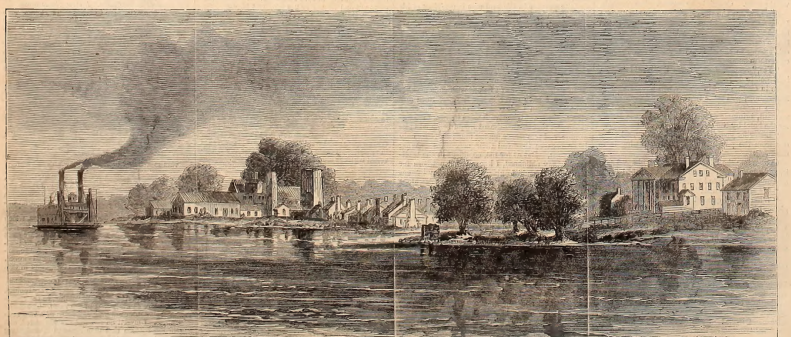
THE fondness that officers and men manifest for pets is a peculiarity. One of the most noted pets in the army was a rooster named "Jack."

A hero of many battles was Jack. He was captured—no, he was not captured, for his proud spirit could not have survived a conquest—he came to the head-quarters of General B——, at Atlanta, a haughty monarch of the barn-yard, in all the glory of red, yellow, and purple feathers, with dignified step and a glowing crimson crest. From the moment he joined the General's staff he was the pet and pride of officers and men; and nobly did he justify their care and affection, for he never failed to maintain the championship over his fellows. In the capitol of Georgia, on the banks of the Ogeechee, at Savannah, Columbia, and Raleigh, in the early morning, during the brief halt at noon, after the tents were pitched for the night, in many a combat, in the perilous assault, although sometimes exhausted from repeated efforts, in all the long march of that Grand Army he never was defeated; the roosters of a Cobb, a Lemar, a Rhett, a Hampden, were pitted against him — one and all were beaten. He never lowered his head nor drooped his tail so long as a feather remained there; while the corpses of a hundred combatants enrich Southern soil, or were consigned to the tender attention of the cook ere life was extinct.

When the army arrived at Raleigh Jack was still the champion, although it may not be said that he wore the "belt," for in the course of numberless beak-pickings and spur-pierings the feathers of Jack's poor body had become reduced to half a dozen, so that to the eye of the stranger he appeared to walk about the head-quarters camp as if inviting the cook's attention to his admirable condition for pot or spit. But although Jack's feathers had flown and his spurs had worn off at the leg, and his once proud crest had become bald with fight and age, yet his eye was undimmed and still sparkled defiance to every crowing cock. At Raleigh Jack's owner fitted his quarters at the house of one of Lee's generals, who was paroled at the surrender. Attached to his ménage was a famous fighting rooster. In the warmth of the new friendly relation then springing up between Union and rebel soldiers, he kindly advised General B—— to take his rooster off the premises or he would get killed. General B—— thought that a rooster that had made the Grand March could whip any thing that came out of Virginia, even if that State had the name of the Mother of Presidents, so the fight was at once brought about. In ten minutes the Virginian was lying prostrate in the dust, and at once executed for culinary purposes, while Jack, perched upon an orderly's arm, who gently stroked his breast, crowed with exultation and delight.

But Jack was destined to meet an opponent which has before now overcome a more redoubtable enemy than roosters. When the army were marching home, Jack's brigade went into camp one night by the side of the railroad. As our veteran was meandering about the grounds, no doubt upon some laudable intent, a locomotive halted near by and began backing and advancing at a water-tank. Jack observed its movements, and acting upon a well-recognized principle of war, assumed the offensive, pitching into the locomotive with great fury. The fight was animated, but of brief duration; an unlucky turn of the wheel cut off dear brave old Jack's head, and he, too, became a dead rooster.

In deepest grief his mourning friends buried him there upon the field where he fell, with this inscription upon the head-board of his grave:



"POOR JACK!
He sleeps his last sleep.
He has fought his last battle!"

"ON THE TIP TOE OF EXPECTATION."

"ON THE TIP-TOE OF EXPECTATION."

WHAT need to scribble admiration of this charmingly-natural little picture? If, perchance, some misanthropic old bachelor or miserable old spinster, looking at it, should sneer at its puerility—should proclaim all children to be but greedy little animals, well, what then? Why, there is no household into which this Number will penetrate where our little lady will not find warmest partisans.—You, Sir Bachelor, may have a selfish appetite for the favorite part which dessert brings, though even that may pall upon you; but probably gout would prevent your standing on tip-toe, even could you have so eager expectations of any kind. And you, Miss, perhaps have little zest or hope in life beyond tea and scandal. It is a tiresome and mischievous irregularity, you say in concert, to admit children from the nursery to dessert. But again we appeal for justification to mater and pater families, and with them claim indulgence for, at all events, an only child—as, mark you, this pretty little toddler appears to be. For our part, though we might sigh at remembrance of the days when jumpers and hartshorn were a luxury to the sense and a route to the imagination, we trust we could still derive from sympathy with the hearty enjoyment of such a gourmet and the innocent prattle of such a guest a new relish for the wine we sipped, or the fruit and even tipsy-cake we might rashly venture upon sharing with our infantine friend.

Purify the Blood.
It the blood be pure, the body, which is formed from and by the blood, can not be diseased. But if there be so much as a taint in any affection, such as a boil or ulcer, even a bruise, the blood circulating through that part takes up impure matter from the local affection and carries it into the general system. This is the cause often of sudden death to persons of full habit afflicted with boils and ulcers, and who use no medicine: the matter gets into the circulating system and chokes up the fine blood vessels which supply the brain with vitality, and life ceases as if Bereft by Lightning.
Now this can be remedied.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS
take all impure matters from the circulation, and save the person of health, soon curing local affections also.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS protect from tedious times of sickness and often save life. Sold by all Druggists.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
It was early in the spring of 1853 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a distressing cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation having for its base the inside bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine I have planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was wonderfully gratifying. Within twenty-four hours of the first dose was removed, the cough subsided, and a perfect cure was effected. Soon after I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, considered by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. It is now over three years since I advertised the virtues of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
"As a remedy for Coughs, Consumption the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled."—Boston Journal.
This great Vegetable Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the United States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and all pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel, and for piles and scurvy it will be found valuable.
Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

A LITERARY SENSATION!
THE NEW YORK WEEKLY (the leading Story and Sketch Paper of the age) is now publishing
A THRILLING STORY.
Half romance and half reality, entitled,

On The Border.
From the pen of America's gifted son,

Edmund Kirke
Author of "Among the Pines," "My Southern Friends," "Down in Tennessee," &c., &c.
The admirers of
EDMUND KIRKE
Are legion. His name is known wherever the English language is spoken, and his works have even been translated in almost every known tongue. The mere announcement of his name, therefore, as a contributor to the columns of the

NewYork Weekly
Ought to secure for that journal a million readers; but when we announce that in
ON THE BORDER
EDMUND KIRKE enters upon an entirely new field in the world of literature, that fact should lend every body to look after his

LAST AND GREATEST WORK.
The hero is
ON THE BORDER
In A REAL CHARACTER
And the work loses nothing in the way of interest from the fact that he belonged to that miserable class of Southern society,
THE POOR WHITES.
Although a living, breathing reality, the hero of
ON THE BORDER
Was the man who
SAVED KENTUCKY.
Words are inadequate to describe the interest which attaches to
ON THE BORDER.
The story, as a whole, is a mingling of romance and reality such as must enchain the attention of all classes, whatever their peculiar views may be. It is full of the most absorbing interest from the beginning to the end. Acts so heroism, hair-breath escapes, deeds of daring, and inimitable pen-portraits of character follow each other so rapidly that the reader has scarcely breathing time to jump from one to the other. We rank in the pages of romance of the exploits of Cooper's "Harvey Birch" and other fictitious characters, and are fairly carried away by them. But what must on the effect when we know the hero of whom we are reading once had on the "dark and bloody ground" "a local habitation and a name"—that he was a real character, and that what is set down concerning him is true? Every body must be deeply interested in this great story, and it is only necessary to say in conclusion that

The Great American Tea Company.
Always a Wholesale Establishment.
We have many inquiries (10 to 20 letters a day) asking what advantage we make to the Trade from our prices as published in the Price List. These are our lowest wholesale prices. We consider ourselves only a Wholesale Corporation, and we have but one price.
The way in which we can sell such packages at all was, that during the high prices of Teas we furnished parties with packages as are here pounds. Long lame spread far and wide; and parties with small means thought it very hard to be compelled to pay, elsewhere, about a dollar per pound more than we were asking the single cost for, simply because they could not afford to buy five pounds of us at one time. Therefore, in order to meet these objections, we concluded to supply their wants in quantities as small as one pound at the wholesale price.
Parties of small means wishing for goods to sell can have their orders filled in small packages to suit their trade, but we can not make any reduction in price, as we charge for the small packages as we charge for larger amounts. Now are two extra fine per pound.
To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.
1st. The American factors in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the best retired merchants in this country are so made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange for the large volume of Teas.
3d. The Importer makes a profit of 20 to 50 per cent. in some cases.
4th. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser buys in large quantities—some of them 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.
5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer at from 5 to 10 per cent.
6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in the Jobbing trade, at a profit of about 10 per cent.
7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.
8th. The Retail Dealer sells to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.
When you are added to these eight profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.
We propose to contract with these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on the average, will not supply pay us.
Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them at the very lowest prices direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of the Trade. They are not at Unique Prices, but same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.
All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction. ☞

ELLIPTIC SEWING MACHINE COMPANY'S HIGHEST PREMIUM

Lock-Stitch Sewing Machines.

Incomparably the best for Family Use.

Office 629 Broadway, New York.

THEIR SUPERIORITY VINDICATED BY THE HIGHEST AUTHORITIES.

GOLD MEDAL. Fair Maryland Institute, 1866.
All the Highest Premiums at the Maryland Institute, New York and Pennsylvania State Fairs in 1866, over Sewing Machines, except one Receive no $ Manufacturing Machine at the New York Fair.

WERE AWARDED

After a most severe and thorough test, to the Elliptic Lock Stitch Machine, as follows

At the Maryland State Institute Fair:

"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE."

And at the New York State Fair as the

"BEST FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,"

"BEST DOUBLE THREAD SEWING MACHINE,"

(Practically speaking all the premiums),

And for the

"Best Example of Sewing Machine Work."

As can be seen by the following comprehensive and conclusive report of the Committee of practical and experienced mechanical experts appointed by the State Board to investigate into the merits of the different Sewing Machines:

"We, the Committee on Sewing Machines, after a careful and thorough investigation into the respective merits of the various machines submitted for examination, find the Elliptic Lock-Stitch Sewing Machine to be superior in all other to the following points, namely:

"Simplicity and Thoroughness of Mechanical Construction.

"Ease of Operation and Management.

"Noiselessness and Rapidity of Movement.

"Beauty, Strength, and Elasticity of Stitch.

"Variety and Perfection of Attachments and Range of Work.

"Completeness and Beauty of Model and Finish.

"Adaptation to material of any thickness by an Adjustable Feed Bar, and in the Unequaled Precision with which it executes the Lock-Stitch, by means of the Elliptic Hook, and we therefore award it the First Premium as the

BEST FAMILY SEWING-MACHINE,

And also for the above reasons the First Premium as to

BEST DOUBLE THREAD SEWING MACHINE.

"E. PETERS, "Committee.
"HECTOR MOFFAT,"

The above report fully accords with the almost unanimous opinion of the best mechanical judges and Sewing Machine experts, as well as of all others who have used the machine named above, which is incomparably the most simple in construction; the most efficient in operation; the most easy, rapid, and noiseless of movement; the most economical and durable in use; and the most complete in variety and perfection of its attachments for every kind of work, and therefore infinitely the most valuable Family Sewing Machine. Its purpose is superiority is prominent and unquestioned.

Machines stitched on exhibited for two years to be awarded to any part of the world, with printed instructions (which will enable any one to operate them without the slightest difficulty) for use, on receipt of the price in cash or draft, or they may be sent, C. O. D., payment to be collected on delivery, on receipt of satisfactory evidence that I will have to be made; and all orders from a distance will be as faithfully filled as if a personal visit is made and orders given.

IN AID OF THE

HOME AND SCHOOL

FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF

The Destitute Children

OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THE HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1860 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union: its sphere of usefulness is constantly increasing; the children now numbering over 150; and daily are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied, solely for want of room to accommodate them. The old and unsuitable building (on Fifty-eighth Street, New York), now occupied, cannot be reserved for the reception of such a Home as recent experience and this call is made upon the public with a firm belief that the Patriotism and Generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the little ones, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, which shall stand in the cause of humanity as a fitting rebuke to the trite assertion that "Republics are ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

Mrs. General Ulysses S. Grant, President.	Mrs. Harvey G. Law, Manager.
Mrs. Chas. P. Daly, Acting President.	Mrs. J. J. Van Dalsem, Manager.
Mrs. Major-Gen. J. C. Fremont, 1st Vice-President.	Mrs. W. Gemmell.
Mrs. Robert Forster, 2d Vice-President.	Mrs. James Gillies.
Mrs. John S. Vosburgh, Treasurer.	Mrs. C. Mallers.
Mrs. David Hoyt, Secretary.	Mrs. Wm. Mallen.
Mrs. Wm. S. Hillyer, Corresponding Secretary.	Mrs. Henry Bayer.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

The undersigned desiring to express our sympathy and unite our efforts with the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, located in the City of New York, do most cheerfully co-operate with the Ladies composing the Officers and Managers of that Institution as a Supervisory Committee in conducting "FAIR AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL."

Major-General Van Vliet.	Brevet Brigadier-General James F. Hall.
Major-General Fred. C. Barlow.	Judge James P. Daly, Ch'n of Committee.
Brigadier-General John Cochrane.	Jno. H. Wirtz.
Brigadier-General Wellman Hall.	G. F. B. Hoyt.
Brigadier-General Rosa C. Hawkins.	J. H. Pulsifer.

The following card will be fully appreciated by the public, as it receives the thanks of the Institution:

"To the Managing Directors of the Festival:—Sympathizing with your object, I take pleasure in tendering you, gratuitously, my professional services on the occasion of your Festival. THEODORE THOMAS."

The FAIR will open on the 16th of December, and continue two weeks, at the PUBLIC HALL, corner of Broadway and Twenty-third Street, NEW YORK. To be concluded by the

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

With the Compound Concentrated Fluid Extract of Valuable Medicinal Roots and Herbs.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

HAS PRODUCED

A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal minded and scientific to cures which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any medicine.

RAPIDITY O' CURE.

Some say "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: "In health, the body, like a well-built house, is in a state of dynamic equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is required is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD and for all hereditary diseases transmitted from parent to child.

PARALYSIS.

It is an universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is empathically the great life-giving power.

DYSPEPSIA.

Indigestion, Weight at Stomach, Flatulence, Liver Complaint, Want of Appetite, Bad Breath, Constipation, Biliousness.

SCROFULA.

IMPEACHMENT AND GENERAL BUTLER.

A PRESIDENT of the United States should be impeached only when his guilt is so evident that the country has virtually settled him before he is tried; or when the revelations of his secret abuse of power are so overwhelming that they carry persuasion to every mind. The reasons are obvious. An impeachment of the Executive officer in the midst of fierce political differences would necessarily produce an excitement which should not be hazarded for any but the most conclusive considerations.

There have been many rumors of an intention of impeachment at the present session. But nothing is clearer than that the country has not demand that the President shall be impeached for any thing which he is known to have done. If there are secret plots and conspiracies and hidden Executive attempts, they are yet to be exposed. If they are known, it is the duty of those who are cognizant of them to bring them to the knowledge of Congress, which would then undoubtedly and decisively act. But the general grounds upon which the proposition is made are untenable, and are so judged by the country. We are, therefore, not surprised to see that General LOGAN, who is a member of the next Congress, and who was said to be preparing articles, has expressly stated the truth in the report; and Mr. BINGHAM, of Ohio, who was declared to be ready to begin impeachment at the opening of the present session, is equally decided with General LOGAN in his denial.

General BUTLER, a member of the next Congress, is very strenuous in urging that the President ought to be arraigned. General BUTLER is a man whose great services in peculiar exigencies of the late war are undeniable. He is a man of unusual ability and resolution, and he would probably be the last man to deny that a gentleman who should claim to be a candidate for Congress from a district in which he had taken but a summer residence will never offend modesty. As an adroit and successful jury lawyer General BUTLER'S eminence is conceded; while General Reid and Fort Fisher and the James River campaign are willingly forgiven by the generous public heart to the military Governor who turned rebellious New Orleans, who preremptorily hung rebels upon proper occasion, and who has not ceased to befriend the colored citizen and claim for him every where equal rights.

Yet General BUTLER does not seem to us to be the wisest national counselor at this time. He is emphatically a man for an active revolutionary epoch, the interregnum of law. In a reconstructive period like this, it is not only essential that a public counselor should be very sagacious and patient, as Mr. LINCOLN was, but that his character should inspire the fullest public confidence, as Mr. LINCOLN'S did. The moment self appears, the instant that personal ambition is suspected, the power of the man is gone, and his counsel becomes merely a matter of curious observation and criticism. The people no longer recognize in him their representative, but they feel as if a clever manager were using them for his own advantage.

Now, is it doubtful that the general impression of General BUTLER is that of a shrewd and blunt upon personal success, who will ride any horse that promises to bring him in? As he is reported to have said of himself, a man who voted a thousand times for JEFF DAVIS for President in the Charleston Convention of 1860 is a man who will dare any thing; and we doubt whether many officers in the service would have been found who, after the share which General BUTLER had in the closing campaign of the war, and who had been even contemptuously mentioned by the commanding General, would have gone home and made the speech which General BUTLER made at Lowell. That he is determined under all circumstances to hit with his feet and will never say die is indisputable. But with all the popular admiration which General BUTLER'S pluck naturally commands, we doubt if there be a corresponding confidence in his wisdom.

In his late speech advising impeachment the General leaned much upon the precedent of the impeachment and conviction of Judge HUMPHREYS of Tennessee for the words of a speech urging the State to secede. But even allowing that "words" may justify impeachment, is it wise to proceed upon them except in a case where the words plainly express something more than ill-temper? The President has spoken contemptuously of Congress, but he has constantly recognized its authority. Shall he be impeached for saying that he considers it an unlawful assembly if he consistently treats it as a lawful power? Is it desirable that passionate words shall suffice to impeach a President?

The other points of the General's argument seem to us as unwise and insufficient as this. All his political friends agree with him that the President is the obstruction of the situation. They agree with Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS that it is foolish to suppose that the President understands, or could understand, the principle which elected him, or the real purpose of the people. A narrow and passionate man is unquestionably a dangerous executive officer, and the country has been taught that the White House must be closely watched. But we have no right to hang an ill-favored man for murder because we fear he may pick somebody's pocket. The law must be satisfied with overt acts, or, in extreme cases, as in that of Judge HUMPHREYS, by words, when, in a quasi or actual state of war, words are deeds of treason. But that is precisely what the President's are not. He has been upon all sides of the problem of restoration. At different times Senator SUMNER and Mayor MOORE of Boston are equally satisfied with him. His utter inconsistency convicts his intellect, but it pleads against the assumption of subtle and sinister design. General BUTLER will always make a bold and interesting speech, but he will hardly persuade the country that the President ought to be impeached at present, however ready he be one hereafter; and we doubt if the General stands as the representative of the spirit which will compose the great difference. Because he is radical for the settlement will be radical; but because of a certain sensational quality which is felt not to belong to wise statesmanship.

THE TRAGEDY OF IRELAND.

NOTHING reveals the huge folly of a great people like the English, priding itself upon being practical, so plainly as the condition of Ireland. In the one part of the island every Englishman loses his wits. Having conquered and subdued Ireland, it was the most obvious and simple duty of England to make the best of it, and she has always seemed to be the worst. Instead of blending the people as much as possible with the English, the British policy has always labored to keep them distinct and apart. Irish trade has been enslaved; Irish industry has been oppressed; the Irish land is held by absentees, who have no love of the country and no other change in it than their rents; while Irish Catholics have had another church established among them by law; the country has been ruled by a regent; nor is it possible to name one truly wise or generous public measure ever adopted by England to reconcile the people of a foreign race and religion to the supremacy of their conquerors. Ireland has always seemed to have been the angry thorn in the English side, and there seems to be little doubt that a fresh disturbance has either occurred in that country or is very imminent.

An armed rebellion is altogether too serious and sad a thing to be the text of a jest, or we should be inclined to ask what the London Times and other British newspapers mean by declaring fiercely that the rebellion in Ireland must be "stamped out." May not "a gallant and chivalrous people strike for their imperial race?" and is it not perfectly clear that if England undertakes to quell a rising in Ireland it is merely a struggle in which one side "is fighting for dominion and the other for independence?" But in the midst of real war such recrimination is ghastly. Nothing could be more contemptible than the British attitude toward this country during the late war, and nothing more stupid than the British reasoning and conclusions upon its causes and consequences. But that does not change the evident fact that it is desirable for civilization and humanity that an armed Irish insurrection should be suppressed. For no man can seriously believe that if it were successful the condition of the Irish people would be improved.

Neither the moral nor intellectual nor industrial condition of the Irish people are such as promise a wise and safe government. Nor are the peculiar qualities and methods of the Irish leaders who are known to the public such as to inspire general confidence that they would produce untold suffering of every kind, but there can not be the organization nor the arming nor the money which are necessary to struggle against the whole force of the British empire, which would be relentlessly employed. He is not a true friend of Ireland or Liberty here or elsewhere who encourages the Irish race to aim at the redress of their grievances by force. The only hope of Ireland is in the great liberal party of England; and even if the Church of the Irish should be an insuperable barrier to a union of political action, yet the true liberals of England would undoubtedly pursue a policy for Ireland which would tend to heal the terrible sore.

It is high time that sensible Englishmen should understand that the judgment of the whole civilized world holds its management of Ireland in amazement and utter condemnation. Every thing generous and sagacious which England advocates is irreparably injured by her conduct toward Ireland. Can not such an intolerable preacher practice a little? Of what value is the counsel to good government of a Power which utterly and grossly misgoverns a part of its own immediate possessions? England is dwindling in influence because of her conspicuous incapacity to grapple with her domestic problems. She is teaching all other nations to despise her, and she should take great care that she does not become despicable to her own children. The Tory youth of Oxford may vote JOHN BRIGHT to be a dangerous fellow. But while they are cultivating elaborate ecclesiastical forms, and parading in outrageous sacred vestments, let them remember that those who cried against STEPHEN, "Stone him to death!" were the children of those who crucified his Master.

KING CORPORATION.

THE paper recently read in Boston by Mr. JOSIAH QUINCY upon the injury done to the trade and prosperity of that city by the management of the Western and Worcester railroads in Massachusetts has excited a great deal of attention every where. And this is not surprising, for the whole subject of railroad management is attracting universal attention, and the facts which Mr. QUINCY stated were very striking and instructive. The Western and Worcester railroads are the great avenue between the West and the Atlantic sea-ports. And the accommodation is so limited and the rate of transport so large that they seriously impair the practical value of the highway. The apparent interest of a railroad company is always to charge the most for the least service, and to be as impervious as possible to all arguments which tend to show the necessity of constant renovation and enlargement; and, according to Mr. QUINCY, Boston is being sacrificed to this stubborn and false conservatism.

It appears upon an examination before the Massachusetts Legislature last winter that the Worcester Railroad, which is the continuation of the Western from Worcester to Boston under another name, has been added to the number of its cars for the last fifteen years. The Worcester Road replied that it was the business of the Western Road to supply cars for the through freight. Thereupon the Western Road did not retort that it had provided the cars, but that the contract to do so could be terminated with the Worcester Road within ninety days. To this the gentleman who was giving evidence before the Committee replied that between the two roads the necessary facilities were not supplied. Mr. QUINCY'S remedial suggestion is, that the State shall buy the road and lease it to the city of Boston.

This is a right construction by the charter of the road to the State; for when the road was undertaken such enterprises were new, and their possible power, which experience has every where developed, was unseen; and the State wisely chose to retain the final control by providing for the purchase of the road upon specific conditions. The scheme, indeed, has already embarked in the railroad business, It owns the Hoosac tunnel, which has already cost an enormous sum, and has some three or four miles of road to pierce before the road contemplated can be built and any return received. The Hoosac Road is designed to connect Troy, in New York, with Boston, by the way of the Deerfield Valley and Greenfield, in Massachusetts. It would be a Northern line competing with the present Western, which passes through the centre of the State. Mr. QUINCY'S proposition, therefore, is that the State shall be the chief railroad corporation within its own limits.

It is fairly questionable whether this is the fittest remedy. It is, however, purely a matter of experience and of public convenience. Some method must be devised of emancipating the country from the tyranny of these vast corporations. Mr. J. C. K. FORREST, in a communication to the Chicago Times, of which we may have hereafter something to say, remarks: "WILLIAM the Second broke the Northern in the hollow of his hand to-day, so far as the commerce of this part of the Union is concerned. CORNELIUS VANDERBILT, and one or two others, will pocket the Empire State. New Jersey was long ago bought up by Camden and Amboy, which latter institution has been the State for nearly a quarter of a century. Pennsylvania is ruled by its great Central Railroad Company—and so I might proceed ad infinitum." This is a truth of which the country is rapidly becoming conscious, and the political consequences are inevitable. But to substitute the State for a private Corporation seems to be merely exchanging one evil for another. The remedy is not immediately evident, but forewarned is forearmed. The difficulty is not a but too hard for the national wit to crack.

A NECESSARY LAW.

THE peril of unbounded Executive patronage is so great, and the Constitutional provision upon the subject is so plain, that we hope there is no doubt of the regulation of the matter by precise law during the present session. Mr. TRUMBULL'S bill of the last winter, or a substitute, should be again offered, and the reasons which prevented its passage then we do not believe now exist. The point to settle is, that no office nominated by the President shall enter upon its duties except after confirmation by the Senate.

At present, if the President nominates a person and the Senate rejects him, the President has only to wait until the Senate adjourns, when he may appoint him to hold over to the end of the next session of the Senate, when he may again appoint him. In this way the intention of the Constitution is directly defeated, and the President virtually dispenses with the Senate. This is a subject which should be settled at once, nor can it demand much discussion. Every American citizen is interested in the reduction of the Executive patronage, which tends to exaggerate the Executive power to a wholly disproportionate degree. Every party is equally interested; for the defection of one man who happens to be President will throw the whole power of the Government patronage against the party which is in power, and so thwart the intention of the people.

The present Executive patronage is not merely a direct but an indirect power. A President who desegs his party not only rewards his late opponents, but arouses the people he leaves repudiated in his own election, but he demoralizes the party which he leaves. This was the undoubted political intention of President JOHNSON and his advisers. They hoped by retain enough Union men in office to weaken and break the Union ranks, while they fed enough of the opposition to whet their appetite for more. The failure was signal; but the vigorous of the conspicuous office-holders who gave themselves to the work will not be forgotten, and the danger of the experiment is none the less evident.

It seems to us, also, that the tenure of many, and probably of most, of the offices might be safely changed. There is no good attainable reason, although those of party are as plenty as blackberries, why the term of office should not be long enough to overlap the Presidential election. The fact that nobody would obviate the party interest of officers in the Administration which appointed them, but it would tend constantly to weaken it, and to make capacity count more as a qualification for office. The difficulty with a life-tenure of public office is its tendency to indolence and inefficiency. A very honest man may grow old in a safe sensatious an officer that the public might demand his removal for inefficiency. But if such a petition were to be sufficient ground of removal, the party in that event would be made to bear the load.

The subject requires prompt action to remedy an increasing and perilous evil.

CHICAGO TRIUMPHANT.

IT would be hard to find a more characteristic illustration of the vigor and resources of the American character than the city of Chicago. The colonel Fifty years is yet young in the city is one of the most important and flourishing in the country. The natural difficulties of a situation, much more a few inches above the Lake, are evident. How shall the city be drained? How shall it secure good water? How shall it obviate the inconvenience of innumerable drawbridges across crowded thoroughfares? These were questions early encountered by Chicago, and one by one they are being answered as becomes such a city.

The last work is the Lake tunnel. This work is intended to supply the city with pure water, and is one of the boldest, simplest, and successful of great engineering projects. The plan was to tunnel under the Lake, and two miles to a shaft or crib sunk from the surface at that distance from the shore. Every other effort had failed, and when this project was proposed, there was great doubt of its practicability even among eminent engineers. The proposals for doing the work varied from $239,548 to $6,066,000. Mr. CHESTER HAIRE, of the city of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, obtained the contract for $315,139, and guaranteed success. On the 17th March, 1864, the ground was broken and the work proceeded steadily for two years and eight months. The length of the tunnel is two miles, seven feet, and a few inches; the diameter in the centre five feet and two inches, the existence width five feet. The actual cost of the tunnel and machinery when ready for service will be about $600,000, and its capacity will allow the supply fifty-seven gallons a day to a million persons. The contractors, who did the work in the most conscientious manner, have lost heavily; but it is not to be supposed that the city will hesitate to reimburse them.

On Saturday night, November 24, the work from the land side had been pushed to within two feet of the outer portion. On the next Tuesday the Mayor of the city when the work was begun went with a party of his friends to the lake end of the tunnel, and, descending the crib, made their way to the thin partition, while the present Mayor, with a party entering at the shore end, were upon the other side of the partition. At the proper moment the workmen dug the remaining earth away, and so exact was the calculation that there was but a difference of a few inches in the line of the excavations. As the parties were revealed to each other the bells of the city broke into joyful peals, the cannon thundered, and Chicago congratulated herself upon her latest triumph. The forcing machinery is not yet finished, and the water will not be received in the city until the spring.

It is now proposed to tunnel the river at the various crossings in the city, and the experiment is already begun. At a point upon the south branch of the Chicago River, where it is one hundred and eighty feet broad, a tunnel is now building consisting of three passage-ways, the middle one for pedestrians, the two outer ones for carriages. The length will be nine hundred and forty-five feet, and the floor of the tunnel under the centre of the river will be thirty-two feet below low-water-mark. The work is to be finished in March, 1868. Should this undertaking succeed the river will be left perfectly free for navigation, and the intercourse between the different parts of the city will be entirely unimpeded.

Such works as these are matters of local convenience but of national pride. Every American is refreshed and stimulated by seeing what American genius is every where doing; and happy will be the day when, pouting and sulking no longer, the people of the Southern States shall enter upon the generous and glorious rivalries of industry and ingenuity with all other Americans.

A CHEERFUL VIEW.

FROM a private letter to a friend, not intended for publication, we make the following very interesting extract. It is a cheering word among so many that are discouraging; and it points the evident moral of the situation, that the secret of reconstruction lies in harmonious relations between all the people in the Southern States. The whole country will be agitated just as long as a vast part of the free population are virtually regarded as serfs. The letter is from Mississippi:

"I am at my old business—growing cotton. My former slaves all returned to me, and as many more. I have located on me some three hundred years away from my dwelling, where they live as happily as they please. Your leading lands upon shares, and have worked slowly through the season. They have made fair crops, and all are well contented and expect to remain another year. I have had no trouble with them. They have been sober and obedient, and have manifested as much pride in themselves upon a small quality with my family.

"I made my private contracts with them without any Bureau aid. Not because I was prejudiced against that office, but simply because there was no such piece of furniture in the county. The country here is quiet. We have no demagogues among us, and we feel ourselves from the events of the old Union. The negro, or freedman, is a helpless, passive creature, and is entitled to our commiseration and pity. Certainly I should regard it as a most heinous crime to cheat or oppress him. I am no reconstructionist, per se, by a long sight. I always owned slaves; always was opposed to the institution. Was opposed to secession; but I love my home and lie in swamps to keep from taking up arms; and I thank God this day that, through many sacrifices, my hand is unstained or untainted by any touch of rebel weapon. Unionism is not popular here, but there is no disturbance. In different neighborhoods very different sentiments prevail. People have gone to work in good earnest, and it would be quite difficult matter to get them into any broil with the Government. The President is very popular here. So is Mr. SEWARD.

"Lands are cheap here, and it is a great country to make money. The prosperity is rolling in on us like a flood. There will be more cotton made than our presses think. Ten and a half millions certainly to a minimum limit. Labor is scarce and dear. My freedmen, working as tenant laborers, do about two-thirds work, not more. They are too young a freedom yet to be fully stimulated by it.

"Excuse this hurried letter. It is private. Send down your working-men among us."

CAPITAL AND THE SOUTHERN STATES.

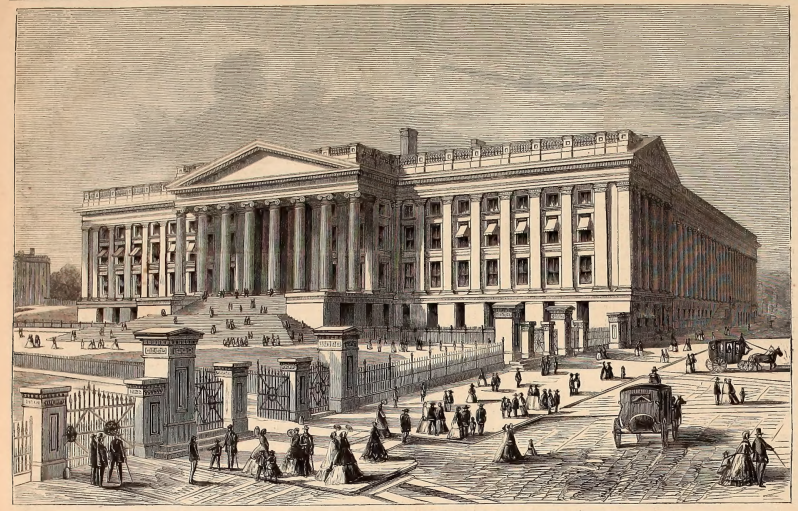
IF there are persons in the Southern States who imagine that upon the situation, capital must see that the cardinal necessity of their present condition is the influx of capital to engage the industry and develop the resources of the whole region. That capital is ready, is expected to have been actively employed long before this, and so it would have been but for the conduct of the President, whom the disturbed States seem to consider their best friend because he has profoundly petplexed and delayed the problem of restoration. The election has shown that the capitalists and the South that they have been grossly mistaken. In the game of President against the People they entirely miscalculated, and have wholly lost. The only remaining hope of the President is persistency is prolonged confusion and postponement of restoration, the end of which will be prolonged sorrow and poverty to the unrestored region.

The Southern leaders who advise a sullen passivity, and their Northern allies who cry Amen, and who publish as they work abroad the war. It is one thing to retire to the magnificent solitude of a luxurious country house, but it is quite another to become an Orson out of spite and subsist on choke-berries. The leaders who advise "the South" to persist in its present attitude conveniently forget to mention the material view of the case. The theory that the States are just as well off out of the Union as in it might have an air of truth if it were affirmed of a small, rural, prosperous State like New York, in the midst of peace. But it is an evident falsehood when applied to States which have been scourged and skinned by war. For such a State to betake itself to political pouting is to try to live upon fog and the east wind. The nature of man and of society, the laws of trade and commercial welfare, remain the same, and such a state is virtually paralyzed until it renews her relation to the Union.

The reason is obvious. It is what we have already mentioned, that capital must be regular and lucrative, and all the resources of a State in process of profitable development, before the State will languish and decline. Mr. WADE HAMPTON, therefore, and all who agree with him, are just as wise as a club of stiff old Tories at the end of the Revolution, who should have sworn at all their pigeons that they were still subjects of Great Britain. If they had undertaken government upon their colonial theory, the event would have been laughable until it was tragical. Now "the South," as a political idea which is still the dream and hope that haunts Copperheads, can not possibly revive except with the overturning power of the unrepresented States. But with that power the strongest how that power can return without internal tranquility and activity: how they can have either without capital: and how they can obtain capital so long as Mr. WADE HAMPTON's ideas prevail?

Indeed, there is no more ridiculous figure conceivable than that very person. He is an American and a citizen of the United States. He has no other nationality, and except by exhibitation can not have any other wish for the good of his National Government, the only one he has ever known, as a foreign power, and of his geographical section of his native land as his country. He might as well hope for a fish-question his country. So long as the counsels of so foolish a man prevail the State in which he lives will stagnate and be unsafe, and not until the people of the Southern States perceive that industry and education are the true springs of prosperity, will they invite the capital, and respect and protect the labor, which can alone repair the waste of war and slavery.

MARTELLE.



THIS new parlor game possesses the attractive features of croquet, ten-pins, and billiards combined, and is played in-doors, and played. The game is got up in elegant style, and can not fail to prove a popular novelty for the approaching holidays. We learn that it is to be issued at a public sale next season, and have no doubt but that it will supersede croquet.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

OPENING OF CONGRESS.

THE second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress opened December 3, in Washington. Both Houses were thronged at an early hour. One hundred and forty-six members of the House were present. But new members were sworn in: Messrs. Campbell, Archer, Randall, and Cresswell, of Maryland; Mr. Chanler to Green C. Smith; Elijah Hise, successor to Geverly Tucker, and Governeur R. Hise, who had three ore from Kentucky. A Committee was appointed to wait upon the President and they Mr. Wadsworth, Mr. Eliot, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill repealing the Reconstruction acts, the "so-called pess rebellion, etc.," of July 17, 1862, known as the Confiscation act, and the Freedmen's bill as given to the President. As the power to pardon all offenses against the United States Government is by the constitution expressly and solely vested in the President, it is difficult to see what the necessary object is was ever admitted into the bill, and still more difficult to understand the motive of those who pressed it. See no sense deficnce of the Constitution. But the House passed Mr. Eliot's bill by a vote of 110 to 39. A resolution was adopted calling for information as to the arrest and escape of John H. Surratt. A bill was introduced and referred directing the sale of two millions of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury every thirty days; also a bill for the meeting of Congress on the 4th of March. A bill was introduced by Mr. Stevens for removals from office. It was made the special order for the day for the 17th inst. A bill was passed for the reference of Ohio, the Judiciary Committee was instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a mode of procedure in cases of impeachment. The President's message was laid before the House, but it was voted to postpone the reading till the next day, but the motion was lost.

The Senate was called to order by President Foster. After the preliminary proceedings Messrs. Fessenden and Nesmith were appointed the Committee on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President. Mr. Sumner moved to call up the Senate bill No. 1, an act to admit the loyal citizens of the District of Columbia. The motion to take up the bill was put, and carried. The Chief Justice, Hon. S. P. Chase, entered, and was conducted to the President's room. Mr. Chase returned, and announced that the President was ready to receive the Senate. Whereupon the President addressed the Senate and House of Representatives. The Senate then withdrew, the French Emperor has offered any exchange of territory with the United States Government has taken to have the understanding with the French Emperor that the withdrawal of the French Emperor has completed with his agreement to withdraw the French troops from Mexico. The question whether any number of said troops has been withdrawn, or has as yet agreed to withdraw or not withdrawn, the French Emperor has offered any exchange of territory with the United States Government has taken to have the understanding with the French Emperor that the withdrawal of the French troops

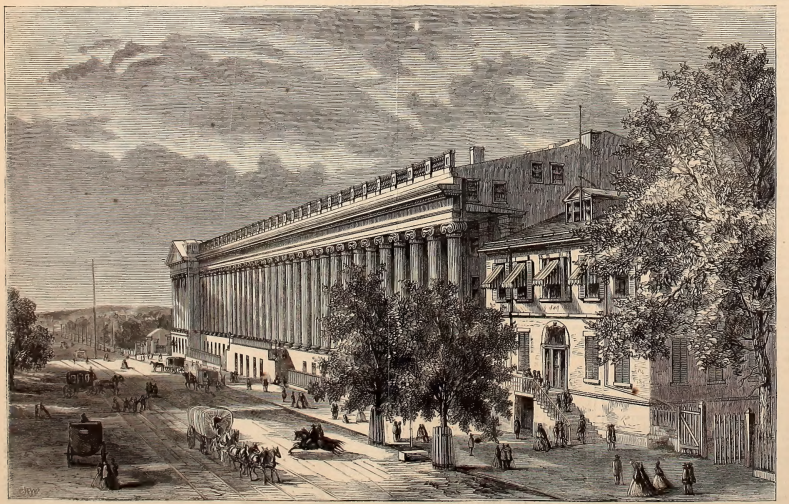
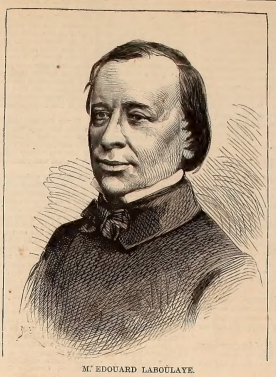
DOME OF THE NATIONAL CAPITOL.



ON our first page we give a view of the interior of the Dome of the new Capitol at Washington. We also give on this page illustrations of the State and Treasury Department buildings. The Dome of the Capitol is the most prominent external feature of the building. The edifice itself is but 69 feet in height; but above this rises the magnificent dome to the height of 241 feet, making the height of the entire structure 310 feet.

The old State Department building, of which we give a sketch, is on the corner of Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, and is now about to be removed to make way for the new structure. There are many interesting associations connected with this building. It has been the scene of Secretary SEWARD'S labors throughout the war, and of the presentation of Foreign Ministers for many years. It was here that SEWARD'S mysterious little bell rinkled so portentously to secessionists and their sympathizers. The Colonnade is a portion of the Treasury building, beyond which lies the Potomac.



The view given of the Treasury Department is from the southeast. It is a beautiful structure. The columns are magnificent granite monoliths, and the entire building strikes the beholder with an impression of solidity. It is an instance of the vigor displayed by the Government in prosecuting the public works that during the war the labor still went on. When Washington was first occupied by the National troops, the Treasury building, in common with some others, was barricaded and defended by cannon placed upon the steps under the façade.

EDOUARD LABOULAYE.

EDOUARD LABOULAYE, the most American of all Frenchmen, as he is styled in his own country, and whose knowledge of America is greater perhaps than that of any man in Europe, was born at Paris, January 18, 1811. He studied law and was admitted to the bar at an early age, having diversified his legal studies by learning type-setting in the printing establishment of his brother, CHARLES LABOULAYE. In the first book published by M. LABOULAYE, "A History of the Law of Real Estate, from Constantine to the present time"—an erudite work, which was published in 1839, and crowned by the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres—he is characterized as type-setter on the title page. This was followed in 1842 by a memoir of the celebrated jurist, FREDERICK CHARLES DE SAVIGNY. In the same year he became advocate in the Royal Court of Paris.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT AT WASHINGTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER.]

M. EDOUARD LABOULAYE.

In 1843 he published a work on the "Civil and Political Condition of Woman, from the Romans to the Present Time," which was crowned by the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences; and, in 1844, an "Essay on the Criminal Law of the Romans respecting the Responsibility of Magistrates," which was also crowned by the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres. In 1849 he was chosen a member of the latter academy, and in the same year was made Professor of Comparative Legislation in the College of France, a position which he still holds. Within the next ten years he published numerous works, among which may be cited "Contemporary Studies on Germany and the Slavic Nations," "Religious Liberty," "Souvenirs of a Traveler," "Studies on Literary Property in France and England," "Abdallah," and several volumes of "Moral and Political Studies," and translations of "Walter's History of Civil Procedure among the Romans," Loisel's "Instituts Contumiers," "La Contemiér de Charles VI.," "Channing's Social Works," Channing's "Slavery," etc. He also edited various legal works, and contributed largely to the "Révue de Législation et Jurisprudence," the "Révue Historique de droit Français et étranger," the "Journal des Débats," the "Révue Germanique," the "Révue Nationale," etc.

When the civil war in America broke out M. LABOULAYE was among the first to rank himself with the defenders of the North in Europe; and his name formed one of that brilliant galaxy—the Count DE GASPARIN, EDOUARD LABOULAYE, AUGUSTIN COCHIN, and HENRI MARITE—which will rival the constellation of LAFAYETTE and BEAUMARCHAIS in the eyes of posterity. He contributed numerous able articles on American affairs to the Journal des Débats, and commenced a course of lectures on American History in the College of France, which were fraught with allusions to current events, and which were crowded by the élite of Paris. Probably nothing contributed more to disseminate a true knowledge of American affairs among the French people than these brilliant lectures, which were the sensation of the day, and which form part of the author's "Political History of the United States from the first attempt at Colonization to the adoption of the Federal Constitution," just published. But M. LABOULAYE'S crowning work was the brilliant satire, "Paris in America," published in 1862—a work which displays an intimate knowledge of American manners and customs that would be marvelous in an American, and is doubly marvelous when it is remembered that the author has never visited America. The book met with unprecedented success, passing through seventeen editions in a few months. By the request of the author it was translated into English by Miss MARY L. BOOTH, of New York, the translator of MAURY'S History of France, who had translated his previous writings on America, and with whom he had maintained a correspondence since the beginning of the war.

During the continuance of the struggle, and, indeed, to the present time, the pen of M. LABOULAYE has never been idle; while the war lasted he labored to secure the triumph of the North, and since its close he has striven to insure the fruits of the victory, as the recent collective letter to the Loyal Publication Society, published on the eve of the late elections, and adjuring the nation to stand by Congress, abundantly proves. Nor is this all. Firmly persuaded that America possesses the true idea of government, it is his earnest endeavor to hold up its institutions as an example to be followed by France as soon as she shall have shaken off the incubus of imperialism. In a letter of recent date to Miss BOOTH he says:

"The influence of America is beginning to be powerfully felt in our journals. Before many years it will be evident that you possess the true political ideal. For my part I am aiding this movement to the best of my ability, not that I deludo myself so far as to believe that there is nothing human and imperfect in American institutions; but you have this great advantage, that the government among you is not a barrier and an obstacle every where to fetter the free development of the individual. I must tell you that one volume of my Political History of the United States—the history of the Constitution—has already been translated into Spanish at Buenos Ayres, and that a Peruvian is translating the first volume—the History of the Colonies—for Peru. It is somewhat singular that I should be used as a medium to make North America known to South America; but this is explained by Latin civilization—French books are always welcome to the Spaniards. My 'Paris in America' has also been translated at Buenos Ayres; in Paris it has reached the seventeenth edition. You see that if I have not Americanized my country it is not my fault."

M. LABOULAYE is as many-sided as GOETHE. Not only has he distinguished himself in forensic, historical, ethical, and humoristic literature; but for several years past he has amused himself by writing Christmas tales for children, of whom he is passionately fond, and which are marked by his characteristic brilliancy and originality. Wishing to become known to the young folks of America as he was already to their fathers, M. LABOULAYE some time since collected these tales, which were scattered through various books and journals, and sent them to MISS BOOTH that she might compile therefrom a Christmas book for America. This sparkling, and graceful collection of stories, edited under the eye and by the request of the author, and for which he has furnished an introduction, written specially for his young friends in America, will be published in a few days by the MESSRS. HARPER BROTHERS, of New York, under the title of "Laboulaye's Fairy Book." The selection of tales, as we have said, was submitted before publication by MISS BOOTH to the approval of the author, who says in response:

OUT OF MISCHIEF.

"I am delighted that my tales will be offered by you to the American public. The choice which you have made appears to me excellent, and I shall, like a good father, desire in seeing myself in an American dress. I am especially delighted that 'Abdallah' finds a place in this collection. This little tale cost me more than a year's study; there is not a detail therein that has not been borrowed from those volumes of Eastern travel; and I read the Koran through twice, a wearisome task, in order to extract therefrom a morality that might put Christians to the blush literally practised by Arabs. My little daughter, who is now five years old, and who is going to learn English, is very proud to think that her name will be known in America, and is resolved to have a copy of her own, which she shall have if she learns English."

The book it should be said, is dedicated to M. LABOULAYE'S grand-daughter, GABRIELLE. It is a charming offering to our young folks, and we are sure that they will all be grateful to our friend for thinking of them as well as of their fathers, and for making them this delightful Christmas present, which we hope a few days to put into their hands, and which we are sure that they will read with delight.

MEMORIAL TO WM. TYNDALE.

A CEREMONY of an interesting character, not merely to those who took part in it, but to Protestants generally, took place on Tuesday, November 6, at North Nibley, a village about two miles from Wotton-under-Edge, in the County of Gloucester, England. The ceremony was the inauguration by the Lord-Lieutenant of the county (the Earl of Ducie) of the memorial raised to the memory of WILLIAM TYNDALE, upon the summit of Nibley Knoll. TYNDALE, as most of our readers are aware, was one of the first translators into English and printers of the Bible, and it is generally believed that he was born, about the year 1484, in the parish of North Nibley. There are some persons who claim for Slimbridge the honor of being the place of his nativity; but this, we believe, no evidence is found to support the claim. Indeed, there is little beyond conjecture to guide any one in fixing upon the exact place of his birth, and in North Nibley two houses are indicated as the identical premises in which he first drew breath. The Black Horse Inn—an old building certainly, but, we should think, not of later date than TYNDALE—used formerly to bear an inscription setting forth that that was TYNDALE'S birth-place; but the inscription has now disappeared. TYNDALE spent some time at the University of Oxford, and afterward went to Cambridge, it is thought, for the purpose of profiting by the public lectures of ERASMUS. About 1522 he was living as tutor in the family of Sir J. WALSH, of Little Sodbury, and spent his leisure time in the translation of the Scriptures; but he was obliged to leave that neighborhood in consequence of the bitter persecutions to which he was subjected by the priests. On his departure he told one of his most violent opponents "that if God spared him, ere many years he would cause a boy that ploughs the earth to know more of the Scriptures than he did." Finding that there was no hope of printing and publishing his translations in England, TYNDALE went to Hamburg and Cologne, pursuing his work in secret; but he was discovered, and fled to WORMS. There, after for some time at Antwerp, and various attempts were made by his enemies to induce him to return to England, at COGNAC, where he was the English Ambassador there, worked against him, and at length TYNDALE was betrayed into the hands of the imperialists by the treachery of HENRY PHILLIPS, through the intrigues of two Englishmen, convicted of heresy, and was, on the 6th of October, 1536, strangled and burned at VILVORDE, near Brussels. After a brief sketch of the chief events in the life of TYNDALE; and a few years ago, some three centuries and a half after his martyrdom, it occurred to a few gentlemen who were living in the neighborhood of Nibley that a monument to his memory should be raised, and as no more fitting place for it could be found than the knoll which overlooks the property on which he is supposed to have been born. A committee was then appointed, a site for one was raised, the execution of the work was intrusted to MR. S. S. TYNDALE, architect, of Craig's Court, London, and on MR. TYNDALE, the foundation-stone was laid by Colonel BERKELEY, whose father (Earl FITZHARDINGE) had, jointly with the freeholders, placed four acres of land at the disposal of the committee. The memorial is a cenotaph, consisting of a square tower, 26 feet 6 inches square at the base, narrowing by gradations to 2 feet at the top, which on a cornice sustains a pyramidal roof, vaulted within. The tower is 113 feet in length, is ascended by a spiral staircase leading on to a gallery, whence, through large apertures, extensive views of the lovely scenery of the surrounding country can be obtained. It had been intended that the four cardinal points should be adorned with sculptures representing incidents in the life of TYNDALE; but for some reason or other this has not been done. The total cost has been £1550, and there is a debt remaining of about £300.

BURNING OF A FERRY-BOAT.

THE steamer Idaho, belonging to the New York and Brooklyn Ferry Company, was destroyed by fire on the evening of Monday, November 26, near the South Seventh Street dock in Williamsburg. She had left the dock at five minutes past 7 o'clock, and when she had proceeded about 500 yards the fire broke out, being occasioned by the upsetting of a large kerosene lamp in the "centre house," where the dock hands keep the watch. The lamp was lighted, and the oil took fire, communicating the flames to the sides of the boat, and climbing up to the cabins. It was at once discovered, many nerves of the engineer were disturbed that the danger began to be known. The engines were reversed immediately, the hose was pushed out and brought to play upon the flames, but it was too late either to return to the dock or to extinguish the flames. Fortunately not many persons happened to be on board, as it was early in the evening. If the Idaho had been going from New York to Williamsburg instead of from Williamsburg to New York, there would have probably been a thousand on board, and scores, if not hundreds, of persons would have been burned to death or drowned. As it was, with only 24 passengers, when the other ferry-boat, the Montezuma, came to the rescue, the latter was compelled to leave the vicinity of the Idaho, in order to save itself, leaving several unfortunates exposed to death by fire or water. The case of those left behind was almost a hopeless one. The few life-preservers to be obtained they jumped overboard, and were picked up at length by boats. But one was picked up at length by boats. But one was seriously injured, and it is terrible to think of what might have been the result under altered circumstances.

THE PLEBISCITUM AT VENICE.

THE plebiscitum, or voting by universal suffrage, for the annexation of Venice to the kingdom of Italy, took place on the 21st and 22d of October, the pretension of that city and its territory having been relinquished by Austria and handed over, through the mediation of a French Commissioner, to the custody of their own municipal authorities.

The people were called upon to express their wishes touching "their union to the kingdom of Italy under the constitutional monarchical government of King VICTOR EMANUEL and his lawful successors." If favorable to the union, they were to express such desire by answering "SI," which means "ay," or "yes;" if of the contrary opinion, by answering "NO." The 21st and 22d of October were the days appointed for the votes to be taken. Due notice was given, and the voting-places were crowded. On Sunday morning, the 21st, and throughout the day, Venetian walked about with a large "SI," printed upon a little square piece of paper, stuck in his hat or in his button-hole, in the mutual of voting and sympathy one of these tickets into the urn or ballot-box.

The tickets were collected and counted by the commissioners appointed for that purpose at the Doge's Palace, in the grand old hall where the Doges of Venice were formerly elected. The President was Commendatore TECCHIO, Judge of the Court of Appeal, a Venetian lawyer, who has, since 1848, been living in exile from his native city, and was one of the most distinguished members of the Chamber of Deputies at Turin in the time of Count CAVOUR. At the final sitting of the commission, on the 27th of October, when the returns of the voting from each of the several provinces of the Venetian territory had been received, the announcement of their almost unanimous result was received with loud applause by those present in the hall; and Signor TECCHIO came out upon the balcony, and as soon as the aggregate numbers had been verified, to proclaim the fact to the assembled multitude in the Piazetta below. This is the subject of our second illustration. It was a quarter before four in the afternoon. The people welcomed the appearance of President TECCHIO, and beheld reflecting daylight at Lucerne, Berne, or Interlaken. If you like the faces, well and good; if you don't, their tracking your heels so closely becomes wearisome. The only means of escape from such comrades is to stop somewhere for a week, and let the stream pass. The summer current will bring in a supply fresh from the inexhaustible springs of British life.

In this way, even before they entered Switzerland, my charmer's father had picked up Mr. Howard; while Mr. Howard had not the least intention to lose his hold of his new acquaintance. Hence their categorical meeting each other again at Thun.

The slightest possible shade of annoyance at her parent's partiality for his new-found friend overspread her face for an instant, and then she placed again at the landscape. Turning to me, she asked: "What is that mountain which stands before us—that dark green pyramid clothed at its base with thick forests and pine forest?"

"That's my mountain—my beloved Niesen. Every body loves the Niesen. 'All round the Niesen' is a toast as popular here as 'All round the Wrekin' is in Shropshire. Niesen is a favorite name to confer on dogs and railway locomotives. Every one likes the Niesen. I mount on his top the other day."

"Indeed! Isit possible?" Marie exclaimed, regarding me, in her innocence, as an Alpine hero.

"It is not only possible, but so easy that you can make the ascent if you choose."

"Really! I should enjoy above all things to be a" to say I had ascended a mountain."

After some discussion the gentleman agreed that the ascent should be made. "By the-way," he so-titled, "may I ask if you are Mr. Greenwood, of the firm of Greenwood, Dorkins, & Blake, Manchester?"

"And mine," said the Henry Carter, son of the late John Edmund Carter, formerly of Manchester, latterly of Liverpool."

"Really, I remember your father failed in my debt, giving a dividend of eight-and-sixpence in the pound."

"Yes, Sir, he did; and five years afterward paid you in full, with interest."

"True. I like an honorable man as he was. To think of meeting poor Carter's son in this way, by chance! He left you, I believe, not so very badly off?"

"I am told I am within my income."

"And you are strolling about here, I suppose, like the rest of us, with no definite purpose?"

"I am trying to put a little method into my trip by comparing, as my own private statistician, the respective merits of several well-known eminences which are reached on foot with no great exertion. I remember from one trip to another, and note on what pleases me best."

"The mountain under your arm is doubtless your guide-book. There are so many that it is difficult to choose between them."

"It is nothing so commonplace as that, but a resource for a rainy day or a leisure hour. It is the Mysteries of the Hôtels by Desbarolles, in which the science of Chiromancy is fully and seriously expounded."

"A revival or an old delusion. But I perceive you pry into futurity, one form of the folly is as good as another. They tell me a lot about it by-and-by; it is time now that we think of dinner."

At dinner I had the great satisfaction of securing the best seat by the opposite to me was Mr. Percy Howard, looking any thing but pleased at the favor I enjoyed. Indeed, I may now know to be her (afterwards) did not like him more than I did, and received his advances with undisguised coldness. I fancied I observed that the worldier fashion he was striving in his manner toward him, as if Mr. Howard paid too particular attention to the polish of the Hôtel de Bellevue within his reach. To the discussion of our Niesen project Mr. Percy Howard entered with open ears. It agreed that I should go forward to Wimmis, the village at the base of the mountain, to secure guides for the ascent, and that the little hotel at its top, and that they would drive there early the following morning to commence the ascent immediately.

Next day I bade a brief good-by to the father and daughter, and reached Wimmis, where every arrangement was speedily made. During the inn-gossip of the afternoon singular inquiries were put to me respecting the strangers then at Thun. I answered them as well as I could, but what in truth was uppermost in my mind was the expected arrival of Marie on the morrow.

The morrow came, and with it my new friends; but they were not alone. Mr. Howard had fastened himself upon them, and with him a gentlemanly young fellow enough, but one for whom—an unaccountable fit of his, whom I had noticed at the table d'hôte. As soon as he arrived he set off, myself alone with the rest of the party on horseback.

The ascent of the Niesen was glorious. Maria (by whose side I walked, telling her guide to proceed in advance) was in ecstasies at the harmony of sights and sounds, at the lowing of bells from cow and goats, with the stream of the Simme rushing below. Every turn of the path presented a new and fair picture for view. As we mounted higher all was repose; soft colors—shades of green and brown—only met the delighted eyes. The air was pure and balmy; our minds, elevated by the scenery, entirely forgot the low, the world, the city, city carriages, and the busy hum of men.

We met sledges laden with mountain cheese gliding down gently over the grass; we passed men carrying on their shoulders casks of wine and other provisions for consumption at the summit. We scaled, one after the other, the three separate masses which together constitute the Niesen. Near the top I rode on a rock, and was suddenly lost to my companion's view. Maria uttered a pretty little scream, half of surprise, to my self-importance. Soon returning I had the pleasure of presenting her with a handful of cream.

At last we reached the highest pinnacle. I make no attempt to describe the panorama it commands. It made me guess—even of my flying self, I believe, except each other's presence. We drank in with our eyes the mountains, the outspread lakes, the undulating streams. And then—and then—the Alpine air reminded our body that meal-time was approaching. The little hotel, crouching in a hollow not far from the top, opened its hospitable doors. We dined. While dining a cloud enveloped the mountain. So the summit inn had to be benighted with talk, in the course of which Mr. Greenwood referred to my studies in palmistry.

It was only natural that so obsolete an art should be disdainfully alluded to. Mr. Howard said he believed—

"Will you look at my hand by way of experiment?" asked the fine young gentleman, with a mixture of vanity and ingenuous confidence. "Tell me if you can, what it indicates."

I need not look at it; I have only to take it. I replied, passing his hand between my own. "Its character is apparent to the touch. Its objects, tendencies, and occupations may be summed up in one word—Firmness." The fine young gentleman withdrew his hand from mine, and turned as red as a fresh-boiled lobster.

"One minute longer," I said, resuming it. "There are also good points about it which only require exercise and development. There is no want of self-reliance. There is also right-mindedness and sense of duty which may one day get the upper hand of vanity and self-indulgence." The fine young gentleman, shabbed and thoughtful, resumed his seat without a word.

"What you read on this?" Mr. Howard asks, blushing slightly as she offered her hand.

"I read a good deal," I gravely replied, after carefully examining first one hand and then the other. "You dearly love all those about you; and, when you marry, you will dearly love your husband. But I see a willfulness which may compromise your happiness. You would risk a good deal, and might even sacrifice your real welfare, to have your own way in every thing. That is your greatest fault—the spirit of domination. But I see correcting influences. You will yield to your husband's will when it is right. The older other people's wishes as well as your own when you find them reasonable."

During this horoscopic speech Mr. Greenwood grew more and more attentive.

"You know a little, Maria nearly enough," he said.

"Let us now see what you will make of me." So saying he unbuttoned his left glove, and turned back his coat-cuff to display wrist and all. It was an honest, straightforward-looking hand, independent of any rules of palmistry.

"This hand," I said, "is one in ten thousand. In the first place, it is a hand of power. You may not be born with a silver spoon in your mouth, it very likely was not; but you have struck home at every you; when it threatens to hit you it glances aside. You very rarely turn your back upon a foe in the end. Your life will be long: your health good, as it ever has been. Intelligence has never succeeded in taking you by surprise; that is a fortunate thing, and you have it carried again only because you love your daughter and wish to please her.

"Any body can prophesy in that style," said Mr. Howard, sneeringly. "Drawing upon stock of the secrets of nature. There is little risk of making a blunder by supposing a young man is brilliant health and of good means to be. He is certainly; that is pretty girl should love her husband, after being loved by him; that as one matter, with the exception of consult, should like to have her own way, as I am sure we might; that a fortunate husband you have should be fortunate, which is equivalent to saying that prosperity is prosperous. Chiromancy like that is a farce. A piper of the Pifferari is as much or more. As to long life, continued health, permanent wealth, and all that, especially concerning it is to be put into a prediction when there is any wish to flatter a person, it is the very height of impertinence."

"If I had seen in those hands the reverse of what I did, I should not have hesitated to say so. Still, your criticism is not without some foundation. There is a seem to be making plausible guesses. That I have not looked by guess is easily proved. Let me see the hand I go by. I can quote you the rules it gives."

"Mere quackery; you will never convince me there is any thing in it."

"I am not myself convinced that there is. The responsibility rests with Desbarolles. He tells me that there is a hand which is essentially voluptuous, giving the love of luxury, of indolence, of ease, and of sensual pleasure. It is a plump hand, almost swollen; its thumb rises high and is short; its fingers are thick and end with no knots or irregularities of form. Its skin is white and glossy, looking as if dirt would not adhere to it, instead of sticking to it. Nails small, but not crippled; the palm is fleshy, the root of the thumb very largely developed. Is that the description of a beautiful hand. I think your friend's hand answers to it."

"And so does every lady's and gentleman's."

"Then," said Mr. Greenwood, "let us now see what our horoscope portends."

"No, indeed, the thing is too childish; it is to palm a joke upon a friend. I will not be responsible."

"At least by way of pastime," Maria pleaded.

"We ought all to take one turne," urged the plumpcheeked friend.

"Be it, then, as you please," said Howard, offering his hand with a very bad grace.

I looked at it for some time aghast; then took the other and subjected it to scrutiny. The middle finger quite up to the wrist: chances of imprisonment and great heavy tribulations. The mount of Mercury excessively developed: adroitness, not always restrained by scruples; skill in the arts of daily life, in writing and autography. Fortune, not to be counted on, and prompted you to take tracings of the signatures in the gentlemen's hands. Let me see."

"Ah, yes! I am completing a friend's collection of autographs."

The last, combined with the evil influence of the forked and crooked Line of the Head, might tempt you less easy on that point—especially where cash by means of forgery."

"But, Sir, there is a limit to pleasantry—"

"It is the book which speaks, not I. Here it is all, chapter and verse."

She had meanwhile the waitress of the hotel entered, and presented Howard with a letter of business-like appearance.

He opened and read it. For an instant he seemed surprised, and then a smile of satisfaction suffused immediately.

"How unfortunate!" he exclaimed. "How very sad a project I am obliged to leave your delightful society—"

"Not to-night, surely?"

"There is no help for it. My friend, Lord Castlemaine, is ill at Berne, and he suddenly taken ill, and begs me to join him at Briens as soon as possible. The worst of it is that, not only must I take myself from the table d'hôte at Thun, with the bulk of my baggage, all the cash not required for this little excursion—"

"That need not disturb you," said Mr. Greenwood. "I can let you have whatever you require."

How much will you like?"

"You are exceedingly kind. If we say ten pounds—"

"That is quite enough. You don't know when you may get back to Thun. Take twenty; or, we'll say three pounds more. I have you safe."

"No, no, my very dear Sir: no check. I thank you. I appreciate your kindness all the same: indeed I do. Ten pounds will be quite sufficient—quite."

"Yes; but my check-book: I had it a little while ago. It was in the pocket of my pelisse in the room where we washed our hands before dinner."

"Indeed, I linked," by an accidental mistake, it has found its way into Mr. Percy Howard's pelisse, being also a dark blue. I will distinguish that gentleman's pocket from its own usual resting-place."

"Your joke is a little too absurd," said Mr. Greenwood, tickled at the notion nevertheless, and handing with a smile a ten-pound note to Mr. Howard.

"Very much obliged," said the recipient. "But you, Sir," to me, "do you mean to insult me?"

"It is not an insult," I replied, "not yet a joke but a serious suggestion. Do, if you please, feel in your pockets, and try if you can not find it there."

"I shall do no such thing, Sir," thundered Howard, simulating virtuous indignation, and working himself into a shameful rage. "I can not be treated as a gentleman; and were it not for the lady's presence—"

"Softly!" I said. "The case is very simple. Mr. Greenwood's check-book is missing. Oblige us by helping us to find it. Search it has not wandered somewhere, quite by accident, of course. You have his ten-pound note; I am sure he has no wish to deprive you of it. Should you notice any odd thing this morning!—the man who carried my knapsack up the Niesen? He is an agent of the Swiss police. The man who led Miss Greenwood's horse, and afterward went on ahead to secure our lunch? He was making up a little additional evidence against a person about whom they already entertain grave suspicions. They are in the habit of using a moment's call. Shall we ask for their assistance to find the check-book?"

"Swear at it, Howard," said the plump-cheeked, with well-acted, because unblushing surprise. "Here it is! That I should have left it lurking in the room! I must have fallen from your coat upon mine, and worked itself in the hurry of dressing. I am truly sorry that such a blunder should have led to a moment's uneasiness. I am uncommonly delighted to have found it."

"And so am I," said Howard. "But allow me to hint that, however much we may regret to lose your company, the sooner you are in pursuit of your friend with you, and it might be prudent to change an air which is too sharp for you. Mr. and Miss Greenwood, as well as myself, will be sorry to see you—overlooked—to your room."

"You are probably right," he replied, unabashed. "I shall probably follow your friendly advice. The bill you do not require, I suppose? It is a lovely evening—bright moonlight—for a leisurely stroll down the Briens. I am not miles the path. I shall leave the horse here to return to Thun by the pretty at Wimmis; you can make use of it yourself to-morrow. I want no guide. Pray don't be beatitudinally added.

"I think you can do without either of them. They are probably engaged with the horses. Here you can leave by the front door of the hotel. The Swiss authorities like the things to go on smoothly had just as soon avoid any unpleasantness which might have the effect of alarming strangers. I think they would not be displeased if you left their jurisdiction without being detained by any untoward event—so-erected, for instance, by the secret police, as murder."

"I am sure you are most considerate. By-the-way, would you have the goodness to change this ten-pound note for French gold. It will be so much more handy."

"Most assuredly. Here it is."

"A thousand thanks. Good-night. I wish you all a very good night."

He left the room with a most graceful bow, without to look on his face or a falter on his tongue. He was gone. We looked at each other for a while in silence.

"Well, I never!" Miss Greenwood at last exclaimed. "Nor I, either," Maria's echoed her father.

"I suppose I have had a narrow escape from having the worth of my watch and my young epicurean quietly observed.

"But tell us," said Mr. Greenwood, "how you came to find out the gentleman's real character and avocations. It was not all chiromancy—eh?"

"Well, his real name, I had heard rumors at Thun. The Sunday evening I spent at Wimmis without for perusal a number of Galignani's Messenger, and kept me indoors. No doubt you have been haunted by the dreadful storm that evening; I was thankful to God Save the Queen. It would never flutter, as the first strain was over for the twentieth time, and it was the second week's turn to come on. Here are Victorious, Happy and glorious—I heard it taken up by a chorus of voices. What if it were the work of imagination? I opened the window. No, it was not. At the foot of the hill below, God Save the Queen is a popular air. When the chorus had died away, I left the window open, to enjoy the rushing sound of the Simme's waters, and the wind whispering among the fir-trees. My thoughts were running on any thing rather than Mr. Howard, when I suddenly became aware of his voice in solemn debate rose from immediately beneath the window. The landlord, and there was the Council of Village Notables assembled, standing in the open air in decorous order, in spite of the rain. One of the leaders was the landlord of the Inn. Among other things they discussed the expected presence of, and the measures to be taken with regard to, a mysterious stranger, who could be no other than our departed friend. The meeting ended and broken up, the subject was resumed in the public room. The landlord received forbearance and the avoidance of making any fuss, while another official advocate for the purpose of Switzerland of all scum whatsoever, broke wine-glass after wine-glass in honor of the toast. I was in a perfect fever to get to bed, and I did so. I was not long in bed before I was disturbed by the noise of a chest of drawers.

"Then," said Mr. Greenwood, "let us now see what our horoscope portends."

"No, indeed, the thing is too childish; it is to palm a joke upon a friend. I will not be responsible."

"At least by way of pastime," Maria pleaded.

"We ought all to take one turne," urged the plump-handed friend.

EVACUATION DAY.—PARADE OF FIRST DIVISION, NEW YORK STATE MILITIA.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.]

PAUL'S WIFE.

DR. VANDERPOOL was in a quandary. His brother Paul had died—handsome, extravagant Paul, always in difficulties, yet always beloved by every body, making money fast but spending it faster, and, of course, leaving not much behind him. Not much in the way of fortune, that is, but a good deal in the way of responsibility; for he left a widow and three children, the youngest a baby in arms. Dr. Vanderpool knew well enough that the income of small property there was would not more than clothe the four; and Paul's wife was an orphan, with no home to go back to. He knew, moreover, that she was as helpless as a child as to life. He remembered her well, though he had not seen her since her wedding-day, seven years before. He recalled the tender droop of the long lashes over her violet eyes—shy, sweet eyes that had beguiled Paul into matrimony, they and the baby smile the red lips wore.

Dr. Vanderpool himself had been proof against all such temptations. Shy eyes had brought, and bright lips smiled for him in vain. What wonder that he found it hard to forgive Paul for being weaker, especially since to his other weakness he had added this last one of dying? It was a hard case for the Doctor. He was rich, had a splendid practice, and was not infirm. Of course he could not see the wife and children of his only brother come to want; and what was more natural than that his with a great, handsome, well-furnished house, should receive them into it? He knew that the world would expect it of him, and he never tried to disappoint the world. Yes, they must come to him, for a while at least, that was certain—when they should have had time to get over the first shock of their terrible grief, and with them a little, it was possible some other plan might turn up.

So he wrote to Mrs. Paul, as he was in the habit of calling her. He hesitated a little about the beginning of his letter. Should he say dear sister? Somehow he could not feel as if there were any fraternal relationship between him and the pretty girl to whom he had said good-by on her bridal morning. Dear Mrs. Vanderpool—that was the cold, Dear Bessie—too familiar. He went back again to the "dear sister," and wrote it resolutely at the beginning of his letter. Poor thing! as soon as she is a brother to her, he thought—that would be easy enough, but it would be a wrong for the children. He had always indulged a secret hatred for babies, for that though he was. Of course he knew there must be children in the world—since the days of Adam and Eve there had been no such thing as coming into it full grown—they were necessary evils, of course, but he meant to have just as little to do with as possible. And now to have to take three of them under his own roof! He wrote on desperately, determined not to think what he was doing, and invited Paul's wife to come at once to his house as to her proper home. He would go for her if she wished—if she could add to her comfort. She must let him know her plans.

She wrote back a letter full of thanks. They could not quite know where they were, and she would accept his offer for the present most gladly. But he must not think for a moment of coming for them. The children were quite used to Kitty, their nurse, and she and Kitty could get along with them very well on the journey. She would make her arrangements as soon as she could, and write again to let him know when to expect her. It would probably be in about ten days.

Dr. Vanderpool read the letter with a sigh of resignation. He should be as bad as married; nay, as it he had been married years ago, for here were the three babies. Well, perhaps it was a righteous retribution for having lived selfishly, and neglected his duties to society. He seemed that he had got to do them, in spite of himself. Ten days—he was only, of freedom! Well, he would make the most of them.

It was autumn, and a healthy time. The Doctor was not so very busy, and he began to give a series of preliminary dinners. If there was one thing on which he prided himself more than another it was his little dinner-parties. He knew just how to make them pleasant. He never asked more than nine. His cook could have taught Professor Blot some things, and his wines were of the choicest. Not a man in town but praised his dinners, and was quite give up any other engagement to come to them. Of course, after Mrs. Paul's advent they would have to be stopped. Such things wouldn't answer in the house with a woman in deep mourning and her three children. So he meant to cut-train his friend all round before the invasion.

The last dinner came off on the tenth day after the receipt of Mrs. Vanderpool's letter. He had not heard from her again, so he thought he was safe. In this final effort he had outdone himself, and his cook had wrought miracles. Soup, fish, boiled, roast, entrées, sweets, and at last dessert and coffee and table. Muscat, Tokay, Chambertin, Canary, and White Hermitage for wines. Splendid black Hamburg grapes, and green Malagas clear as crystal, pears of every variety, nuts, and comfits.

"And all that the daintiest palate could wish," for the crown-jewel glory of Dr. Vanderpool's dinner was always the dessert.

They were just beginning to enjoy themselves, and the Doctor, sipping his wine, was telling his guests of the chance about to take place in his life —picturing himself domesticated with a wife whom he did not know, and children who would never call him father. And just as his delorous self-commiserations and his guests' laughter were at their height, a carriage was heard to stop in front of the house, and Dr. Vanderpool looked out of the window. He turned round, with consternation on his face:

"By Jove, gentlemen, she's come without a word of warning! Just like a woman. Make yourselves as merry as you can, and don't spare the wine. I must go."

So the Doctor vanished, and they heard his voice presently in the hall, and pure, sweet, clear tones answering him:

"You didn't receive my letter? I am so sorry! It will follow me, I suppose; and yet I sent it two days before I started. I was so afraid I have inconvenienced you by coming unexpectedly."

The sweet pleading voice, the shy, uplifted eyes, the fitting blushes, were not without their effect on Dr. Vanderpool.

"You know you are to fix that this is home," he answered, "and that you are always welcome, whether expected or not. Here is Mrs. Willing, my housekeeper, and she shall show you to your rooms, and then I will see you at the dinner—that is what you ladies like, is it not? By that time I will be ready to come to you in the drawing-room. So these are the children? Fie!"

"Yes. Little Bess is the eldest. She is almost six. Then there is Paul, and this baby in Katy's arms is your namesake—little Mark."

His thought she would tell them to kiss him, and he stood looking about it, and he began to think that, after all, she had more sense than he had expected of her. At any rate she was not the sentimental fool that if she had been plain; it would be something to have a pretty face at his fireside; and, save that she looked a little shy, she was just as pretty then as when she had gone away on the aforesaid bridal morning. He waited till Mrs. Willing had taken her in charge, supposing she was her comfortable, and then he went back to his guests.

But somehow he could not be as gay as before. As I said, he was not infirm; therefore man and, after all, Paul had been his brother, his only brother; and the child Bessie looked like a little mimicry of her father. He could not help but he should meet those bonny hazel eyes of hers unmoved. touched him, too, to see his sister-in-law in her deep widow's mourning, her young face so shadowed and saddened.

His guests felt the change in him, and did not sit so long. When they left the room for the drawing-room, but it was some time before Bessie joined him. He was very earnest in his inquiries after her comfort with Mrs. Willing. Had she had a good dinner? did she like her rooms? were the children very tired? what sort of journey had she had? She answered all his questions, but as the conversation began to languish, and the Doctor reflected how great a stranger Paul's wife really was to him, and wondered whether they had any tastes or any tastes and fancies in common. He was lugging forward subjects as industriously as he could, try to make her talk, when the servant came in, spending, full of secret uneasiness all the while about her darlings, away from her in this strange place, expecting her presently, and that was Katy would do her best. After a while she heard steps which she knew pit-a-pattering along the hall, and the door opened and Kitty, the little Scot.

"Please, mamma, Paul won't say his prayers to Katy, and Mark won't stop crying, and Katy says he's tired with you. And I've tried to get on without you, but somehow we couldn't."

"Yes, dear, I'll come. Brother Mark, it seems selfish to turn your children out of your room, but I know all this confusion will trouble you."

"Say no one thing more to trouble me, and that is for you not to feel at home, and to be always worrying for fear I was disturbed."

He spoke so earnestly that she must come, he really wanted her to be happy.

She was gone an hour, and when she came back she reported that the children were asleep except Bess, and she was the family old lady, and would give us trouble. Then Dr. Vanderpool ventured—though half afraid of hurting her feelings—a question about Paul, and found that she seemed to consider it a relief to speak of him. She told him all about their life, how he gave himself up to grief and tender and generous Paul had always been; how sudden his sickness was, and how all through it he had seemed to be dissatisfied with the doctors, as he should leave such slight provisi on for her and the children. And then she took i up at the Doctor suddenly, with tears in those under violet eyes of hers, and said:

"Oh, what should we have done if it hadn't been for you? I felt so lonely, so helpless, till you opened your doors to us like a brother. I am so pray God that I may live to make some return for your goodness."

Dr. Vanderpool felt that he was not entitled to so much gratitude. He had written to her unwillingly enough, he was conscious; feeling all the time that it was an awful bore, that a woman and the world would expect of him, and something he could not satisfy his own conscience without doing. But he was not worthy of her thanks. He told her that little thing! He thought as he looked at her that the man who could not be kind to her must be a poor creature indeed.

After that matters went on very well. Mrs. Paul was not a woman of great energy, nor had she much of that aggressive energy which would have led her to push her own fortunes in the world. But she compensated for these and other deficiencies by a wonderful amount of tact—or perhaps the quality deserves a better name than tact, for it sprang from real, unaffected, considerate love for the ease and happiness of other people. She knew that Dr. Vanderpool did not like children, so she made her small household as little burdensome to him as possible. She never suffered them to be obtruded upon his attention. When they had been there six months he would hardly have known that there was a child upon the street, with the exception of little Bess. She was such a womanly little being that her mother did not think it was necessary to forbid her to go to her Uncle Mark often round her curled up like a dormouse in some big arm-chair with a book in her hand—always and every where a book. He took to her wonderfully. She was so thoughtful, so quiet, she had so much quaint wisdom, such still, grave ways. Then, too, out of her face his dead brother's eyes seemed always to look at him, and carried him back to some of the softness and tenderness of childhood. She loved him, moreover, with an unpresuming devotion which might have stirred a colder heart than his. She never climbed into his lap, or bothered him with questions, or interfered with him in any way. But when he did notice her, when he stopped to talk to her, and took her little hand in his knee, the small sweet face would become fairly radiant with pleasure, and to call out this look grew to be one of his chief delights.

Mrs. Vanderpool, too, was quiet and unobtrusive. She never was in his way, and yet he never failed to find her ready to minister to him. He grew to think it was not altogether a bad arrangement which had brought him such inmates. Once or twice he wondered whether he himself might not have been tempted to commit matrimony if he had found in him such a woman as Mrs. Paul was, unconsciously beautiful, so unselfish, understanding so well her own sphere, and keeping in it so steadily. Not that you saw her every-night of marrying her lovely as she was. A widow with three children! To such a suggestion most men would probably say "Oh, I think not."

When she had been there a year the severity of her mourning began to relax a little. She wore black silk, but it was of a more mitigated black, and became her exquisitely, as the Doctor couldn't help noticing. Her soft, golden-brown hair waved away from her fair, pensive face, under the disfiguring widow's cap; and when he came in one day, and found her sitting on the floor playing with her children, he thought she looked scarcely more than a child herself.

About this time she coaxed him to resume his gentlemanly habit of dining at table instead of with Mrs. Willing how much he enjoyed them, and she could not bear that he should give them up any longer for her sake. He had not made that proposition, and the men, remembering with zest the gay old times, came eagerly. But something was wanting. The dinners were pronounced as lovingly as of old, and there were some added touches of grace and beauty—Mrs. Vanderpool's thought—in the flowers which breathed their fragrance every where, and the leaf garlands which entwined the baskets of fruit. But, somehow, it seemed to Dr. Vanderpool as if he had had lost the key to the banquets told old stories. Had they grown dull, or "did he dream they were brighter before?" He rather missed his usual quiet afternoon with Mrs. Paul when face opposite, and the children, as the custom had grown to be of late, coming in with the dessert. They joked him, some of them, which he rather enjoyed, and he felt that Katy was right.

The next dinner he insisted on Mrs. Vanderpool's presence at the table; and she, willing enough to please him, went in and staid until after the dessert was brought on. And by-and-by they all went up into the drawing-room, and found her there, sitting in the piano, and singing softly an old song. She was annoyed to see how they all admired her. She had been quite a belle before she married Paul, and the Doctor thought there was a spice of the old coquetry in her manner now. It vexed him to see how his friends admired her. But somehow he had let her stay up stairs; and then was unjust enough to blame her because she had been so willing to leave the children as soon as she found that he wished it.

He was in no hurry to give the next dinner—and before he had got ready for it something happened which put all such ideas out of his mind. He went home one day with a severe pain in his knee, having been detained by a difficult case. Mrs. Paul heard him let himself in, and as he took off his coat in the hall she met him with her slippers.

"Oh, brother, little Bess is so very, very ill! How thankful I am that you are home at last!"

He looked at her in surprise. She was strangely white under the hall gas-light. He put his arm round her to steady her as they went up the stairs together, and said, with a new gentleness in his tone:

"Poor girl! poor Bessie!"

He went into the room and looked down on

"I've brought her in here," she said. "I thought it was best to keep her out of the nursery until we see for a certainty what it was the matter."

By this time he stood over the bedside. The child lay in a sort of stupor, her eyes half open, her little fingers clutching the sheet, her cheeks and lips a vivid scarlet. He looked at her a while, counted her flying pulses, turned down the little white gown, and examined the throbbing flesh underneath. Then he turned to his sister-in-law pitifully.

"She has scarlet-fever," he said. "We must lose no time. She is very sick indeed."

Bessie Vanderpool's face grew ghastly. She knelt down at the bedside, and looked at him with a wild, unnatural light in her eyes.

"Oh, keep her alive!" she said. "I shall die if I lose my child! Oh, brother, save Mark, as you hope for the mercy of Heaven, do not let her die!"

The violence of her emotion frightened him. He had not seen her before—so how much unselfish love and quiet heroism was in this timid, girlish creatures.

For a long time he had no hope for little Bess, but her mother never despaired. It was her faith, and her tireless devotion that triumphed at last, rather than Dr. Vanderpool's skill. One day it came in from a drive and looked at the child with a brightening face.

"She will live," he said; "but I think only a mother could have saved her."

"Oh, thank God, thank God!" she cried, choking-ly, and then burst into a fit of hysterical weeping.

"I have let your half kill yourself," he said, trying to soothe her, "but you will have your reward. Now Mrs. Willing can do as well as you, and you must rest. I insist on your going to bed at once, and not getting up again until morning."

"But, brother—"

"Bessie, I have a right to be trusted. You know, or ought to by this time, that I won't let little Bess suffer. You must mind me, or I shall have two patients here instead of one."

She smiled faintly at his threat. She sent herself, took a refreshing bath, and then, for the first time in two weeks, went to bed. She thought she would lie down for a little while. She was there five minutes on the pillow before she was wrapped in a slumber which Dr. Vanderpool took care that no-body disturbed her for eight unbroken hours.

Katy had taken the two younger children out of the house to a quiet boarding-place, as soon as they saw the symptoms of little Bessie's illness; and the Doctor reckoned a morning and evening visit to them among his regular duties. He was getting, in fact, very seriously interested in the two little nephews. He had never noticed them much before; but now it was impossible to go to the little fellows, taken away thus from the mother-love in which their hearts delighted, without a feeling of tender pity which drew him on, before he knew it, into a systematic course of petting. He became very fond of him. Mark, his namesake, was now a sturdy boy of two, and Paul was past four. When the Doctor began to call out what he knew they really were, and how delightful were their accomplishments, he wondered a little at his old aversion to children.

This night, after he had sent their mother to bed, he would have been as usual, he found them in rosy health, and felt satisfied that all fear of the having taken the disease was past. He went back to the house, and had just prepared himself for a night sitting beside little Bess. He had decided himself to her mother that she should not be neglected, he would not intrust it to any one else the task of watching her. Mrs. Willing had been in the next room to be within call in case any thing was needed, but Dr. Vanderpool had sent her to bed, lamp with a medical journal in his hand. But he did not eat the leaves. Somehow his thoughts kept him busy.

They went back again to the old, easy-going life before Paul's wife and Paul's children came—the calm, careless, luxurious life. He missed the sumptuous dinners. Had he been happier then? What he change back now? Would he be willing Bessie should marry and go to a home of her own? Mark home, sit at some other man's fireside, lifting up her shy sweet eyes, uttering her low, gentle welcomes? Such a tragedy that would be! He looked her in unsupportable loneliness—that the old life could never be the same again as it was before she came. Then the Doctor's fancies waked up, and begged for a drink of water.

"Do you know me, childie?" he asked, gently, as he bent over her.

"Oh yes, Uncle Mark," and turning her head she touched her lips to the hand that was smoothing her fever. "I have sent her to sleep."

Resting, dear. She has taken care of you, night and day, for two weeks, and now that you are getting better I have sent her to bed."

She asked no more questions, but seemed perfectly contented with him for nurse. He found a change very soon in this child than in her mother's him—almost, as he said to himself, as if he were her father.

Two weeks more, and the household began to fall back into its old ways. The children had come home; little Bess was able to sit up; and so one night, after the nursery was quiet, Bessie came down for the first time in a month to her old place in the drawing-room. When Dr. Vanderpool came up stairs and found her there, he said gayly:

"It is good to see you here again," he said, sitting down close by her.

"And good to be here, and feel that they are all safe. It seems to me as if I never could thank God enough. And you too, Mark, what should I have done but for you?"

She looked up into his face with her shy, sweet, violet eyes, and he took tempted him—her words, face—she had never called him Mark before. He bent toward her, and his voice shook so it sounded strange to himself.

"Bessie, I have done no more than my duty for you and yours. I deserve no reward, but you said once you wished you could reward me. Will you give me yourself? Shall you be for all I ever have done or could do? I will care for your children as if they had been my own; and if a man's love can make you happy, mine shall. Speak, Bessie."

The swift color stained her face and neck. Her eyes fell, and she waited a little while before she answered. She could hear his own heart beat in her stillness. At last her words came—so low that he could hardly catch them.

"Would I not, Mark?"

"Upon my soul I do believe it would be right. I do believe that Paul would be more than willing to give his rights to my keeping."

"I never thought of this before—never for one moment. You must let me have time to know my own heart. You do not ask me about it again, as soon as I can understand myself I will answer you, yes or no."

Then she went away from him, and he sat vaguely wondering at himself—remembering how he had dreaded her coming, and realizing how much dearer now than all his old life was the one idea of keeping her forever. Children and all; he would not have spared one of them.

Ten days went by, seeming strangely long to Mark Vanderpool, not a patient man by nature. Bessie avoided him, he thought. Would she ever be ready to answer him? Had her answer mean hope or despair?

At last one night she came to him of her own accord as he sat looking moodily into the grate. Kneeling down beside him, she laid her head against his knee.

"Do you really want me?" she asked, "children and all?"

"I really want you." His tone was solemn with the earnestness of his love; strong with the force of his passion.

"I do not think I am good enough for you," she murmured. "Neither would I give myself to you as a reward for all your generous kindness. But if my love is worth any thing you have it."

He had her in his arms before she knew it, and was kissing her with kisses so eager that they startled her, murmuring over her such fond words as she had never dreamed this reserved, self-control man could utter. He looked curiously even to him as they fell on his own ears though his whole heart was in them. I doubt if gay, gallant Paul had ever loved her half so well; and I think her nature was stirred to a depth her girlhood never knew. She was almost frightened to feel how happy she was.

So the home to which she had come for refuge in her sorrow became the abiding-place of her joy. Before the spring-time Paul was the wife of Mark Vanderpool, and her children found in the old nature of babies the most tender of fathers.

WINGLETS

FROM OUR "CORRESPONDENT ON-THE-WING."

CONTINENTAL HOTEL, PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 28, 1866.

Friend Weekly:

In this high-angled city, which if their ways were as right as their angles they would do well, I feet I must address thee in the plain language, for I have just been to Women's Rights and Leffs and Equal Suffrage Convention, held here last Saturday, and I heard every right thing said. On the platform which was very broad, was MRS. ELIZABETH ARCADY STANDING, MRS. CURRY HOBART, MRS. STUART LONGSTREET, and REV. MISS OLIVIUS DARK BROWN. Among the gentlemen were MR. FREDERICK DOUGHTY and others, to give variety to the affair. As soon as I made my appearance one of the Equal Suffragisters accosted me, and informed me that I was not the flying correspondent to Harper's Weekly. I owned the soft impeachment. Then she told me I must use these lines among those that think women ought to do nothing but nurse babies, and other household duties; but when then remembers that many of us have no such duties, nor ever expect to have any, thee should be glad that we are left to arrange for the nursing of the babies, and for thee must own that, judging from things at the White House, one would infer that the ladies of the public had been brought up on the bottle." This remark seemed to me so political that I thought I would send you a sketch, and was probably in the fair speaker's mind at the time.

ANDY NURSING THE INFANT REPUBLIC, AND TRYING TO IMPROVE ITS CONSTITUTION.

MRS. ELIZABETH ARCADY STANDING, the non-det, as you may remember was the first speaker. She was dressed very nice. I don't know the names of the noire antiques and things, but she looked beautiful. Elizabeth came forward and said: "I am sorry that our venerable Presidentess, MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT, is not here, as Mr. Mottoh is for equal suffrage." MR. FREDERICK DOUGHTY here rose and said that was a joke. (Great Applause.) "This is an equal suffrage organization," MR. DOUGHTY tells us that five out of every seven millions of Englishmen can not vote. Now I am not Roscoe Conkling." Yes you are, Betsy), but I do say that there is about that proportion of Americans that are disfranchised, and we must labor until a woman's right at the polls will be denied by none."

ONE OF THE STRONG-MINDED "RUSHING TO THE POLL."

ELIZABETH now introduced MRS. LUCY LONGSTON, who, in a clear, ringing voice, was greeted with warm applause, and proceeded to say:

"The advocates of equal suffrage are down on both political parties. The Republicans talked of 'universal suffrage,' but meant masculine suffrage all the time; and those who called this our professional 'work' took on us." (Applause.) Then we resolved to make fight with the ballot-box for the colored people, and fought — we," and with them to strike, like MOSAIC-ERY, with the shoulder. (Cheers.) It is proposed to insult the mothers and sisters of the land by putting the word 'male' into the Constitution; and I see the Democratic journal is advertising for mail contracts (Cries of 'Joke') Joke!), and designating certain lines of travel, as mail routes, as though a male route wasn't worth mentioning. (Cheers.) My friends, a female route on a stopping day is one of the most interesting things, except the female herself, in nature. (Cries of 'Bully!' and 'Good!') It always seemed to me absurd to quote the Declaration of Independence about all men being created equal, ignoring the fact that women were ever created at all. All men are created equal to what? Equal to the women. They are to some things, but not in knowing how to vote. Do you suppose any woman would have voted for MCMASTER for Congress? NO! They would as soon think of voting for THAD STEVENS, or any other old bachelor. The women are loyal, they all go for Union to a man." (Cheers.) MR. FREDERICK DOUGHTY here rose and said that we make an idol (Renewed cheering.) That union to a man would make that idol not depend upon force of arms. (A voice: "Is that a joke?") FREDERICK: "No, Sir; I am not here to make jokes, but merely to explain them for others." (Cheers.)

LUCY continued: "In Great Britain there is a movement on foot to demand the ballot for women." FREDERICK spoke now and said that the reason it got along so slow was because it was on foot. It had better take a carriage." (Cries of 'Joke!' 'Joke!') "And," closed Lucy, "I'm afraid they will succeed before we will."

A SUFFERER OF "EQUAL SUFFRAGE."

An "equal righter" now came forward and read the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the full liberty and the pursuit of happiness are natural and inalienable rights, then we should all have our "hold-king" and the men should take their turns at the cradle; and any arrangement of society that hindered the one sphere for man and another for a woman was a one-sided arrangement, and was unworthy a free people. (Cheers.)

2. Resolved, That the world HAS LAMARTINE that there is no reason why a Restaurant-Keeper should not sell as well as a Bookseller, provided he should "fill his Flowers with his Cauliflowers, and Crinollines with Early Rose Potatoes." (Cheers.)

3. Resolved, That we recommend the election of women to the delegate and primary elections; that very many women have a wonderful influence in their social control the nominations; that we form a "ring," to secure the right man in the right place. (Loud and cheering.)

After the resolutions had been considered EXHAUSTED came forward and said:

"I desire, before this Convention go further, to insist on a declaration in favor of the female solution of the Republican party. Why, JAMES BROOKS, of New York, was the only Congressman last winter that had the nerve and decency to present the woman-suffrage memorial to Congress." (Cheers for the decency of BROOKS.)

The REV. MISS OLIVITON DARK BROWN now spoke. She said that GARIBALDI believed in woman suffrage, but wouldn't advocate it because he wanted to get into the South, and he knew that the conservatives would make fun of him. She was not afraid of the papers nor any pictures in HARPER'S WEEKLY, or the Illustrated News, in Broadway, New York, and didn't care who saw it. Women are frivolous because they are irresponsible for the right to vote and to be elected because they had work to do; but now we can get labor from Ireland to do all the work for us in a week and board, and that leaves us more leisure to enter upon new duties. Boys had spoken about the cradle in the Legislature, but that could be dispensed with. She had seen a new invention of a cradle, which you wound up as you do a clock, and you could sit and play at the picture, and the cradle would swing until you came back. That baby grew up just as well as those in the same for it. (Cheers.) And as for the grown-up children, when the house gets too full you can send them to the breeding-school, where they will always be glad to receive them with a fork, towel, and spoon. Then the female religious and moral element would be without personal knowledge, as she never had a family; but she thought that women should vote first and marry afterward, as she expected to do, though it might be a long time before she found a MAN. (Cheers.)

MRS. MILLER BROWN had concluded the meeting listened to some speeches by the other sex for a few minutes, when they soon insisted upon an adjournment.

Miss BROWN then approached me, and seeing my manly form — (I was in full dress) — asked me for the press. I replied that I reported for Harper. She said she hoped to see that paper, revive all the editorials, and when a smart and interesting girl would on the "device." I replied that I would, and then I thought of a speech she grasped my hand cordially. I tell you, dear Weekly, that I "enthused" her last night. Those words of her remark. Your own C. O. W.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

NOWADAYS a set of furs, of some kind, is regarded as an almost indispensable portion of a lady's wardrobe. The Russian, Hudson's Bay, and American Sable, or MINK, as it is usually called, are the most desirable and highly prized furs. Next to these, CRAWshalla, and Siberian squirrel are much worn, and very pretty. Ermine, however, can not so well be worn at all occasions, as it is rather too expensive for evening wear.

But animals of various kinds are made to meet the universal demand for furs. The Astrakhan fur or wool was used to some extent last winter; and this year the Persian lamb, which comes from Africa and Persia, and which is fine and glossy, is made into petticoats and short jackets for skating, as well as into muffs and cuffs.

It may not be generally known that an animal, known under the name of Angora cat, or rabbit, now is beginning to occupy a prominent position in the report as well as in fashion. Many ladies, I think, are the reader shrink in disgust, for the fact is that the muffle in the skin of the much-abused skunk now commands no quite a handsome price. Large shipments have been recently made to Russia, where these skins are used for the linings of cloaks. They are many manufactured into muffs in this country. But do not imagine that a single muff is sold under the name of the real animal from which it is. By no means. In the first place, by the wonderful application of chemistry an entire metamorphosis takes place, rendering it impossible to recognize any of the original features of the skin; not the slightest odor is perceptible, and then it is announced as the "Prairie Badger," the "Colorado Catamount," the "Australian Wolf," or by some other taking title. Thus chemistry it is transformed into something rich and rare, and fashion settles the rest.

Why is the "Occilian Child" so called? Is a question with many in reading the musical advertisements of the day. In brief, because St. Cecilia was the patron saint of music. But those who have recently heard the Oratorio of "Samson" performed by the Cultz-Clark company must have felt by sorrance — how doubtless noticed a pretty little story about St. Cecilia upon the programme. She was a Roman lady, born of noble parents, about the year 230. Notwithstanding she had been converted to Christianity, her parents married her to a young Pagan nobleman named Valerianus, who, on the wedding-night, was told that Cecilia was nightly visited by an angel, and that he must forbear to approach her, whereas the angel would destroy him. Valerianus desired to see his rival, the angel, but he was told he was impossible unless he would consent to be baptized and become a Christian. To this he consented. Afterward he found his wife at prayer in her closet, and by her side an angel clothed with brightness. Valerianus entreated him that his brother Tiburtius might be a partaker of the spiritual grace which he himself had received. The angel answered that his desire was granted, and that they both should be crowned with martyrdom in a short time. Upon this the angel vanished. Shortly after Tiburtius was converted, and both he and Valerianus were beheaded. This was offered her life upon condition that she would sacrifice to the Roman deities; but she refused, and died a martyr to the Christian religion.

The tradition is that St. Cecilia excelled in music, and that the angel was drawn from the celestial regions by the charms of her melody; hence she came to be regarded as the patroness of music and musicians.

The Mercantile Library of this city has introduced what we think will be a very popular improvement in its management. Books will be delivered at the residences of any members who choose to provide themselves with a box for the purpose. Every stamp, which we still at the price of twenty for one dollar. The order with a stamped box is sent to the Library by mail or otherwise, and the book wanted will be delivered at the person's residence, and the book to be returned when done with.

The members of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, Vancouver's Island—some of them, at least—are possessed of genuine, if not extraordinary perspicacity. It is reported that a certain Mr. M'Clure recently spoke for several hours in opposition to a measure going down. His opponents made every effort to tire him out, refusing to allow him to lean against the table for support, or to take a chair for a moment. He never himself from the irksomeness of his position by resting his hands upon any thing, or to speak, in short, any other than a rigidly erect and unsupported attitude. He "stood it out," however, and gained his point.

English papers bring us accounts of the display of meteors; which, it seems, occurred, as was anticipated by astronomers, and was visible in Great Britain, though not in this country. The shower was very brilliant, and lasted several hours. The London Examiner says:

"Many of the meteors appeared to have a yellowish light, others a deep red. So near to us did some of them appear that their resemblance to rockets occurred to every one who saw the sky, and to listen for the rush through the air. During the transit of the meteors the light of the stars was not scarcely to be noticed. The noiseless course gave a thrill that no artificial spectacle could produce. In some cases the passage was brief and the light faint; in others a large portion of the field was traversed, and the illuminations both prolonged and intense. The soft-gliding motion, if such a term may be employed, was a striking characteristic."

The University of the City of New York has received a munificent addition to its endowment from Mr. Loring Andrews, a merchant of our city. The aggregate sum is $10,000. It is to be applied as follows: For a professorship of logic, intellectual and moral science, $25,000; for a professorship of the evidences of revealed religion and natural theology, $25,000; to complete a Greek professorship, $16,000; for a professorship of political science, $8,000; for medals and premiums in the several departments of various branches, the income of $10,000; for chemical and philosophical apparatus, the income of $10,000.

There is now living in Rome, Oneida County (save an exchange), a lady ninety-four years of age, who has a son living over seventy years old, a grandson fifty-five, and a great-grandson thirty-three years old, and a great-grand-daughter less than three years old. The remarkable fact is stated on good authority that as we are healthy that the selectors were obliged to kill a man in order to elect a governor.

Custom-house officers should not be too sharp. A keen one, on the Canada line, lately stopped a woman carrying a bundle. "What have you there?" he demanded. "Nothing," she answered, and then said: "Nothing dutiable." He insisted on seeing it. She looked at him, "Well, if you must, you must," the suspected package, saying, "Take it, then, and much good may it do you!" While she went on her way he proceeded to examine the package, which proved to be an infant a few days old. The unfortunate officer finds the duties heavy on such importations.

A gentleman in London, having occasion one night to visit the office of a London and Glasgow telegraph company, found no one there, and the porter inside, whose duty it was to open it, so fast asleep, and the clerk in charge so far up stairs, that no amount of knocking could obtain him admission. He went to an adjoining office and telegraphed to Glasgow, requesting the clerk to call them from their beds. Even in the office of the first-mentioned company, directing him to go down stairs and awake the porter. The message was delivered, and the door opened, in about twenty minutes.

Another recent telegraphic feat is, that an order, just received at San Francisco from England for 500 barrels o flour, was transmitted by cable and overland telegraph, and the order filled and advices returned to the sender by telegraph on the same day.

It is stated that the Massachusetts Historical Society has offered $500 for a copy of Franklin's first work, which formerly belonged to Benjamin Franklin, and now is in the possession of a gentleman who resides in Montgomery, Pennsylvania. The case is of heavy silver, and the movement is still in good running order.

A singular "dab" story is told by a Pennsylvania paper. A German gentleman went fishing with some friends. Not having good luck time passed slowly, and the German took out his watch—a fine gold one—when a sudden jerk of his line so startled him that he let go his watch, which struck his knee and bounded off into the water, his line parting at the same instant with a sudden snap. Finding it useless to fish for one he told his friends started for home; but, rather ashamed of their bad luck, they bought a few fishes, or other unlucky fishermen, and went home. The German bought an eight-pound bass; on inspecting which he found a fish-hook sticking in its gills resembling the one he had lost. It was with a kind of savage joy that he anticipated the pleasure of eating the prime cause of his ill luck; but, strange to tell, upon opening the bass, he found his watch, which had not even stopped ticking.

Not long since a cousin of the French Emperor died at the Tuileries, in Paris. He was First Chamberlain and Superintendent of the Imperial Theatres. He had seventeen grand-crosses of the highest, selectest orders in Europe. He had brought pictures of honors and orders, Count Sacciocli was the victim of a nervous disease which caused him with barbarous cruelty. He could not remain still without suffering the acutest pain. The nerves of motion were affected. He transacted business on foot; he dictated letters and signed his office. He listened to the performance of operas in his latticed box, which had no seat in it, and received with a thick carpet that he might walk during the whole performance. Often sleep would not come to him but he was exhausted by pain that the nerves were insensible to pain. On one occasion the Valley refused intermission for thirty-six hours, trying to subdue pain by fatigue.

The soles of his feet were red, as if they had been boiled, and blood had been forced through all their pores. The Emperor gave him rooms adjoining one of the largest passages of the Tuileries, and had it covered with a thick Aubusson carpet, that the poor patient might make his painful round with least pain. He died of sheer exhaustion from want of sleep. Shortly before he died he murmured, "Norbu! Norbu!" repeatedly. "What is that? Do you know any thing?" asked one of the persons present. "Don't question me," replied the fat dying man. But Norbu was the name of his first love—one a little sister of Leghorn—whose memory had been to him an oasis in his desert.

A singular incident recently occurred in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. A young lady of pleasing appearance, and, apparently, of unusual intelligence, went before the Board of Trustees, gave her name, and then stated that she was the daughter of a physician in Logansville, Indiana, and that her father had died from her out of harm's way, as she was laboring under an uncontrollable impulse to murder others. At the same time she took out a paper in a strychnine bottle corking and handed it over to an officer. She was placed under examination.

Some time since an association was formed to colonize Palestine; and recently the news was received that 190 Americans, members of this association, had reached Jaffa, or Joppa, and settled in the vicinity of that place. The locations occupied by them are in close proximity to the famous orange gardens, which perfume the "Valley of Sharon" almost away to Ramla. The land was purchased, and provided every thing the new-comers, their baggage and a large cargo of building wood which they brought with them having been allowed to pass the custom-house duty free.

FACT OR FANCY?

"Do you believe in ghosts?" Few questions are ever asked more idle. But the general answer, "I do," or "I do not," is worthy of it; that is to say, if "I do not" means not to be taken in the literal sense of dogmatic disbelief. It is impossible, in the first place, to limit the belief in ghosts to the English, for belief runs through all the history of mankind. People of all countries, languages, and religious creeds have believed in ghosts in all ages. In days as skeptical as the present the wisest of the classic societies told their ghost stories, wisely refraining from saying whether they believed them or not. No man among the Romans of the Augustan period, not the skeptical poet Lucretius; yet, instead of repudiating the existence of ghosts, he proceeds to explain them on perfectly natural and scientific principles, as being flimsy emanations from the people to whom they belonged.

Pliny the Younger has a famous story of a haunted house, with the usual dramatic incidents. He believes, at all events, in the fact of spectres appearing in haunted houses. The difficulty in the way is a scientific verification, and this is a difficulty which, from the nature of the subject, is insurmountable. The most practical mind, a spirit in the sleeping or waking state has been a mental fact to numberless persons in undeniable; the personal question whether or not this mental fact is to be considered in the light of the unusual phenomena of abnormal nature; whether, in the language of philosophy, it has an objective existence. Perhaps we are prone to estimate the importance of the fact, either at first hand or second hand; and a record of such experiences, however trivial, is always interesting, although no possible conclusion of facts may lead us any nearer to the final determination of the general question. For instance, here the following case on such unquestionable authority that I can not for a moment dispute it:

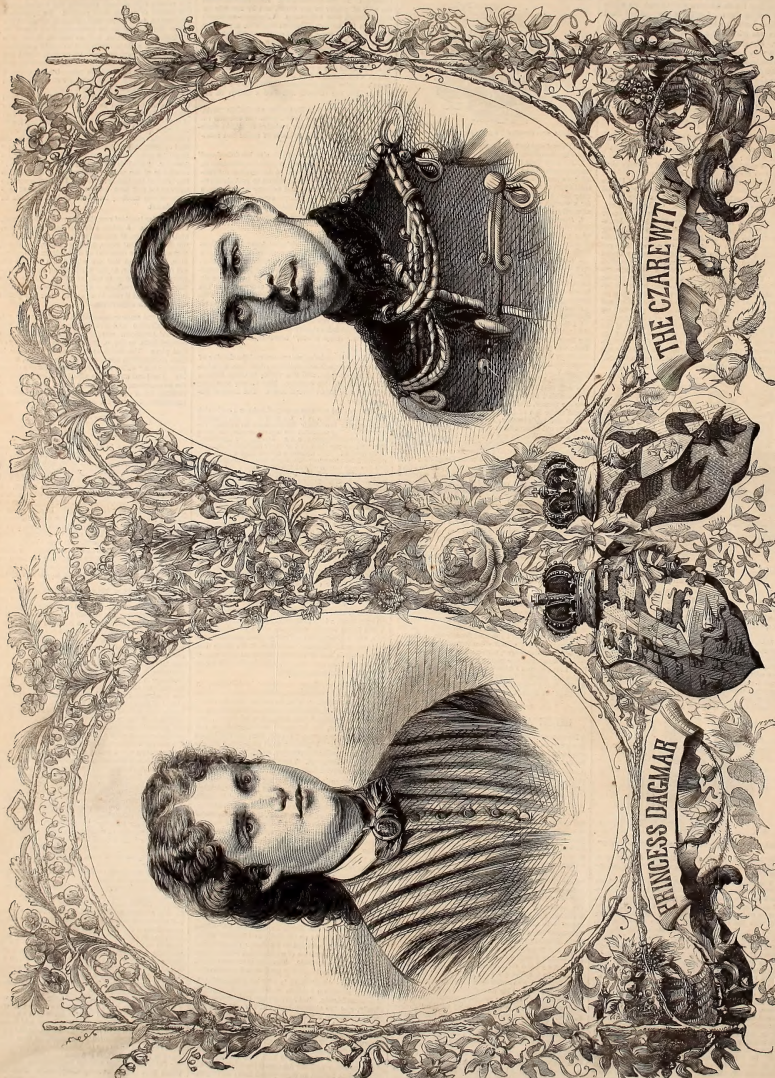
Many years ago a young surgeon, on board a man-of-war in the Indian seas, was observed by his messmates one morning to wear a very severe look and anxious look. They questioned him as to the cause, and with some hesitation he said that while before he had seen his father lying dead in an open coffin. He noted the circumstance in his log-book, and that at the time or letter came announcing the death of his father at that exact date.

Now, in this story could infer the actual objective appearance of the spectre; but it is difficult to refuse to the fact of the mind a status of rage or trance a power of clairvoyance, consisting in either the multiplication of space or of time. In this case space was overleaped.

The next case I can perfectly vouch for, as the example of apparitions.

An English clergyman, whom I knew very intimately, was engaged in the same house with a native family. On the night on which the lady of that family was confined he dreamed that the nurse came to him in the middle of the night, requesting him to call him in the morning at the usual hour, as she came down and christen the new-born infant, as there was the immediate danger that there was no time to send for the Lutheran clergyman. In the morning there was no inquiry, but he was told that mother and child were doing well. However, in exactly fourteen days from the night of the dream the clergyman's dream actually occurred, and the child was to be with the next morning.

To the question whether I have ever seen a ghost I should answer, "No." but I know some one who has—that is to say, who fully believes that he has—and here is the story just as it was told to me.



Near the town of Weimar, in Saxony, on the right of the long alley planted with chestnuts that leads from the town up to the summer-palace of the Grand-Duke at Belvidere, there is a spot known as the Old Ball-room. It is a deserted building, the ruins of which have almost entirely disappeared. Near this site, among the brushwood, are openings to a most extraordinary series of subterranean passages, which, it is said, have never been thoroughly explored. Some say that human bones have been found in them; others, that persons endeavoring to explore them without a clew, have become bewildered and perished of hunger. Some attribute them to human hands, and some to natural geological causes. It is only certain that they are there, and that no one is able to give any definite account of them. As to the building, whose foundations alone are visible among the bushes, it is said to have been an ancient castle belonging to some former Dukes of Saxony. Some few years ago a friend of mine, Herr H——, of Weimar, was in the habit of making frequent visits to Oberweisna, a village at the end of the park, one of the ways to which lies through the Belvidere Allée. One evening in October, after the sun was set, he was passing along this road in a thick fog, illuminated by the moon; as he passed the spot where the ancient castle formerly stood, he was aware of an appearance in the mist beside him, which he at first did not pay much attention to, as he thought it might be the reflection of his own form. After a while, however, it struck him that the image which followed his steps so closely was accompanied by the image of a dog, and he had no dog with him. This circumstance caused him to stop and look at the figure, when, to his horror, he observed that it wanted a head.

Herr H—— walked toward it, it retired; he ran from it, it followed him; he fell into his usual pace, it continued to keep step with him; he addressed it, but it did not answer. Herr H—— is a Roman Catholic. In mortal terror he mechanically made the sign of the cross. The ghost immediately vanished in the direction of the remains of the old castle.

There is an old tradition connected with the scene of this adventure, that a former Duke of Saxony caused his son to be beheaded for some fearful family crime,—either the murder of his own mother, or an intrigue similar to that which forms the foundation of Lord Byron's Parisina.

At Berka, a small bathing-place among the hills, seven miles from Weimar, there is also to be seen, on a woody knoll, the site of a ruined castle, from which the Grand Duke of Weimer derives his title of Count Berka. The old people of Berka still talk of a headless apparition which used to haunt it, and which often appeared to their grandfathers.

THE STATESMAN'S LESSON.

By AUGUSTUS COMSTOCK.

Pares and bouses, trees and meadows,
Were the Statesman's own;
Yet he walked amid the shadows
Mournful and alone.

Golden birds among his willows
Trilled a happy strain,
And the breezes stirred to billows
All his waving grain.

Sang the locust in the thicket
As it saw him pass,
And the ticking of the cricket
Sounded in the grass.

Round the clover and the daisy
Hummed the busy bee,
While the spider, feeling lazy,
Swung upon the tree.

But the humming and the swinging,
And the grasses green,
With the birds and locust singing,
Scenes were heard or seen.

For, to gentler souls enchanting,
Nature's charms are tame
To a spirit that is panting—
Longing for a name—

To a lion hart, like thunder,
Beating down the bars
That would keep a spirit under,
Soaring toward the stars!

So the Statesman, moving onward,
Discontented—wild—
On his dreams of glory pondered,
Till he saw a child—

Saw a crippled little Saxon,
Merriest of girls,
With her crutches and a flaxen
Shower of sunny curls,

Picking from the grass and mosses
Dew-drop diadems,
Weaving into rings and crosses
Tiny flower stems.

Spite of crutches, searching after
Nut and faded bur,
Spite of pain, so full of laughter,
Nature laughed with her.

Every bur gave greater pleasure
To this little girl,
Than could winning of such treasure
As a throne of pearl.

And the Statesman, touched and humbled
By such simple trust,
Saw his throne of glory crumbled
Finer than dust:

And confessed the happy maiden,
With her cripple pain,
Greater than the sorrow-laden
Lord of proud domains!

ASTHMA CURED.

Mr. Wm. May, of 545 Spring St., New York, writes, Jan. 1, 1866: I have been afflicted with Asthma for upward of ten years, receiving no benefit from any remedies. I was advised by a friend to try one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I said I had tried several kinds of plasters without any benefit, and supposed they were all alike. My friend gave me one of Allcock's, and urged me to use it. I did so, and have now worn them steadily for nine months, and find myself better than I have been for many years. The Great American Tea Company.

Always a Wholesale Establishment.

We have many inquiries (10 to 20 letters a day) asking what discount we make to the Trade from our prices as published in the Price List. These are our lowest wholesale prices. We consider ourselves only a Wholesale Concern, and do not have the no price.

The way in which we came to break packages at all was, that during the high prices of Teas we furnished parties with packages as small as five pounds. Our trade spread so fast that parties with small means thought it very hard to be compelled to pay, somewhere, about a dollar per pound . . . that we were selling the same goods for, simply because they could not afford to buy a chest of Tea at one time. Therefore, in order to lighten these burden we consented to supply them with small quantities as small as one pound at the wholesale prices.

Further reasons why we sell our goods to sell can have their orders put up in small packages to suit their trade, but we can not make any reduction in price, as our profits for the last six years have not averaged more than one cent per pound.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade, we will start with the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

1st. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes in foreign houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

3d. The Importer makes all of 10 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

4th. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

8th. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE MARKET WILL BEAR.

When you have added to these eight profits as many brokerages, cartages, cooperages, and wastes, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived that the consumer pays a big price. And we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid to our Purchasing Tea Agents in China, Japan, and Canton, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting every chest fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

With the Compound Concentrated Fluid Extract of Valuable Medicinal Roots and Herbs,

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

HAS PRODUCED

A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What many seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal minded and scientific to cures which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency. We think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: "In health, the body, like a well-balanced clock, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we know that it is deficient in power. What is required is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD and for all hereditary diseases transmitted from parent to child.

PARALYSIS.

It is on universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the worst cases of Paralysis. We do not hesitate to reiterate that it is emphatically the great life-giving power.

DYSPEPSIA.

Indigestion, Weight at Stomach, Flatulence, Liver Complaint, Want of Appetite, Bad Breath, Constipation, Biliousness.

SCROFULA.

Struma, King's Evil, Glandular Swellings, Erysipelas, Ulcerations, Tumors, Boils.

This taint (hereditary and acquired), filling life with untold misery, is by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[Arthritis], Lumbago, Neuralgia, Sciatica, Gout, Tic Douloureux.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Coxie, chronic or recurrent, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of mercury, removes the taint, breaks and cures the weak joints and rheumatic pains which the use of calomel is sure to produce. It hardens spongy gums, and restores teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates root and branch, all eruptive diseases of the skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other affections of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

FOR ALL KINDS OF ULCERATIVE DISEASES,

Either of the nose, throat, tongue, spine, forehead, or scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Motic disorders upon the female, depending upon a disordered action of the liver, are very unpleasant to the young or middle-aged females. A few bottles of Constitution Life Syrup will correct the secretion, and remove the disease, which is entirely under the skin.

Diseases of the liver, giving rise to languor, disordered digestion, weak stomach, or an alternate or torturous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP.

As a general blood-purifying agent, the Life Syrup stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and science have made the Constitution Life Syrup for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women: and if the Constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is the poor man's friend and the rich man's blessing.

REMEMBER THE LITTLE ONES;

THE DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN OF OUR

COUNTRY'S DEFENDERS.

GRAND CHARITABLE FAIR

AND

PRESENTATION FESTIVAL

IN AID OF THE

HOME AND SCHOOL

FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF

The Destitute Children

OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THIS HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1865 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union; its spirit of usefulness is constantly increasing, the children now numbering over 120; and daily are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied, solely for want of room to extend its usefulness. Its old and unsuitable building in Fifty-eighth Street, New York, now occupied, must be removed for the erection of such a Home as necessity demands; and this call is made upon the public with a firm belief that the Patriotism and Generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the Little Ones, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, which will be the cause of humanity and well-doing resolute to the true assertion that "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, fully realize the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

Mrs. General ULYSSES S. GRANT, President.	Mrs. HERVEY G. LAW, Manager.
Mrs. CHAS. P. HALL, Recording Secretary.	Mrs. J. C. VAN DUZER, Manager.
Mrs. Major-Gen. J. C. FREMONT, 1st Vice-President.	Mrs. W. GUMMOND.
Mrs. ROBERT JOSEPH, 2d Vice-President.	Mrs. JAMES GILLIS.
Mrs. JOHN S. YOUNGER, Treasurer.	Mrs. C. MALLER.
Mrs. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.	Mrs. WM. ALLEN.
Mrs. WM. S. HILLYER, Corresponding Secretary.	Mrs. HENRY BAYER.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

The undersigned desiring to express our sympathy and unite our efforts with the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, located in the City of New York, do most cordially endorse the Ladies composing the Officers and Managers of that Institution as a Supervisory Committee in their approaching "FAIR AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL."

Major-General FRANCIS C. BARLOW.	Brevet Brigadier-General JAMES F. HALL.
Major-General FRANCIS C. BARLOW.	Judge Chas. P. Daly, Ch'n of Committee.
Brigadier-General JOHN COCHRANE.	Jno. H. WHITE.
Brigadier-General WILLIAM HALL.	G. P. B. HOYT.
Brigadier-General RUFUS INGALLS.	J. R. FULLERTON.

The following card will be fully appreciated by the public, as it receives the thanks of the Institution:

"To the Managing Directors of the Festival:—Sympathizing with your object, I take pleasure in tendering you, gratuitously, my professional services on the occasion of the Grand Festival. FRANCOIS THOMAS."

The Fair will open on the 10th of December, and continue two weeks, at the PUBLIC HALL, corner of Broadway and Twenty-third Street, New York. To be concluded by the

THE THOMAS MEDAL.

THE Gold Medal voted by the Legislature of Tennessee to Major-General THOMAS, the hero of Mill Spring, Chickamauga, and Nashville, is to be presented by Governor BROWNLOW on the 15th of December. That day is the second anniversary of the Battle of Nashville, and the presentation of this elegant medal will be the principal feature in its celebration.

Generals GRANT, SHERMAN, THOMAS, and SHERIDAN will always hold the place in history which they now hold in the popular estimation, as the four great Generals of the War for the Union. General THOMAS was born in Southampton County, Virginia, in July, 1816. He graduated at West Point in 1840, and in 1861 succeeded to the position formerly held by General LEE in the regular army—that of Colonel of the Fifth Cavalry. In 1863 he was promoted to a Brigadier-Generalship in that army; and, after his victory at Nashville, to a Major-Generalship. When he fought the battle of Mill Spring, early in 1862, he commanded a corps of BUELL'S army, and he retained command of the same corps under ROSECRANS. Our readers will remember the new hopes awakened by the victories gained by GARFIELD and THOMAS at Middle Creek and at Mill Spring, which were so soon followed by the captures of Forts Henry and Donelson, and of New Orleans. In one respect General THOMAS has been more fortunate than our other great Generals. He has never suffered a defeat on the field. Even at Chickamauga, when the right and centre of the army were driven from the field, he alone stood fast, and, by the help of reinforcements which came upon the field just in time, and almost by accident, succeeded in holding his ground.

THE THOMAS MEDAL (OBVERSE).

THE THOMAS MEDAL (REVERSE).

But THOMAS'S crowning victory was gained at Nashville, December 15, 1864. No battle of the war had been more critical. JEFFERSON DAVIS, in sending Gen. HOOD Northward, staked the Confederacy upon HOOD'S success. Whether HOOD succeeded or failed was of more immediate and momentous consequence than the issue of SHERMAN'S advance to the Atlantic sea-coast. But with SHERMAN'S success and HOOD'S defeat combined there was no hope left.—HOOD seems to have been subject to some fatuity or evil genius. He waited for days in front of Nashville, while THOMAS was quietly but rapidly concentrating all the available forces of the West—and when THOMAS was prepared HOOD threw down the wager of battle, and was beaten and routed as no army save LEE'S was routed during the war. HOOD'S army was not only defeated; it was obliterated.

The Medal, of which we give an illustration, is of gold, and displays a workmanship admirable in every particular. Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., by whom the work was executed, consider the medal one of the most successful productions that they have sent from their workshops. The obverse presents a beautiful medallion head of the General surrounded by this inscription: "To Major-General GEORGE H. THOMAS, from the State of Tennessee. The reverse has upon it, in bas relief, a view of the Capitol at Nashville, about which is inscribed General THOMAS'S Message from Chattanooga at the time when it was so closely besieged by BRAGG: "I will hold the town till we starve," etc.

Beneath the Capitol, and in line, is placed the words: "By joint resolution, adopted Nov. 2, 1865." In size the medal is about three inches in diameter, and weighs one pound Troy. It is a work of rare regard and appreciation that General THOMAS may well be proud to receive from the State of Tennessee.

RESTORATION AND SUFFRAGE.

THERE is no royal road to restoration. The social and political systems and traditions of a State can not be violently torn up by the roots and new systems introduced without long delays and patience and prudent deliberation. There is no magical word that will conjure the difficulty away. Universal suffrage alone, or impartial suffrage alone, is no more a sure solution than universal amnesty or universal disfranchisement of the late rebels. Suffrage, indeed, is an essential element in the process of restoration, but it is only a part of it. The question is very complicated. It can be settled only gradually and by the increasing light of experience as we advance. The chief danger of the situation is impatience. A year ago it was confidently asserted by intelligent men that if the work of reconstruction were not accomplished by the end of the last session of Congress the people would put the Union party out of power. The event has hardly justified the prediction. Those intelligent men were profoundly mistaken. The country is just as patient and steady as it was during the war; and while it hopes and wishes for the earliest possible restoration, it means to make no leap in the dark.

We lately showed that the ineligibility to office of certain specified leaders of the late rebellion at the pleasure of Congress, and thereby depriving them of the vote, was a cardinal necessity of the method of restoration. There is another of the most important, and that is the disfranchisement of the colored citizens of the unrestored States. The political object of this is twofold. First, to avoid the inevitable consequences of depriving a very ignorant class of political power in the midst of those who have the power and are hostile to the unenfranchised; and, second, to create a large and, in some quarters of the lately disturbed section, a controlling body of loyal voters. The authority to do any thing toward this result, like that of the President's action in appointing Provisional Governors, is derived from the necessity of providing for the public safety after a severe and prolonged war, which is not at an end, whether there are forces in the field or not, until the people by their representatives so declare.

It is therefore merely a question of policy, and not of principle, as has been sometimes stoutly asserted, how this enfranchisement shall be procured—whether it shall proceed directly from the National Government, or whether efficient motive shall be presented to persuade those who at present exercise the political power to enlarge it. Undoubtedly, as a matter of fact and experience, it is always wiser that radical political changes should proceed from the immediate political community to be affected by them. But this is not always practicable; especially when changes are essential to purposes over which those communities have no control, and to which they may even be opposed.

It is equally a point of expediency whether the suffrage, by whatever authority established, shall be limited only by age, residence, and legal innocence of crime, or whether the capacity of reading and writing shall be added. The imperative rule is merely that, whatever the qualification, it be truly equal, in order that no privileged political class shall be created. Those who claim that suffrage is a natural right do not deny that it must be regulated by certain uniform conditions which do not work a deprivation of the right. Thus, a certain maturity of age is always deemed indispensable, and is a provision approved by universal common sense. So the ability to read and write is urged by many Americans as a further qualification, upon the ground that in this country no citizen has reached the age of twenty-one and is unable to read and write except through a willful rejection of the opportunities equally afforded him with every other man. But this is true only of what were lately called the Free States. In the late Slave States there was no general public provision of education, and it was a legal offense to teach the laborers to read or write. And this brings us to the practical bearing of the subject.

Senator MORRILL has introduced a bill regulating the electoral franchise in the District of Columbia. The action of the Senate will be significant as showing its views of this whole question. But we hope that, while there will be the amplest comparison of views, no action at this time will be allowed to establish a precedent. The subject should be left unfettered; for it may be very proper to do in the District of Columbia what would be extremely unwise in some of the unrestored States. The bill of Senator MORRILL, according to the statement from Washington, provides that every male adult, legally innocent, who is a citizen of the United States and has lived six months in the District, who can write his name and read the Constitution of the United States, and who took no voluntary part in the rebellion, shall be a voter. This may be an admirable and timely provision in the District, but how would it subserve as a system of suffrage in the unrestored States, bearing in mind that the object is to develop a numerical loyal vote for the Government, and to move toward self-government?

It is indisputable that if Congress should enfranchise only every loyal male adult in the late Slave States who could read and write, the political power in all of them would be intrusted to an insignificant fraction of the people. Of course if the bulk of the educated class and those who have had the habit of leadership and superiority were altogether excluded from political power, it would be necessary to maintain an imposing national military force to protect the political class. But it is not likely, in any event, the army must remain for a long time in the unrestored States, and not the chance of general pacification be greatly increased, not by disarming the vast majority of the citizens, but by disabling certain persons from office, and by politically opposing one part of the population to another, in the hope of disloyal. The moment the colored citizens are enfranchised and are so securely protected that they will not fear to exercise their rights, they will, by laws which are the expression of their pride and prejudice, gradually come to be politically treated as the foreign voters are treated in the city of New York.

The question of suffrage in the unrestored States is to be regarded politically, in connection with other questions, in its bearings upon the more prompt and permanent restoration of the Union. We must not be superstitious. We must not suppose that the mere ballot is the open sesame of the situation. If Congress enfranchised every male adult of the unrestored States, it must not only defend them with rifles but with education. In the long-run, the ballot is a wise weapon only in intelligent hands; and while all the world knows the means which kept the hands of the colored people true to the Union would undoubtedly keep their votes no less true, it is equally clear that enough who would strive to hold them in ignorance that they might hereafter control them more easily. Extension of political power to the freedmen is essential to the national peace. If it can not well be compassed by just but indirect coercion of their neighbors, it must be effected peacefully by the universal power, and that power must secure the object of its action by providing education also.

THE SECRETARY AND SPECIE PAYMENTS.

THE Secretary of the Treasury says that he will adopt no policy that is likely to lead to a commercial crisis. But at the same time he suggests that the legal-tenders may be curtailed at the rate of six instead of four millions a month, and he has no suggestion whatever to offer with regard to the curtailment of National Bank notes. Here is a contradiction which some of the Secretary's friends might possibly do well to explain.

The National currency, of which about $300,000,000 are afloat, is redeemable in legal tenders. By law the National Banks are required at all times to hold legal tenders equal in amount to twenty-five per cent. of their liabilities. In fact, they are expected to be able to pay all their liabilities in legal tender on demand. There are at the present time about $385,000,000 of legal-tender notes in circulation. The Secretary curtails these at the rate of six millions a month, or $72,000,000 a year, wherewithal will the National Banks redeem their issues, and how shall we escape a commercial crisis?

Those who claim to know the private views of Secretary MCCULLOCH say that he is looking out for the Government, and for the Government only—leaving the National Banks to look out for themselves. If this be the case it would be but fair to say so. That the National Banks must break, if Mr. MCCULLOCH withdraws the legal tenders in which they are bound to redeem their issues, is too clear to need demonstration. But as a proposition for the public it will fall to the ground. Take away the base on which the superstructure of National Currency and National Bank discounts has been erected and the whole edifice must come down. There are many who hold that the National Banks must break sooner or later in any event. Without stopping to controvert this proposition, it must be clear to the meanest comprehension that they must break, and break badly, if the Government suffers them to go on issuing currency and expanding their circulation at the same time it is steadily withdrawing the medium in which their issues are redeemable and their deposits payable.

It is just possible, but not at all likely, that the United States Treasury assumes specie payments without a violent commercial crisis. To escape that crisis the change must be gradual and spread over a long period of time. Gold must decline slowly and steadily to par, prices must fall with it, and commerce and finance must contract pari passu, so that on the day of resumption the banks shall owe so little that they will be ready to pay. Such a gradual resumption is possible, as we said. But it is not in the least likely, and the main reason why it is not likely is, that the National Banks are morally certain to keep their issues out and their discount line full so long as they can legally do so. A few institutions here and there, managed by men of timid experience, will prepare for the storm in due season. But by far the greater number of the twelve hundred National Banks scattered over the country, if uncontrolled by law, will continue to lose currency and discount paper to the very last moment of their existence. This is the history of banking throughout the world.

To secure by law a resumption of specie payments without a commercial crisis would imperatively require restrictions upon the issues and the discounts of the National Banks. They should be compelled to hold a reserve of specie in proportion to their issues and their loans, such reserve to increase as legal tenders were withdrawn. To do this without ruin would involve a severe contraction of discounts and a large recall of currency. Whether such contraction could be effected at all except without causing wide-spread commercial distress is an open question. But it is clear that if the National Banks can not contract and reduce their issues without causing a financial crisis, that crisis has become inevitable, and the longer it is delayed the more severe will it prove.

No passage of the Secretary's Report is more thoughtworthy than the sentence in which he says that the past few years' experience of paper-money has so demoralized and debauched public sentiment that a few influential leaders of public opinion are actually opposed to all steps which lead to the resumption of specie payments. It is too true. At least two leading newspapers, about, to say nothing of half a dozen leading Members of Congress, are openly opposed to currency contraction, and to any and all measures which may tend to make the United States dollar equal in value to the dollar of other countries. It is notorious that, from being one of the cheapest, this has become one of the dearest countries in the world to live in; that taxation here is more oppressive than in Great Britain; that industry is becoming paralyzed, and commerce precarious; that our people are becoming poorer daily, while foreign nations are steadily enriching themselves at our expense; and that this state of things should be borne steadily worse, so long as our currency remains in a condition of disgrace. At the same time it is obvious that, the agony of resumption once passed, our resources are such that the country would speedily recover, the cost of living would fall, taxation would be lighter, the reward of industry and commerce would be sure, capital would flow hither from all parts of the world, and the condition of all classes would be improved. Yet, in spite of all this, there are found leading men and leading lights of opinion which denounce all measures leading to resumption, and cling to paper-money doctrines. Well may the Secretary declare that the experience of the past few years has debauched men's minds.

It now remains to be seen what action Congress will take on the recommendations of the Secretary. The majority are in the same temper as last year but little can be expected of them. It is said, however, that the cost of living has begun to tell upon the views of Western constituencies, and members who last winter were opposed to any reduction of the currency will now consent to invest Mr. MCCULLOCH with larger powers. It is due to him to say that his position has, in the main, entitled him to unusual confidence.

POLITICAL "CLAIMS."

AMONG the many ingenious explanations of Mr. SEWARD'S separation from the great body of his party, that which has long connected it one which declares him to have resolved upon the ruin of the party because it failed to nominate him for President at the Chicago Convention of 1860. This is the most common and the most popular speculation; and certainly none more shameful in itself, or, if true, more injurious to Mr. SEWARD, can be imagined. There are those in high positions, and of unquestioned honesty, who are reported to have quoted words of Mr. SEWARD'S which favor the suggestion. But we are quite sure that his present position has no such simple and summary explanation. The great political disappointment of his life is probably an element in the explanation; but his invincible optimism and the doctrinaire or theoretical tendency of his mind must both make part of any satisfactory theory.

Our object now, however, is not the solution of a painful problem, but to consider the ground upon which Mr. SEWARD'S disappointment is supposed to rest. This, in a word, is said to be the refusal of the party to recognize his claims. It is urged that he did more than any one else to create the Republican party, and to insure its success; that he gave all his powers to it; that he was its most conspicuous National leader; and that, when victory was probable, it was the duty of the party to recognize his claims by nominating him for the Presidency. But those who say this—Mr. SEWARD himself, if he think this—forget all the important facts. Mr. SEWARD is a politician. He left the Whig party when the Whig party was plainly gone forever as a political power, and he left just at the proper moment. Having taken his new position he naturally brought all his force to bear to fortify and maintain it. The party associates willingly acknowledged his services, and in his own State elected and re-elected him United States Senator.

But they did this not because he had any claim, or could have any claim, upon official position, but because he seemed to them by experience and capacity available for the best candidate. When his name was presented to the National Convention for the Presidency his experience and capacity were not denied, but because the country and the Convention that he was not an available candidate in Pennsylvania and other States which were essential to success, and that, even were his election probable, it would not be secure. It was called the Albany Lobby to Washington. Mr. SEWARD'S "claims" were not urged. In the brief and kindly speech in which the Chairman of the New York delegation moved that the nomination of Mr. LINCOLN be made unanimous he spoke of Mr. SEWARD as a statesman well known to the country and thoroughly proved, whose powers and sagacity would insure a faithful administration of the Government. But the statesman was much too wise to insinuate, whatever he in his heart believed, that the party or the Convention were ungrateful.

The truth is, that the people may claim any political service of any citizen, but no citizen can have any political claim whatever upon the choice of the public, except that which is founded upon the general conviction of capacity and discretion. The feebleness and inefficiency which are usually held to characterize the public service in many departments, as compared with private enterprise, arises from the custom of appointing men to office, not for fitness or competency, but for party service or "claims." Nominating conventions, like railroad carriages, or calls meetings, or breaks heads, and when success slights upon the party banner he is rewarded by a small office. We know one such statesman who, being in debt to his honest trade, sighed for the repose of a Customhouse berth, and who pleaded, not his capacity and industry and fidelity, but that he had "done all the dirty work of the party for ten years." And if it be a question of claims, his were indisputable.

Offices which involve the prompt and economical administration of the details of the Government, and still more those which involve its general foreign and domestic policy, can not be considered as the proper field to which claims may be established by party services without the most vital injury to the public welfare. Had Mr. SEWARD been elected opposed otherwise, and have felt that he was betrayed by his party because he was not nominated for the Presidency, only shows how false is a theory upon which there is no foundation to us. Suppose it had been adopted, and, because of his "claims," Mr. SEWARD had been nominated in 1860 and elected President. We prefer not to pursue the supposition further. Only let us remember that the sole claims to public trusts in this country which can be safely considered are superior wisdom or discretion, capacity, honesty, industry, and fidelity to equal human rights. Partisan diligence certainly does not invalidate these, but it can not supply their place.

FOREIGN WAR.

THE one thing for which every enemy of this country at home and abroad most fervently prays is a foreign war. Abroad, it would gratify the prophecies of every sour sympathizer with the rebellion who has insisted that the consequences of our victory would be a military spirit which must necessarily be fatal to a popular government; and at home, it would renew the trouble from which we are emerging. He is a very poor student of history and human nature who supposes that a war with England or France would unite the late insurgents heartily with the Government or the loyal country. It is one of those silly theories which can be entertained for a moment only by those who would leave the settlement of our national questions to emotions of generosity and an assumed fraternity. Nobody can seriously doubt that the spirit which still controls the late insurgent States would halt with delight the prospect of a foreign war. But it would be the opportunity of a lifetime of healing the breach by defending the Government; it would be satisfaction in the prospect of the overthrow of the Government. Suppose a foreign force, landing at any port below the Capes of Virginia, would it be repelled with energy by the late Confederates or zealous enthusiasm?

The answer to that question reveals the peculiar peril of foreign complication, and it also shows why Democratic leaders are not averse to it, and why the Administration should be closely watched. Public confidence in the President is not profound, and the course of the Secretary of State is not reassuring. There is nothing which the loyal people of this country would at this time so earnestly oppose as a foreign war; for it is in the power of an administration to put the country in a difficult position from which war may readily appear to be the only honorable escape. Congress will, therefore, undoubtedly require the amplest information upon every subject with which the State Department is charged. There is supposed to be in that Department a jealousy of Congressional inquisition—a feeling that inquiry is sometimes impertinence. But the State Department is but a branch of the public service, and Congress has the clear right to demand that the country shall know how it is being served; and, above all, shall know that its wishes and purposes are being thwarted.

The correspondence with France lately published shows how heartily LOUIS NAPOLEON wishes to get out of Mexico. He said last year that he would withdraw his troops in three divisions, the first to move in November. When November came he stated to Mr. BIGELOW that he proposed to remove the whole force at once, and perhaps all March. To this MR. SEWARD's reply was exactly what every body who has watched the Mexican affair expected. He said in effect that the presence of large bodies of United States troops upon the Mexican border, which occasionally crossed the line, their open sympathy with the American opponents of the empire, and the equally frank expression of opinion by General SHERIDAN, commanding in the Gulf Department, and of General GRANT, chief of the armies of the United States, made it impossible for him to divide his retiring forces, and would expose the last division left in the country to peculiar peril.

This is a very simple and sensible explanation, which, it seems to us, might have occurred to the Department of State. Indeed, in this age of common sense and general intelligence, a simpler and more sensible diplomacy had not wisely adopted than that which assumes that under all circumstances the other party is trying to do precisely the opposite of what it declares. When once the French occupation of Mexico was seen to be a total mistake and failure, the work of a sagacious diplomacy was to assume that the French Emperor wished to withdraw, as he undoubtedly did, and not to wear even an air of menace which would merely furnish him a pretext for rejoinder and debate.

CONGRESS.

CONGRESS has begun its work with a will. It seems very conscious that it is not to remain in session for eight months, and that after the long debate of the year the country looks seriously for results. There has been some boyish effervescence, and, of course, there has been a profuse shower of propositions from ever side to solve the problem of the time. We repeat the hope which we expressed during the last winter, that some representative whose radical convictions are unquestionable as those of MR. THADDEUS STEVENS will save Congress and the country from the disgrace of his unchecked talk and action. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should adjourn during the reading of the President's Message was not so much an insult to the President as to the whole country, and his remarks at the banquet of reception were both untimely and foolish.

That the President has disgracefully assailed MR. STEVENS is true. Does Congress then mean to make the President its model of decency? He is quite as good at the game of vindictive vituperation as MR. STEVENS. Did the President help himself or his cause by the 22d of February speech or by his Western speeches? Will Congress help itself by imitating him? MR. THADDEUS STEVENS should be taught that Congress is the immediate representative of the people of the United States, and that its forgetfulness of dignity and propriety is infinitely more offensive than that of the Executive officer.

It is a very common and a totally false idea that decency of manner and language is incompatible with strong conviction or effective action. We think that the President is a coarse man and must be coarsely encountered. No conclusion could be more untrue. A Congress which should steadily pursue its course, tranquilly fulfilling the popular will, quietly passing necessary bills over the Executive veto, without a word of derision or acrimony, and while it paralyzed any unwise or dangerous Executive attempts, preserved profound silence toward the Executive officer, would confound him a thousandfold more than a Congress which bandied insults with him. And so a leader who should represent the unbending popular will, and refuse to abandon himself to rhetorical or sarcastic fury, would have a power in the House, with the country, and over the Executive which MR. THADDEUS STEVENS, with all his brilliant antics, can never reach. Let us hope that some members will reflect that it was the apparent passion of the House to the vagaries of MR. THADDEUS STEVENS a year ago which so seriously disturbed its hold upon many of the most loyal men in the country, who, how ever, had no alternative but to support Congress when the issue was fairly joined in the canvass. If it be an impeachable offense, as General BUTLER seems to suppose, for the Executive Department of the Government to bring the Legislative into contempt, what is the remedy when the Legislative branch retorts? May not that account be considered settled, and the Impeachment be reserved?

The very power of Congress, however, and its support by the country, will tend to make it moderate and manly. The issue will be not a contest between it and the President, for the force is too much on one side. Even the Democrats desire this. Surely no public man ever encountered such sudden and utter retribution. It is not much more than a year since the chief orator at the Democratic Albany meeting nominated him for next President. Now not a Democratic leader in the House says that to attempt to slaughter the present Executive would secure very party. After that nothing can be said. The country has a right to demand honest, and efficient work from its representatives, and neither sneers nor sarcasms upon the President, or, at a time when they were legitimate weapons, but it is happily passed.

MURDER, CONTINUED.

THE ferry-boat Idaho, of the New York and Brooklyn Ferry Company, left her dock in Williamsburg on the evening of November 26, and when she had gone about five hundred yards a large flame was discovered to be issuing from a boat instantly took fire. The engines were reversed, the hose was rigged, but so rapid and fierce was the flame that it was impossible to regain the dock. Fortunately another ferry-boat, the Minnesota, came up and rescued the passengers. But she could not approach very near on account of the heat of the fire, and to save herself was compelled to leave several persons on the burning steamer. These, seizing whatever presented itself, leaped into the water, and were picked up by a row-boat.

Our readers will remember that we described a fire upon the Sound steamer, the Hayouth early in the year. That, also, was caused by a kerosene lamp. We earnestly advise every traveler, before embarking upon any steamer or whatever upon which he must pass the night, to ascertain whether it is lighted with oil lamps. If it does, let him with others act as a committee of vigilance and safety. And this should be done with the same spirit of the principle of examining every steamer whatever to light itself with kerosene lamps. Their use should be as rigorously prohibited upon steamers as the free transport of gunpowder. It is plain that unless some positive restriction is placed upon them, we shall presently record some appalling accident arising from their use.

Before the investigation of the loss of the Evening Star is satisfactorily finished there is that of the steamship Suwanee, which sailed from New York a year ago to-day in the wake of the Idaho. A day or two after she struck upon a shoal, and was got off only by lightening her of part of her cargo. She ran for the Delaware breakwater, intending to land her freight, and sailed again, apparently without examination or repair. On the 31st of December she was burned to the water's edge off the Carolina coast, and went down at about eight o'clock the next morning, the ship's company having previously put to sea in three boats. The superintendent of the Pacific Mail Company sailed from New York she was loaded down, "with her guards under water."

Human life is not only lost, it is squandered by such men. What is possible for suffering a steamer to go to sea loaded so heavily that her guards were under water? The Suwanee's freight was arms for the Republic of Mexico. Her owners are announced as MESSRS. SIMONS & CARY, of Philadelphia, and ELIJAH H. CATTELL, of New Jersey. By whom was she chartered? Somebody must be answerable for such a load. Somebody made sure of her destruction. How many vessels similarly doomed, if they chance to encounter a similar hurricane, are leaving the port of New York every week? The intelligent American people are sent to sea in winter in rotten old tubs overloaded and undermanned, or are burned to death in their berths in steamers with lighted kerosene lamps dancing along marble tables until they tumble and kindle the dry, light wood-work around them, and the kind folk good-naturedly think it is very shocking! If these lines are read by any traveler upon a steamer, we advise him again to look about him.

NOW AND THEN.

WE do not know where to look for a more striking illustration of the regeneration of the country than is to be found in the position, sympathies, and opinions of certain subjects, of the late and the present Chief Justice of the United States. It is not ten years since JUDGE TANEY uttered the Dred Scott decision, and misrepresented history to prove that in the idea of the American Government men of African descent had no rights which other men were bound to respect. It is now, happily, JUDGE CHASE, the President of the American Freedmen's Union Commission, and upon taking the chair at the last meeting of that Pennsylvania branch he said; "When I find myself in any position incompatible with labor for the poor, the needy, and the oppressed, that position shall not hold me."

Such words by such a man upon such an occasion show how heartily American sentiment is now tending toward the fundamental principle of Justice and Equal Rights.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 4:

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner gave notice of his intention to introduce resolutions for the entire control of Congress over the subject of reconstruction, and the right to exclude from it any State refusing from representation in Congress, and from voting on amendments.

In the House, an additional rule was adopted for the appointment by each member of a standing committee on the freedmen's affairs.—The Bounty bill of the last session was referred to the Military Committee for amendment, and the bill increasing the pay of members to the Judiciary was referred to special.—A resolution was adopted instating upon the adoption of the reconstruction amendment, also a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to inquire into the propriety of providing Territorial governments for the late rebel States.

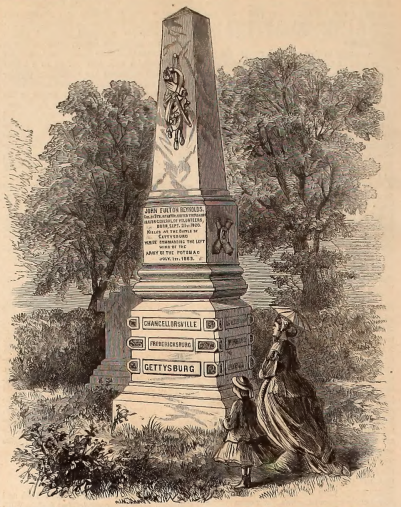
December 5:

In the Senate, a bill, introduced by Mr. Wade, for the admission of Nebraska into the Union as a State was ordered to lie upon the table for the present.—The committee of fifteen on conduct was announced.—A motion offered by Mr. Williams instructing the Committee on Reconstruction to inquire if the power of the President has the right to restore confiscated property under the late Act of United States, was adopted.—The House bill taking away the President's Amnesty power was referred to the Judiciary Committee.—Mr. Sumner then introduced the resolutions of which he had given notice the previous day. They were read and ordered to be printed.—The joint resolution providing a Constitutional Amendment basing suffrage and representation for re-election was referred.—The House tobacco committee bill for the reduction of taxation was concured in.

In the House, a bill was passed limiting the number of peremptory challenges in criminal cases; also a bill protecting the rights of the legal citizens in the South.

December 6:

In the Senate, Mr. Trumbull reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee the House bill to repeal the Amnesty power of the President. The bill went over under the rule.



In the House, the Post-Office Committee was instructed to inquire into the expediency of conferring upon the Post-Office Department the same jurisdiction over telegraph lines that it now exercises over post-offices and post-roads.—A Select Committee of three was appointed on Government Gas Works to investigate the Jolly rot.—The Judiciary Committee was instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law to be proclaimed in those counties of the Southern States where the laws have been murdered, and the laws not enforced against the murderers.—The Committee on Foreign Affairs was instructed to inquire as to the measures necessary to secure the recognition by other nations of the principle of our Naturalization Laws.—Mr. Schenck's bill to fix the times for the regular meeting of Congress was discussed at length. It was provided, in the first section, that Congress shall meet on the 4th of March.

December 10:

In the Senate, Mr. Wade reported back the bill for the admission of Nebraska, with a recommendation that it pass.—The report of the Committee on Reconstruction, to whom was referred the bill to regulate the elections in the District of Columbia, was read.—It declares

INFANT CLASS AT THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

Among the interesting features connected with the Ladies' Five Points Mission, established in this city on the site of the "Old Brewery," there is none more remarkable than the Infant Class, which is the subject of an illustration on this page. The room extends through the entire depth of the building, and is about twenty-five feet in width. Over two hundred children, varying from two to six years and of almost every nationality, are seated upon elevated forms, and are daily drilled in the alphabet, rudimentary spelling, and singing. In due time they are "promoted" to a class higher, and, if they can be retained long enough, are advanced to the higher studies taught in the institution. Over five hundred regular scholars throng the rooms of this flourishing Mission, and the Board of Managers are about making arrangements to enlarge the Mission buildings. No charity can more forcibly commend itself to our citizens. Our sketch represents the Infant Class at the time of dismission, in the act of receiving lunch.

Book I.—Fatal Friendship.

CHAPTER V.

THE LETTER FROM THE "ALLIANCE" OFFICE.

UPON the evening of the day on which Mrs. Halliday and the dentist had discussed the propriety of sailing in a strange doctor, George Sheldon came again to see his sick friend. He was quicker to perceive the changes in the invalid than the members of the household, who saw him daily and hourly, and he perceived a striking change for the worse to-night.

He could say, however, to suffer no evidence of alarm or surprise to appear in the sick chamber. He talked to his friend in the usual cheery way; sat by his bedside for half an hour; did his best to arouse Tom from a kind of stupid lethargy, and to encourage Mrs. Halliday, who showed the task of nursing her husband with brisk Nancy Woolper—an invaluable creature in a sick room. But he failed in both attempts; the dull apathy of the invalid was not to be dispelled by the most genial companionship, and George's spirits had been sinking lower and lower as the fears increased.

She would fain have called in a strange doctor; she would fain have sought for comfort and consolation from some new quarter. But she was afraid of offending Philip Sheldon; and she was afraid of alarming her husband. So she watched, and watched, and struggled against that ever-increasing anxiety. Had not Mr. Sheldon made light of his friend's malady, and what motive could he have for deceiving her?

A breakfast-cup full of beef-tea stood on the little table by the bedside, and had been standing there for hours untouched.

"I did take such pains to make it strong and clear," said Mrs. Woolper, regretfully, as she came to the little table during a tidying process, "and poor dear Mr. Halliday hasn't taken so much as a spoonful. It won't be fit for him to-morrow, so as I haven't eaten a morsel of dinner, what with the hurry and anxiety and one thing and another, I'll warm up the beef-tea for my supper. There's not a blessed thing in the house; for you don't eat nothing, Mrs. Halliday; and as to cooking a dinner for Mr. Sheldon, you'd a deal better go and throw your victuals out into the gutter, for then there'd be a chance of stray dogs profiting by 'em, at any rate."

"Phil is off his feed, then; eh, Nancy?" said George.

"I should rather think he is, Mr. George. I roasted a chicken yesterday for him and Mrs. Halliday, and I don't think they ate an ounces between them; and such a lovely tender young thing as it was too—done to a turn—with bread-sauce and a little bit of sea-kale. One invalid makes another, that's certain. I never saw your brother so upset as he is now, Mr. George, in all his life."

"No?" answered George Sheldon, thoughtfully; "Phil isn't generally one of your sensitive sort."

The invalid was sleeping heavily during this conversation. George stood by the bed for some minutes looking down at the altered face, and then turned to leave the room.

"Good-night, Mrs. Halliday," he said; "I hope I shall find poor old Tom a shade better when I look round to-morrow."

"I am sure I hope so," George answered, mournfully.

She was sitting by the window looking out at the darkening western sky, in which the lurid glimmer of a stormy sunset was fading against a back-ground of iron gray.

This quiet figure by the window, the stormy sky, and ragged hurrying clouds without, the dusky chamber with all its dismally significant litter of medicine-bottles, made a gloomy picture; a picture which the man who looked upon it carried in his mind for many years after that night.

George Sheldon and Nancy Woolper left the room together, the Yorkshirewoman carrying a tray of empty vials and glasses, and among them the cup of beef-tea.

"He seems in a bad way to-night, Nancy," said George, with a backward jerk of his head toward the sick chamber.

"He is in a bad way, Mr. George," answered the woman gravely. "Let Mr. Philip think what he will. I don't want to say a word against your brother's knowledge, for such a steady studious gentleman as he is had need be clever; and if I was all myself, I'd trust my life to him freely: for I've heard Barlingford folks say that my master's advice is as good as any regular doctor's, and that there's very little your regular doctors know that he doesn't know as well or better. But for all that, Mr. George, I don't think he understands Mr. Halliday's case quite as clear as he might."

"Do you think Tom's in any danger?"

"I won't say that, Mr. George; but I think he gets worse instead of getting better."

"Humph!" muttered George. "If Halliday were to go off the hooks, Phil would have a good chance of getting a rich wife."

"Don't say that, Mr. George!" exclaimed the Yorkshirewoman reproachfully; "don't even think of such a thing while that poor man lies at death's door. I'm sure Mr. Sheldon hasn't any thoughts of that kind. He told me before Mr. and Mrs. Halliday came to town that he and Miss Georgy had forgotten all about past times."

"Ah, if Phil said so, that alters the case. Phil is one of your blunt outspoken fellows, and always says what he means," said George Sheldon. And then he went down stairs, leaving Nancy to follow him at her leisure with the tray of jingling cups and glasses. He went down through the dusk, smiling to himself, as if he had just given utterance to some piece of intense humor. He went to look for his brother, whom he found in the torture-chamber, busied with some mysterious process in connection with a lump of plaster of Paris, which seemed to be the model of ruined battlements in the Gothic style. The dentist looked up as George entered the room, and did not appear particularly delighted by the appearance of that gentleman.

"Well," said Mr. Sheldon the younger, "busy as usual? Patients seem to be looking up."

"Patients be——" toothless to the end of time!" cried Philip, with a savage laugh. "No, I'm not working to order; I'm only experimentalizing."

"You're rather fond of experiments, I think, Phil," said George, seating himself near the table on which his brother was working under the glare of the gas. The dentist looked very pale and haggard in the gas-light, and his eyes had the dull sunken appearance induced by prolonged sleeplessness. George sat watching his brother thoughtfully for some time, and then produced his cigar-case. "You don't mind my smoke here?" he asked, as he lighted a cigar.

"Not at all. You are very welcome to sit here, if it amuses you to see me working at the cast of a lower jaw."

"Oh, that's a lower jaw, is it? It looks like the fragment of some castle-keep. No, Phil, I don't care about watching you work. I want to talk to you seriously."

"What about?"

"About that follow up stairs; poor old Tom. He and I were great cronies, you know, at home. He's in a very bad way, Phil."

"Is he? You seem to be turning physician all at once, George. I shouldn't have thought your grubbing among county business, and tattered old pedigrees, and parish registers had given you so deep an insight into the science of medicine!" said the dentist, in a sneering tone.

"I don't know any thing of medicine; but I know enough to be sure that Tom Halliday is about as bad as he can be. What mystifies me is, that he doesn't seem to have had any thing particular the matter with him. There he lies, getting worse every day, without any specific ailment. It's a strange illness, Philip."

"I don't see any thing strange in it."

"Don't you? Don't you think the surrounding circumstances are strange? Here is this man comes to your house hale and hearty; and all of a sudden he falls ill, and gets lower and lower every day, without any body being able to say why or wherefore."

"That's not true, George. Every body in this house knows the cause of Tom Halliday's illness. He came home in wet clothes, and insisted on keeping them on. He caught a cold; which resulted in low fever. There is the whole history and mystery of the affair."

"That's simple enough, certainly. But if I were you, Phil, I'd call in another doctor."

"That is Mrs. Halliday's business," answered the dentist, coolly; "she knows that if she doubts my skill, she is free to call in whom she pleases. And now you may as well drop the subject, George. I've had enough anxiety about this man's illness, and I don't want to be worried by you."

After this there was a little conversation about general matters, but the talk dragged and languished dreadfully, and George Sheldon rose to depart directly he had finished his cigar.

"Good-night, Phillip!" he said; "if ever you get a stroke of good luck, I hope you'll stand something handsome to me."

This remark had no particular relevance to any thing that had been said that night by the two men. Yet Philip Sheldon seemed in no wise astonished by it.

"If things ever do take a turn for the better with me, you'll find me a good friend, George," he said, gravely; and then Mr. Sheldon the younger bade him good-night, and went out into Fitzgeorge Street.

He paused for a moment at the corner of the street to look back at his brother's house. He could see the lighted windows of the invalid's chamber, and it was at those he looked.

"Poor Tom," he said to himself, "poor Tom! we were great cronies in the old times, and have had many a pleasant evening together!"

Mr. Sheldon the dentist sat up till the small hours that night, as he had done for many nights lately. He finished his work in the torture-chamber, and went up to the common sitting-room, or drawing-room as it was called by courtesy, a little before midnight. The servants had gone to bed, for there was no regular nightly watch in the apartment of the invalid. Mrs. Halliday lay on a sofa in her husband's room, and Nancy Woolper slept in an adjoining apartment, always wakeful and ready if help of any kind should be wanted.

The house was very quiet just now. Philip Sheldon walked up and down the room, thinking; and the creaking of his boots sounded unpleasantly loud to his ears. He stopped before the fire-place, after having walked to and fro some time, and began to examine some letters that lay upon the mantle-piece. They were addressed to Mr. Halliday, and had been forwarded from Yorkshire. The dentist took them up one by one, and deliberately examined them. They were all business letters, and most of them bore country post-marks. But there was one which had been, in the first instance, posted from London; and this letter Mr. Sheldon examined with especial attention.

It was a big, official-looking document, and embossed upon the adhesive envelope appeared the crest and motto of the Alliance Insurance Office.

I wonder whether that's all square," thought Mr. Sheldon, as he turned the envelope about in his hands, staring at it absently. "I ought to make sure of that. The London post-mark is nearly three weeks old." He pondered for some moments, and then went to the cupboard in which he kept the materials wherewith to replenish or to make a fire. Here he found a little tea-kettle, in which he was in the habit of boiling water for occasional friendly glasses of grog. He poured some water from a bottle on the sideboard into this kettle, set fire to a bundle of wood, and put the kettle on the blazing sticks. After having done this he searched for a tea-cup, succeeded in finding one, and then stood watching for the boiling of the water. He had not long to wait; the water boiled furiously before the wood was burned out, and Mr. Sheldon held the tea-cup standing on the table. Then he put the insurance-office letter over the vessel with the seal downward, and left it so, while he resumed his walk. After walking up and down for about ten minutes he went back to the table and took up the letter. The adhesive envelope opened easily, and Mr. Sheldon, by this ingenious stratagem, made himself master of his friend's business.

The Alliance" letter was nothing more than a notice to the effect that the half-yearly premium for insuring the sum of three thousand pounds on the life of Thomas Halliday would be due on such a day, after which there would be twenty-one days grace, at the end of which time the policy would become void unless the premium had been duly paid.

Mr. Halliday's letters had been suffered to accumulate during the last fortnight. The letters forwarded from Yorkshire had been detained some time, as they had been sent first to Hyley Farm, now in possession of the new owner, and then to Barlingford, to the house of Georgy's mother, who had kept them upward of a week, in daily expectation of her son-in-law's return. It was only on the receipt of a letter from Georgy, containing the tidings of her husband's illness, that Mr. Halliday's letters had been sent to London.

Thus it came about that the twenty-one days of grace were within four-and-twenty hours of expiry when Philip Sheldon opened his friend's letter.

"This is serious," muttered the dentist, as he stood deliberating with the open letter in his hand; "there are three thousand pounds depending on that man's power to write a check!"

After a few minutes' reflection he folded the letter and resealed it very carefully.

"It wouldn't do to press the matter upon him to-night," he thought; "I must wait till to-morrow morning, come what may."

THE QUIET FIGURE BY THE WINDOW.

CHAPTER VI.

MR. BURKHAM'S UNCERTAINTIES.

THE next morning dawned gray and pale and chill, after the manner of early spring mornings, let them ripen into never such balmy days; and with the dawn Nancy Woolper came into the invalid's chamber, more wan and sickly of aspect than the morning itself.

Mrs. Halliday started from an uneasy slumber.

"What's the matter, Nancy?" she asked, with considerable alarm. She had known the woman ever since her childhood, and she was startled this morning by some indefinable change in her manner and appearance. The hearty old woman, whose face had been like a bright apple shriveled and wrinkled by long keeping, had now a white and ghastly look which struck terror to Georgy's heart. She who was usually so brisk of manner and sharp of speech had this morning a strange, subdued tone and an unnatural calmness of demeanor. "What is the matter, Nancy?" Mrs. Halliday repeated, getting up from her sofa.

"Don't be frightened, Miss Georgy," answered the old woman, who was apt to forget that Tom Halliday's wife had ever ceased to be Georgy Craddock: "don't be frightened, my dear. I haven't been very well all night—and——don't've been worrying myself about Mr. Halliday. I've been up with him most part of the night. Never mind what Mr. Philip says. He may be mistaken, you know, clever as he is. There's no telling. Take my advice, Miss Georgy, and call in another doctor—directly—directly!" repeated the old woman, seizing Mrs. Halliday's arm with passionate energy, as if to give emphasis to her words.

Poor timid Georgy shrank from her with terror.

"You frighten me, Nancy," she whispered; "do you think that Tom is so much worse? You have not been with him all night; and he has been sleeping very quietly. What makes you so anxious this morning?"

"Never mind that, Miss Georgy. You get another doctor, that's all; get another doctor at once. Mr. Sheldon is a light sleeper. I'll go to his room and tell him you've set your heart upon having fresh advice; if you'll only bear me out afterward."

"Yes, yes; go, by all means!" exclaimed Mrs. Halliday, only too ready to take alarm under the influence of a stronger mind, and eager to act when supported by another person.

Nancy Woolper went to her master's room. He was have been sleeping very heavily, if he was sleeping at all, for he was broad awake the next minute after his housekeeper's light knock had sounded on the door. In less than five minutes he came out of his room half dressed. Nancy told him that Mrs. Halliday had taken fresh alarm about her husband, and would wait for further advice.

"She sent you to tell me that?" asked Philip.

"Yes."

"And when does she want this new doctor called in?"

"Immediately, if possible."

It was seven o'clock by this time, and the morning was brightening a little.

"Very well," said Mr. Sheldon: "her wishes shall be attended to directly. Heaven forbid that I should stand between my old friend and any chance of his speedy recovery! If a stone age can bring him round quicker than I can, let the stranger come."

Mr. Sheldon was not slow to obey Mrs. Halliday's behest. He was departing on his quest breakfastless, when Nancy Woolper met him in the hall with a cup of tea. He accepted the cup almost mechanically from her hand, and took it into the parlor, whither Nancy followed him. And then for the first time he perceived that change in his housekeeper's face which had so startled Georgina Halliday.

The change was somewhat modified now; but still the Nancy Woolper of to-day was not the Nancy Woolper of yesterday.

"You're looking very queer, Nancy," said the dentist, gravely scrutinizing the woman's face with his bright, penetrating eyes. "Are you ill?"

"Well, Mr. Philip, I have been rather queer all night—quite sick and faintish-like."

"Ah! you've been overstaticing yourself in the sick room, I dare say. Take care you don't knock yourself up."

"No; it's not that, Mr. Philip. There's not many can stand hard work better than I can. It's not that as made me ill. I took something last night that disagreed with me."

"More fool you," said Mr. Sheldon, curtly: "you ought to know better than to play with your digestive powers at your age. What was it? Hard cold meat and preternaturally green pickles, I suppose; or something of that kind."

"No, Sir; it was only a drop of beef-tea that I made for poor Mr. Halliday. And that oughtn't to have disagreed with a baby, you know, Sir."

"Oughtn't it?" cried the dentist, disdainfully. "What's a little bit of vulgar ignorance, Mrs. Woolper. I suppose it was stuff that had been taken up to Mr. Halliday."

"Yes, Mr. Philip; you took it up with your own hands."

"Ah! to be sure; so I did. Very well, then, Mrs. Woolper, if you know so much about atmospheric influences as I do, you'd know that food which has been standing for hours in the pestiferous air of a fever-patient's room isn't fit for any body to eat. The stuff made you sick, I suppose."

"Yes, Sir; sick to my very heart," answered the Yorkshire woman, with a strange mournfulness in her voice.

"Let that be a warning to you, then. Don't take any thing more that comes down from the sick room."

"I don't think there'll be any chance of my doing that long, Sir."

"What do you mean?"

"I don't fancy Mr. Halliday is long for this world."

"Ah, you women are always ravens!"

"Unless the strange doctor can do something to cure him. Oh, pray bring a clever man who will be able to cure that poor helpless creature my master, Mr. Philip, how you used to be used to be friends and play-fellows—brothers almost—when you was both bits of boys. Think how bad it might seem to evil-minded folks if he died under your roof."

The dentist had been standing near the door during this talk; during this conversation; and now for the first time he looked at his housekeeper with an expression of unmitigated astonishment.

"What, in the name of all that's ridiculous, do you mean, Nancy?" he asked, impatiently.

"What is my roof to do with Tom Halliday's illness—or his death, if it came to that? And what on earth can people have to say about it if he should die here instead of any where else?"

"Why, you see, Sir, you being his friend, and Miss Georgy's sweet-heart that was, and him having your doctor, folks might take it into their heads he wasn't attended properly."

"Because I'm his friend? That's very good logic! And will you what it is, Mrs. Woolper; if any woman upon earth, except the woman who nursed me when I was a baby, had presumed to use me as you have been presuming to me just this minute, I should open the door yonder and tell her to walk out of my house. Let that serve as a hint for you, Nancy; and don't you go out of your way a second time to advise me how I should treat my friend and my patient."

He handed her the empty cup and walked out of the house. There had been no passion in his tone. His accent had been only that of a man who has occasion to reprove an old and trusted servant for an unwarrantable impertinence. Nancy Woolper stood at the street-door watching him as he walked away, and then went slowly back to her duties in the lower regions of the house.

"It can't be true," she muttered to herself; "it can't be true!"

The dentist returned to Fitzgeorge Street in less than an hour, bringing with him a surgeon from the neighborhood, to whom the nurse discussed the treatment, spoke hopefully to Mrs. Halliday, and departed, after promising to send a saline draught. Poor Georgy's spirits, which had revived a little under the influence of the stranger's hopeful words, sank again when she discovered that the utmost the new doctor could do was to order a saline draught. Her husband had taken so many saline draughts, and had been getting daily worse under their influence.

She watched the stranger wistfully as he lingered on the threshold for a few words to Mr. Sheldon. He was a very young man, with a frank, boyish face and a rosy color in his cheeks. He looked like some fresh young hero, plyin in the awful mysteries of medical science, and by no means the sort of man to whom one would have imagined Georgina Halliday appealing for help, when he found his own skill at fault. But then it must be remembered that Mr. Sheldon had only mentioned the stranger in connection with what he considered a womanish whim.

"He looks very young," Georgina said, regretfully, after the doctor's departure.

"So much the better, my dear Mrs. Halliday," answered the dentist, cheerfully; "medical science is emmanently progressive, and the youngest men are the best educated men."

Poor Georgy did not understand this; but it sounded convincing; and she was in the habit of believing what people told her; so she accepted Mr. Sheldon's opinion. How could she doubt that he was wiser than she was in all matters connected with the medical profession?

"Tom seems a little better this morning," she said presently.

The invalid was asleep, shrouded by the curtain of the heavy old-fashioned four-post bedstead.

"He is better," answered the dentist; "so much better, that I shall venture to give him a few business letters that have been waiting for him some time, as soon as he wakes."

He seated himself by the head of the bed, and waited quietly for the waking of the sick man.

Tom's breakfast is ready for you down stairs, Mrs. Halliday," he said, presently; "hadn't you better go down and take it while I keep watch here? It's nearly ten o'clock."

"I don't care about any breakfast," Georgina answered, piteously.

"Ah, but you'd better eat something. You'll make yourself an invalid if you are not careful; and then you won't be able to attend upon Tom."

This argument prevailed immediately. Georgy went down stairs to the parlor, and actually tried hard to eat and drink, in order that she might be sustained in her attendance upon her husband. She had forgotten all the little comforts of appetite which she had endured on his account. She had forgotten his late hours and unholy vagrancies. She had forgotten the years of waiting and expectation, and the long pain of the blood room up stairs sick to death.

Mr. Sheldon waited with all'cotward show of patience for the awakening of the invalid. But he looked at his watch twice during that half-hour of waiting; and once he rose and moved softly about the room, searching for writing materials. He found a little port-folio of Georgina's, and a frivolous-minded stand, with a gilt rim, embrance of an apple, with a gilt stalk and leaflet. The dentist took the trouble to ascertain that there was a decent supply of ink in the glass bottle, and that the pens were in working order. Then he went quietly back to his seat by the bedside and waited.

The invalid opened his eyes presently, and recognized his friend with a feeble smile.

"Well, Tom, old fellow, I'm glad you feel today's a little better, I hear from Mrs. H.," said the dentist, cheerily.

"Yes, I think I am a shade better. But, you see, the device of it is I never get more than a shade better. It always stops at that. The little woman can't complain of my appetite, can she, Sheldon? No more can the hours, or oyster-suppers, eh?"

"No, no, not just yet. You'll have to take care of yourself for a week or two when you get about again."

Mr. Halliday smiled faintly as his friend said this.

"I shall be very careful of myself if I ever do get about again, you may depend upon it, old fellow! But the doctor has sometimes fancy I have spent my last jolly evening, and eaten my last oyster-supper on this earth, for the last year or more; so he has to think seriously of a good many things. The little woman is all right, and I'm all right, and every thing pretty heavily soon after my marriage. Old Cradock never let me rest till that was done. But Georgy will be all right, you know. A man has led a careless, godless kind of a life—doing very little harm perhaps, but doing no particular good to himself or others, and not bothering his account somehow for a better world, when he feels himself slipping out of this. I asked George to pray for me yesterday, and the poor, dear loving little thing was frightened out of her wits. 'Oh, don't talk like that, Tom!' she cried; 'for I'm sure Sheldon says you're better for every hour'—by which you may guess what a rare thing it is for me to read my Bible. No, Phil, old fellow! I'm not made of that sort, I know; but I'm not made of a very tough material, and all the physic you can pour down this poor throat of mine won't put any strength into me."

"Nonsense, dear boy! that's just what a man who has not been accustomed to illness is sure to think directly he is laid up for a day or two."

"I've been laid up for three weeks," murmured Mr. Halliday, feebly, "and more."

"Well, well, perhaps this Mr. Burkham will bring you round in three days, and then you'll say that your friend Sheldon was an ignoramus."

"No, no, I sha'n't, old fellow! I'm not such a fool as that. I'm not going to blame you when it's my own constitution that's in fault. As to that young man you brought here just now, to please Georgy, I don't suppose he'll do any more for me than you have done."

"We'll contrive to bring you round between us, never fear, Tom," answered Philip Sheldon, in his most hopeful tone. "By and by, you are looking almost your old self this morning. You are so much improved that I may venture to talk to you about business. There have been some letters lying about for the last few days. I didn't like to bore you while you were so very low, but they look like important letters; and perhaps it would be as well for you to open them."

The sick man contemplated the little packet which the dentist took from his breast-pocket, and then shook his head wearily.

"I'm not up to the mark, Sheldon," he said; "the letters must keep."

"Oh, come, come, old fellow! That's giving way, you know. The letters may be important; and it will help you good if you make an effort to rouse yourself."

"I tell you it isn't in me to do it, Philip Sheldon. I'm just making efforts. Can't you see that, man? Open the letters yourself if you like."

"No, no, Halliday, I won't do that. Here's one with the seal of the Alliance Insurance Office. I suppose your premium is all right?"

Tom Halliday looked up on his elbow for a moment, startled into new life; but he sank back upon the pillows again immediately, with a feeble groan.

"I don't know about that," he said, anxiously; "you'd better look to that, Phil, for the little woman's sake. I'm not to think that that his insurance is settled and done with when he has been pommelled about by the doctors and physic'd by the chemists. I regrets there's that little matter of the premium. You'd better open the letter, Phil. I never was a good hand at remembering dates, and this illness has thrown me altogether out of gear."

Mr. Sheldon tore open that official document which, in his business capacity for his friend's interest, he had manipulated so cleverly on the previous evening, and read the letter with all the show of deliberation.

"You're right, Tom!" he exclaimed, presently. "The twenty-one days' grace expire to-day. You'd better write me a check, at once, and I'll send it on to the office by hand. Where's your check-book?"

"In the pocket of that coat hanging tye there."

Philip Sheldon found the check-book and brought it to his friend, with Georgy's port-folio, and the frivolous gilt-rim glass inkstand in the shape of an apple. He adjusted the writing materials for the sick man's use with womanly tenderness, and watched the wasted frame as Tom Halliday slowly and laboriously filled in the check; and when the signature was duly appended he carefully blotted and drew a long breath, which seemed to express infinite relief of mind.

"You'll be sure it goes on to the Alliance Office, eh, old fellow?" asked Tom, as he tore out the oblong slip of paper and handed it to his friend. "It's a kind of thing to jog my memory about this business. I'm such a follow for procrastinating matters. And I'm afraid I've been a little off my head for the last week."

"Nonsense, Tom! not you."

"Oh yes, I have. I've had all sorts of queer fancies. I've seen that little room the night before last when Georgy was asleep?"

Mr. Sheldon reflected for a moment before answering.

"No," he said; "not the night before last.

"Ah! I thought as much," murmured the invalid. "I've had that night there, Sheldon, Phil, for I fancied I saw you; and I fancied I heard the bottles and glasses jingling on the little table below the lamp."

"You were dreaming, perhaps."

"Oh no, I wasn't dreaming. I was very restless and wakeful that night. However, that's neither here nor there. I lie in a stupid state sometimes for hours and hours, and I feel as weak as a rat, hardly and literally, so while I have my wits about me I'd better say what I've been wanting to say ever so long. You've been a good and kind friend to me all through this illness, Phil, and I'm not ungrateful for your kindness. It is done come to the worst with me as it has with many, I shall Georgy shall give you a handsome mourning-ring, or fifty pounds to buy one, if you like it better. And now let me shake hands with you, old fellow, and say thank you heartily, old fellow! for once and forever."

The invalid stretched out a poor, feeble, attenuated hand, which, in a moment's pause, Philip Sheldon clasped it in his own muscular fingers. He did hesitate for just one instant before taking that hand.

He was no student of the Gospel, but when he had left the sick chamber there arose before him suddenly, as if written in letters of fire on the wall opposite to him, one sentence which had been familiar to him in his school-days at Barlingford:

And as soon as he was come, he goeth straightway to him, and saith, Master, Master; and kissed him.

The new doctor came twice a day to see his patient. He seemed rather anxious about the case, and was much puzzled by the symptoms. Georgy had sufficient penetration to perceive that this new adviser was in some manner at fault; and she began to think that Philip Sheldon was right, and that regular practitioners were very stupid creatures. She communicated this opinion to Mr. Burkham, and suggested the expediency of calling in some grave elderly doctor to supersede Mr. Burkham. But against this the dentist protested very strongly.

"You asked me to call in a stranger, Mrs. Halliday, and I have done so," he said, with the dignity of an offended man. "You must now abide by his treatment, and content yourself with his advice, unless he chooses to summon further assistance."

Georgy was fain to submit. She gave a little plaintive sigh and went back to her husband's room, where she sat and wept silently behind the bed-curtains. There was a double watch kept in the chamber now; for Nancy Woolper rarely left it, and rarely closed her eyes. It was altogether a sad time in the dentist's house; and Tom Halliday apologized to his friend more than once for the trouble he had brought upon him. If he had been familiar with the details of modern history he would have quoted Charles Stuart, and begged a pardon for being so heavy-dying.

But soon there came a gleam of hope. The patient seemed decidedly better; and Georgy was prepared to revere Mr. Burkham, the Bloomsbury surgeon, as the greatest and ablest of men. Those shadows of doubt and perplexity which had at first obscured Mr. Burkham's brow cleared away, and he spoke very cheerfully of the invalid.

Unhappily this state of things did not last long. The young surgeon came one morning, and was obviously alarmed by the appearance of his patient. He told Philip Sheldon as much, as the gentleman made very light of his fears. As the two men discussed the case it was very evident that the irregular practitioner was quite a match for the regular one. Mr. Burkham listened deferentially, but departed only half convinced. He walked briskly away from the house, then came to a dead stop directly after turning out of Fitzgeorge Street.

"What ought I to do?" he asked himself. "What course ought I to take? If I am right, I should be a villain to let things go on. If I am wrong, and by my interference I would ruin me for life."

He had finished his morning round, but he did not go straight home. He lingered at the corners of quiet streets, and walked up and down the unfrequented side of a gloomy square. Once he turned and retraced his steps in the direction of Fitzgeorge Street. But after all this hesitation he walked home, and ate his dinner very thoughtfully, considering his young wife's fondom when she talked to him. He was a struggling man, who had invested his small fortune in the purchase of a practice, and had entered out a very poor one, and he had the battle of life before him.

"I have something on your mind to-day, I'm sure, Harry," his wife said before the meal was ended.

"Why yes, dear," he answered; "I've rather a difficult case in Fitzgeorge Street, and I'm anxious about it."

The industrious little wife disappeared after dinner, and the young surgeon walked up and down the room alone, brooding over that difficult case in Fitzgeorge Street. Something nearly an hour thus he snatched his hat suddenly from the table on which he had set it down, and hurried from the house.

"I'll have advice and assistance, come what may," he said to himself, as he walked rapidly in the direction of Bloomsbury. "I'll have it. The case may be straight enough—I certainly can't see that the man has any motive—but I'll have advice."

He looked up at the dentist's spotless dwelling as he crossed the street. The blinds were all down, and the fact that they were so sent a sudden chill to his heart. But the April sunshine was full upon that side of the street, and there might be no significance in those closely-drawn blinds. The door was opened by a sleepy-looking boy, and in the passage Mr. Burkham met Philip Sheldon himself.

"I have been rather anxious about my patient since this morning, Mr. Sheldon," said the surgeon; "and I've come to the conclusion that I ought to confer with a man of higher standing than myself. Do you think Mrs. Halliday will object to such a step?"

"I am sure she would not have objected to it," the dentist answered very gravely, "if you had suggested it sooner. I am sorry to say the suggestion comes too late. My poor friend breathed his last half an hour ago."

END OF BOOK I.

INDIAN BARBARITIES—THE BOX FAMILY.

As a specimen of perils to which the settlers on our Southwestern frontier are exposed, we have only to refer to the sad story of the Box family, recently published in the Leavenworth (Kansas) Chief of the Kiawas. by Lieutenant Hensellebeek, of the Third United States Infantry. The ransom took place some sixty or eighty miles south of the Arkansas River.

The prisoners all belonged to one family, and at the time they were taken by the Indians were returning from a visit to some sick relatives, and were but a few miles from home when surprised and captured.

In the melée that ensued the head of the family (James Box) was killed and scalped. The remaining members of the family were immediately taken, placed on animals, and hurried to the haunts of the savages. The names of those secured were Mr. Box and child (11 months old), and three daughters—Margaret, aged 17 years; Josephine, 13 years old; and Mary Jane, 9 years old. Many of their relentless foe the child fell from the arms of its mother while the Indians were goading the worn-out animals that bore her. It was crushed to death among the rocks; the anguish-stricken mother not being even allowed to dismount and see if the child was dead or not. The remaining seven were subjected to the most unheard-of cruelties and outrages by their brutal captors, while the youngest, owing to her youth, although she shared a fate less horrible, was, nevertheless, most barbarously used. The child, unable to understand the commands of her fiendish taskmasters, was placed with her feet on live coals until they were literally roasted. This was the pastime of squaws. When rescued she had almost forgotten her mother tongue.

The family had been in captivity ten weeks when Lieutenant HERMENEGILDO, toward the close of September, heard of their situation from some friendly Indians. The Lieutenant started immediately from Fort Bridger, where he was stationed, and went to the Indian camp of LANTANTA, accompanied by two soldiers and a friendly Indian chief. LANTANTA, insisted upon a ransom, and, to save delay in rescuing the captives, this was yielded. The family belonged to TEXAS; after their rescue they were brought to Fort Leavenworth.

LANDING OF A MISSISSIPPI STEAMBOAT.

ALL steamers plying on the Western waters carry a brasier, in which, when making a landing, or loading and unloading freight at night, a brilliant flame is preserved by filling it with dry pine chips. Flickering with a lurid glare, it produces most fantastic effects of light and shade, as the swarthy "hands" pass and repass, "wooding up," or stand grouped around the gang-plank. When the steamboat backs out again the brasier is reversed to a dexterous twirl or its axis, the blazing coals are dropped in swirling waters, and darkness reigns again. A. R. W.

THE REYNOLDS MONUMENT.

A BEAUTIFUL Monument was erected to the memory of Major-General J. F. REYNOLDS, April 13, 1865, in Lancaster Cemetery, Lancaster City, Pennsylvania. It is inclosed in a lot, together with six smaller monuments, by a fence of cedar. The monument is built of white marble. It is sixteen feet high and four feet square at the base. Upon each side it contains the names of ten battles—namely, FORT BROWN, MONTEREY, BUENA VISTA, ROGUE RIVER, CHANCELLORSVILLE, GAINEY'S MILL, SECOND BULL RUN, FREDERICKSBURG, CHANCELLORSVILLE, and GETTYSBURG. Upon the shaft, in front, are cut, in bas-relief, a sash, belt, gauntleted sword, and a pistol; upon the right side, two cannons crossed, and a large 3 in the centre; on the left, crossed flags; and behind, an eagle and a United States shield.

NEW RAILROAD BRIDGE ACROSS THE SUSQUEHANNA.

THIS work, which we illustrate on page 808, connects Perryville on the north side of the Susquehanna, with Havre de Grace, on the south, and makes the route from Philadelphia to Washington an uninterrupted one. Hitherto the Susquehanna at this point has been crossed by means of ferryboats. The opening of this bridge by the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company was celebrated November 26. The engineers and practical bridge-builders and railroad officers from other states have thoroughly examined it in great structure in all its parts, and are unanimous in their approval of the strength, beauty, and perfect safety of the bridge, which has already been tested by a weight of four times that of a train of loaded cars, in its entire length of three-fourths of a mile. And the result in their praise of the ecclesignius shown by its able engineer, GEORGE A. PARKER, and of the foresight and courage of the originator, JOSEPH M. PATTON, the late President of the road, who has been so well succeeded by ISAAC HINKLEY. The bridge has cost fully one and a half millions of dollars, but will be hailed as being worth even that heavy sum, though it is an enormous outlay for one structure on a road of but one hundred miles in length.

THE OCEAN YACHT-RACE.

WE have had within a year or two several magnificent experiments of what could be done with boats. Of these the ROSE WINDS cigar-yacht experiment, and its across the Atlantic made by the Red, White, and Blue are notable examples. But even these are now thrown into the shade by the race now lying on across the Atlantic by the yachts Henrietta, Fleetwing, and Vesta. A wager of thirty thousand dollars is staked by each yacht on its own success. The winning vessel will therefore secure sixty thousand dollars and an enviable reputation. Extensive preparations are being made by Lloyd's and yachts to receive them upon their venturers from the American metropolis. In the course of a few days the Atlantic Telegraph will announce the result of the race.

The tonnage of the three yachts is nearly alike, the Fleetwing being of 204 tons, the Henrietta 203, and the Vesta 201. These yachts are the three most swiftest ever built in the United States. The following are the articles of agreement entered into by the owners (page 2):

GEORGE and FRANK OGDEN bet PIERRE LORILLARD, JUN., and others, thirty thousand dollars that the Fleetwing can beat the Vesta to the Needles, on the coast of England. The yachts to start from Sandy Hook on the second day of December, and to sail over according to the rules of the New York Yacht Club, waiving the allowance of time. The sails to be carried are mainsail, foresail, jib, flying-jib, jib-topsail, fore and main gaff-topsails, main-topmast stay-sails, main stay-sails and try-sails.

The yacht Henrietta enters the above race by paying thirty thousand dollars, subscription by members of the New York Yacht Club. Any minor points not embraced in the above, that can not be settled by Messrs. OGDEN, LORILLARD, and ROCKWELL shall be decided as follows: Each shall choose an umpire, and the umpires chosen, in case of disagreement, to choose a third; twenty per cent. of the money to be deposited with Mr. LEONARD W. JEROME on Saturday, the 23d of November; balance to be deposited on the first Tuesday of December—play or pay.

VICTOR EMANUEL IN VENICE.

IN our last Number we illustrated the announcement of the result of the Venetian Plebiscite from the balcony of the Doge's Palace. The scene which we illustrate on page 812 represents the arrival of King VICTOR EMANUEL'S barge, and is directly in front of the Doge's Palace, which is too far to the right to be embraced in the picture. On the left, also, only the heads of a large number of gondolas, crowded and arranged for the festival, appear.

The Italian King made his triumphal entry on November 7. There were present about half a million of people in Venice on that day. The special correspondent of the New York Tribune thus describes the scene:

"Welcome to our elected King, Victor Emanuel!"

The pillars of the Piazzetta are crowded with the names of the heroes of the war of independence, and the battles they fought there. The Royal platform, shelved down to the canal, where the splendid gondolas were waiting for the King coming from the Lido with the Podesta here, every housetop, and window, and foot of the Campanile, every square inch of space, being varying the tri-color, whether in flag or handkerchief, and the thunder of cannon from the Arsenal. The day was bright on city and canal. "The King, with a sort of Napoleonic step, walked steadily into the Podesta's face; he bowed with grave graciousness to balcony and boxes, and behind him came the Royal Princes, borne by the National Guards, whose close ranks made an aisle of citizen grey, through the crowd for those spaces we may contradict, but to counteract the narrow-minded, the land the canal was deep enough, and all of them having their canopies withdrawn, and bobbing in the naked shells their proud compartments.

The whole surface of the water, even to fir recesses of the deserted streets, was covered with gondolas. There was an expectant humanity, constretching hands. "Viva Vittorio!" "Viva Emanuele!" "Viva il Re!" and that none dared pass; they climbed upon the flying bridges which connect the opposite sides of small canals by was one great frame-work of boys and men; some were perched upon the projecting cornices of houses whose adventurous even to death. The King, uncovered, in the midst of the cheering and waving household, followed by the Ambassadors of almost every civilized state, walked majestically to the throne. He was very tender-hearted, but an excellent whaleman, whose power of vision was truly remarkable. He stood on the starboard side of me, shrinking with all the force of his lungs:

"There blows!—there blow-on-a!—there—there blows!—there!"

"Where away!" thundered old Captain Boom, glancing deft.

"On the weather-bow, four miles off, heading to leeward!"

This answer sent an electric thrill through every vein; the old ship lurched as if she felt it too.

Up came old Boom, with spy-glass slung over his shoulder, mounting two rattlines at a time. When on the crosstrees he just put one eye squint with his telescope; then his voice rang through the ship like a great organ pipe through a cathedral:

"Back the main-yard—clear away the boats!" It would have done you good to see the men jump to falls and tackles. The ship was very slowly, and Boom went down like lightning by means of a buck-stay.

Zadik, following him, sprung like a deer into the starboard boat.

"Lower away!" growled the Captain. Bus-s-s! bu-r-r-r! sounded the falls, and in a second was the four boats, almost simultaneously, into the water.

The merry dogs bundled into them, and away they flew, the Captain's taking the lead.

"Snap your oars, ye griffins! Make the fin fly, my hearties! Long and strong's the word. Break your backs every mother's son of ye!" grizzled the old fellow through his teeth.

In a thin-armed manner the officers encouraged their crews, until they had proceeded about four miles, when orders were given to stop pulling.

"Now ye see, my hearties, what it is, if you get alongside a whale!" said the skipper, to his son —a lad of fifteen, who belonged to the after-thwart on the first mate's boat.

Tom—the ship's favorite—smiled and shook his curly head. At the same moment the water broke into a whirlpool a few fathoms astern.

There was a hurried whispering; then the boats were forced round as a very small whale—a calf—rose to the surface. We perceived at once that the creature had been struck by some other crew, for the shank of an iron protruded from its body. It seemed very quiet, and lay on the water as if asleep—yet now and then reeling sideways with sudden plunge. It swam in a circle as if bewildered, and the voice of its spouting gave reminder me of the wailing of a child.

"Paddle ahead!" was the order, for every man believed that the mother of the calf—the cow whale —was not far off.

The first cow was soap within darting distance.

"Give it to him!" he shrieked, and while, whiz! went the harpooner's irons, one after the other, into the animal's body. For a few moments the little whale, as if half stupefied, remained nearly motionless; then, breathing, it came down, writhing and whirling in its throes in great agony, after which it sounded. It was too weak to drag the boat very fast or very far; it soon rose about fifty yards ahead.

"Haul line!" ordered the mate, now at the boat's bow, lance in hand.

As he spoke the water on one side of the calf suddenly parted with a roar like a cataract, and an enormous leviathan—the cow whale—boomed up from the nether, beating the sea with her flukes and spouting thunder.

Round and round her offspring she swam, but seeing nothing to fight, remained with astonishment and grief at the situation of the sufferer. A moment she remained thus, then moved ahead slowly and gently, occasionally rubbing as if to entice the little creature to follow. In fact the calf endeavored to do so, but was too badly crippled to swim; it made a few feeble plunges toward its parent and then began to writhe and wheel in great agony. Perceiving that it was now in its flurry, the mate stepped into the bows, remained watching the animal until its blood-red spout no longer rose, and it rolled over quite dead.

Now the behavior of its mother was pitiful to witness. She seemed unwilling to believe that her young one was really dead. Round it she slowly swam, spouting with a noise something between a shriek and a gasp. Then she moved ahead as before, and like one half crazed, seemed not yet to have abandoned the hope of being followed by her offspring.

Meanwhile her enemies were rapidly but stealthily advancing. Soon the Captain who was foremost was near enough to dart.

"Let her have it!" he growled. Zadik raised his harpoon, and at the same moment the cow partly rolled its great head against the little whale, as if to ascertain the reason why it would not follow her.

Zadik forwarded the fatal iron with all his might, and the whale's just like a human mother, Captain," said he, "and I haven't the heart to strike it!"

"Dog!" hissed Boom, "what ails ye? Dart! dart! Let it fly!"

As he spoke a sudden change came over the whale, which now, half turning, saw the boat. Wrathful and wild for revenge, she wheeled, the sea for length of her enormous body, out of water; then falling back with the din of a hundred thunder-bolts, she struck the bow of the boat, her bristling jaw wide open, her broad flukes beating the sea!

"Starn! starn!" gritted old Boom, and every man of his crew obeyed—Zadik turned pale.

The harpooner had changed with the leviathan. The flash of fight was now on his cheek, and there was fire in his eye. His dark brow was wrinkled; the ends of his straight black hair bristled like spear points. He motioned to the Captain to keep out of a little, and, leaning sideways, cast iron whizzing into the side of the monster's hump!

Maddened with pain, fiercer than ever, the whale made a swift lunge toward the boat, which she must have grappled had not the Captain, by a dexterous movement, whirled the light vessel to one side. Having baffled her foe, she turned, shaking a savage warning with her flukes as she disappeared. Away went the boat, swift as a whirlwind, the line humming around the gunwale, and the crew cheering like wild demons in answer to the cheers of those who were pulling after them.

Zadik and the Captain changed places, and the "old lion," as we called Boom, soon had his lance ready. The whale came up a quarter of an hour after, and Boom's iron flew to order. When with in darting distance the skipper sent his long weapon quivering into the monster's body. Enraged beyond all bounds, she came booming toward us in a cloud of whirling spray tossed by her busy flukes.

"Starn! starn!" from the "old lion," and every man he might be—was under darting his lance into the whale or pulling it back. Thicker and faster flew the spray, almost hiding the animal from us, until suddenly she rose, bursting from the white foam cloud, we saw the bristling jaw within six inches of the skipper!

Had the stroke of Zadik failed him, the old man must have perished the next minute. But the voice of the hair-breed rang like the clang of a hammer, and with ready presence he whirled the boat's broadside toward the monster, and then gave the order to "starn!"

Stop! were the monster's closing jaw, just missing the boat's bow; and whiz-s-s! went the old lion's lance again into her body alongside the hump!

Now, as the chief furiously toward us, our shipmates arrived to take part in the combat.

The long-limbed first mate, who had left the calf to be towed by the mate's boat's crew from the ship, attacked the monster on one flank, while the Captain and his second and third mates battled desperately upon the other. The cheers of the men, the crashing of the whale's flukes, mingling with such wild cries as "Lay me on!" "Keep off a little!" "Now then—now then!" "Starn! starn! starn!" "Pull ahead!" "Hoo, hoo! take that, old queen!" "Mind yourself at that oar!" "Now then, Spouter—now then!" "A good sight!" "Whang! whang! whang! three lances into her that time!" "Horns! horns!" etc., etc., were heard on all sides, while a few words in the spray that no man could see his neighbor distinctly.

Vigorously pressed—with lance after lance piercing her body—her jaws and flukes avoided by the vigilant harpooners—the whale soon acknowledged the power of her assailants by sending up into the sky—rocket-like—a red fountain of blood! With exultant screams the lancers, still attacking, buried their weapons in the quivering body, from which the spout rose darker and lower every moment.

Suddenly, with one tremendous whirl of her flukes, she struck the first mate's boat, shivering it to atoms! Then slowly round and round she swam, the dark blood-spout now ascending scarcely six feet high!

The Captain and his third and second officers cheered her with their lances, when, turning over, she showed half lifting her flukes and head in one last spasm of agony, she expired!

The first mate's crew, being good swimmers, had not yet been picked up; in fact, the Captain had been too busy to notice which vessel was thrown. Now, as the poor fellows were helped into his boat, he looked in vain for his son!

The sad story was soon told; poor little Tom was far down under the sea, whither his frame, dragged by the whale's flukes, had been dragged by sharks.

The Captain groaned and bowed his head. He did not lift it until we were alongside the ship. While we were cutting in the whale we looked in vain for him.

"He's down in the cabin," said the mate, "weeping and sobbing like a child. He will never be a happy man again!"

"Ay, ay!" said Zadik, gloomily. "I felt as if no good would come of our striking that whale! We killed her offspring, and she killed the Captain's son!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A NEW READING.—"Dirt cheap!" is the usual expression, but the conversation between fifth and clerk, which we know to our cost exists, makes it certain that we ought now to say DIRT dear.

An old writer quotes the following neat epigram in praise of women:

"Adam alone in Paradise did grieve,
And thought Eden a desert without Eve,
Until God, pitying the lonesome state
Crowned all his wishes with a lovely mate:
No reason then hath Man to find fault with a Wife,
Who could not live in Paradise without her."

Ah! but neither could he live there with her!

KATCHEN'S CAPRICES.

IN TEN CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

It was a pretty picture, prettily set, that fair young face crowned with a lavish abundance of plaited tresses, looking forth from the quaintly-carved window frame! The owner of the face was Katerina Kester: and if you had lived in the village of Gosenn, or within twenty English miles of it, I should not have need to say more. You would have known her by reputation, if not by sight. But, as it is, I had better explain who she was. Katerina's father, Josef Kester, kept an inn at the village of Gosenn, in Upper Austria, close to the beautiful lake of Hallstadt. Not the inn where travelers stopped to dine and bait their horses, and wherein one took beds for excessively little, but the inn where the Black Eagle. Josef's hostelry bore the sign of the Golden Lamb, and it was of somewhat higher pretensions, being frequented only by the country people, or occasionally by a driving a footcarer. There, or German traveling workman, tramping through his probationary year of apprenticeship. The Black Eagle was flourishing, the Golden Lamb was decaying. Both epithets black and golden might, indeed, have been reversed in their case: for the one had a glowing silk beak and gilt talons, and a bright gilt crown on each of his two cruel-looking heads: while to believe that the poor lamb had ever been golden was a strain on one's faith, so begrimed and dingy had he grown with the blackening effects of time and weather. But the lamb, whether black or golden, possessed something of more beauty—and some people thought of more value—than any article within the well-furnished rooms guarded by the fierce sprace, double-headed eagle. Katerina Kester, the landlord's daughter, was famed among the Gosenners, and for many a mile around Gosenn, as being the prettiest girl in those parts. That might not be saying that she was really beautiful: for undeniably beautiful as Katerina was in making the surrounding scenery delightful to the eyes, she has not scattered female loveliness among its inhabitants with so lavish a hand. The women are in general tall and strong, but meagre, bony, hawk-nosed creatures, lacking the effects of soft color and hard fare by a premature appearance of age. Katerina, however, was as fresh and full-cheeked as a Hebe. Her mother had been a Saxon woman, from Tirza on the Elbe; and from her Katerina inherited a blonde, pure as skin, large, limpid, light-blue eyes, and an enormous wealth of fair hair. This hair was splendid both for quality and great quantity: but it had not the warm richness of color which pattern-ers love. It was of golden, but certainly not golden brightness of moonlight than the dazzling glow of sunshine; and when uncoiled it fell down straight on her back in a heavy mass, unbroken by curl or wave. So much for the picture; now for its frame. The golden lamb was an old house built chiefly of timber, and it had a great balcony running along two sides of it, whence a fine view up and down the lake was to be had. The window of Katerina's room was surrounded by carved wood-work, and garnished by a creeping plant, which, thrust its delicate tracery over into the chamber when the frame filled with small plate panes was thrown back to admit the fresh air. On this particular Sunday morning the summer breeze came softly in at the window, lovingly toying with Katchen's cheek, ruffling the bright, smooth lake into dimples, and displaying the grace and lightness of the wood-work that waved backward and forward in the rocking movement.

"Ah, what a fine day!" thought Katerina. "Dry and bright, but not too hot. Last night's shower will have laid the dust on the highway. How nice it will be for Katrina did not appreciate the full beauty of the grand scene that lay stretched out before her bedroom window. Lofty mountains were beautiful to look upon, and, if I must tell the truth, our village belle was fonder of receiving than of giving admiration. It seemed to her very natural that people who had known her from a child should take unswerving pleasure in gazing on her every day, and extolling the beauty and softness of her hair. But if you had made any great demand on Katerina's powers of admiration on the shore of the lake and the mountains, she would have turned away with a pettish sigh, and would have told you that she had seen them every day—every day since she was born. The Kesters were Protestants, and attended service at the evangelical church in Hallstadt. Now to go from Gosenn to Hallstadt there is but one really practicable way, and that is to row there in a boat on the lake: therefore it seems odd that Katchen should have cared about the dust on the highway. But Katchen had a lover who was the owner of a stout traveling-carriage and good team of horses, and who being, moreover, a steady driver, and a kind, honest young fellow, was often employed to convey travelers along the more unfrequented parts of the beautiful lake district—routes where railways were not, but where roads were and far between. This lover, Fritz Rosenheim, was expected to-day at Gosenn. He had passed through the village the week before on his way to Ischl, and was to return toward Salzburg on this bright Sunday morning. For this reason the state of the road was interesting to Katchen. There was no regular engagement between her and Fritz Rosenheim. Old Josef Kester set himself very much against the idea of such a thing. He liked Fritz heartily, and was glad to see him, but—Fritz was poor. That was a misfortune from which the landlord of the Golden Lamb had suffered severely; and he was wont to say that he would never willingly expose his child to the cold, nipping airs of poverty. But Gosenn folks maintained that Josef Kester had started in life with no good prospects as most men, and that it was solely his own fault if things had gone ill with him, and the poor "Lamb" had gradually been shorn of its fleece. Gosenn folks were not less hard in their judgment of the unsuccessful man than London folks or Paris folks. But there was a grain of truth in what they said for all that. Josef had too much of the quiet passive good-humor which distinguishes most of his countrymen to push his way energetically through the world. Perhaps he could reckon as many pleasant hours in his pass life as the richest of his neighbors. But the pleasant hours were over and gone, and had left him with empty pockets to look old age in the face. He was hard-working, well-to-do Gosenn folks sometimes—but then they were also knowledged—envy the clear, smooth forehead and placid mien which he made old Josef look upon during his years; but they had only to put their hands in their pockets and feel a soft bundle of notes to see the fattened bank-notes to recover their self-esteem and good spirits immediately.

Katchen drew in her head from the window and went to take one more look at herself in the green mirror, which distorted her pretty face in a heartbreaking manner. But Katchen knew the original by heart, and was not distressed by the bad reflection she beheld in her glass. She proceeded to perch a small velvet cap with one cock-up of her thick plaits of hair, and to stick a long silver arrow into it to keep it there.

"Katchen! Katchen!" called her father from the lake below. He was sitting in a little boat just beneath her window, dressed in his best clothes, and ready to row to Hallstadt to church. "Make haste, my child, service will have begun!"

"Coming, father, coming!" said Katchen, as she ran swiftly down the stairs, through the open house door, and stepped into the little boat that lay rocking gently within a stone's-throw of the inn. Katchen stood up in the boat and took an oar, which she managed with strength and skill. All the long-oared Scotch Highland and Gosenn men used to propel themselves about the lake, and to handle an oar was as ordinary an accomplishment as that of knitting, needle. Katchen rowed standing, and at every dip of her graceful oar with the strong right arm, seemed displaying in the action a plump, well-turned leg and neat ankle, encased in the Sunday gear of white stockings and neat black boots.

"Fine bright day, Herr Kester!" shouted a neighbor, whose boat, propelled by two rowers, passed that Katchen's.

"Ay, ay, Sir, very fine." Bright, as you say, but not sultry. Any news up your way?"

"Nothing very interesting," bawled back the neighbor, whose beard was rapidly exceeding ahead of the Kesters' little craft. "Only one thing your Katchen may care to hear. Fritz Rosenheim is to return here at Ischl. Some foreigners wanted to go back to Salzburg by the new way—the railway. Lucky for him, isn't it?"

"My Katchen doesn't care a button about it," roared Josef, angrily; but in the act he buried his words did not reach the ears for which they were intended. Katchen's pride kept her head erect, and her face darker crebrown.

"Why should you say that, father?" she asked, pettishly. "I do care a button, more than a button, for Fritz's good luck."

"You don't care in the way neighbor Nelbeck meant. And I don't choose to allow folks to talk to me as if you did, Katchen."

"But, father, I do care—"

"Silence—I'll tell you what you do when you're contradicted, but it's all moonshine. You know you wouldn't marry Fritz if I gave my consent to-morrow."

"Will you try me, father?"

"No, I won't—I'll not encourage of the whole thing. The prettiest girl in the district to throw herself away on a poor devil of a fellow without a penny to bless himself with! Not I, indeed! Katchen, I'll have no more of this! I'll have no more of this! Old Josef's discontent displeased itself in words, and left him placid and smiling—as much as he ever was. He had an evangelical place of worship, followed by his pretty daughter.

CHAPTER II.

KATCHEN sat very still during the long controversial discourse that flew high over the heads of the simple congregation. Very still and demure-looking was she little Katchen, but her thoughts were busily occupied, and her mind very active. Was she really going to be fond of Fritz after all? or was her father right in saying it was only moonshine? Katchen questioned herself that she never did feel so kindly disposed toward her lover as when some sage adviser set before her the folly and unreasonableness of marrying. Next to his eye to her affections came the idea of any other girl marrying Josef Kester. Fritz, young man was very popular, and in his roving life he had opportunities of making acquaintances among the pretty pale-maids at the big hotels in Salzburg and Ischl knew and smiled upon him. Even landlines' daughters at the mountain inns encountered in a little distance with the good-looking Katchen. And his traveling companions were not slow in hearing round the fair made the jingle of his horses' bells a very welcome sound to many fleeting visitors to the lake route. But then—To be sure it was very nice to have Fritz so admiring and so devoted, and to hear him protest that love of her was all Austria, nay, in all Germany, a girl fit to wipe the little shoes of Katchen Kester. Still, Fritz was a wandering, wild-goose. But it wouldn't last so! Fritz couldn't be content to all that great wide state of things continue comfortably. It was unreasonable of him, and he actually wanted to have a formal promise of marriage from his side, and to have Herr Kester's leave. Katchen gave such an impatient little shiver at the idea of being irrevocably tied, and, unconsciously, she bowed up her head so like a wild colt that has never known bit or bridle, that I, for my part, believe her father to have been right after all. Katchen was wild, but she wasn't so very much in love after all.

The sermon of the pastor, a precocious German polysyllables startled her from a reverie. Katchen was not much given to religious indulgence; but then was still a wide-eyed look of abstraction on her countenance when she walked forth with her father from the little church. At the moment they came out quite a crowd of country-folks, some of whom had just been partaking of the Lord's Supper, and who, like well-behaved people of Sisters of Mercy passed through the knot of people, receiving pleasant and respectful salutations as they came from the church and the benediction. Old Kester was known to every body, and stood for some time exchanging greetings with his friends. Then Katchen, luxurious pulls at the gaudy china pipe suspended by a gaudier ribbon from his button-hole, still as an unusually thoughtful mood, walked slowly down to the point of the lake, whence a narrow wooden plank ran out a short distance into the water, for the convenience of boatmen and their passengers. Katchen seated herself on a low wall that was placed for fast, and stared absently at the lake, and the opposite hills rich in autumnal tints steeped in a great glory of sunlight.

"Good-day, Mam'zell Katerina," said a high, thin voice close at her ear. She started and looked round. The address was unusually formal and respectful. Her own acquaintance with the speaker was of the list of "Mam'zell," and usually abbreviated the utterance of her Christian name to "Katchen." He stood at a tall, spare man of about five-and-forty, with a very high, bald forehead, a sallow face, and thick, half-covered mustaches. A wide-awake hat, and blinked very much with his light-gray eyes. "Good-day, Mam'zell Katerina," said he again, seeing that Katchen stared at him without speaking. "I fear you do not recognize me. I am Caspar Ebner, the landlord of the Black Eagle in Gosenn, at your service." And he drew himself up a little, and twisted his fingers in a heavy silver watch-chain that hung on his black satin waistcoat. Herr Ebner wore a suit of dark-blue cloth, with buttons, a black satin French hat, and the black satin waistcoat aforesaid.

"Thou dear Heaven!" cried Katchen, springing from her seat and making a little courtesy. "I beg your pardon, Herr Ebner, but I couldn't for the moment think who it was. You might have added that her surprise was not much diminished when she did know who it was: for the rich landlord of the Black Eagle had never accosted her in her life before, though she knew him by sight well enough, and had sometimes fancied he looked at her with a certain amount of admiration.

"The Herr Pastor was somewhat lengthy to-day," said Ebner, half seating himself on the log of wood on which Katchen had resumed her place.

"Yes," said Katchen, wondering what of what she was saying, for her brain was busily trying to puzzle out why Herr Ebner should speak to her.

"Yes; somewhat lengthy. At least I fancied so. You were not aware of my presence, listener, man'zell. I observed your absorption."

Katchen colored, partly from a sprightly coquettishness at being at last noticed, partly from vexation at having at last been watched. Then the thought that was in her mind came to her tongue, although she had no intention to betray it. "I never saw you in church, Herr Ebner," said she.

It was now Ebner's turn to color. That is to say, the lemon hue of his face deepened to orange. "Most likely not, Mam'zell Katerina. I—in fact, I don't go to church very often. I read though, and think a good deal on these subjects, and I have formed, I confess, certain doubts, which—" Ebner stopped abruptly, catching Katchen's point-blank stare of bewilderment. "I—I am not sure that orthodox and speculative topics are hardly suited to one so young, and—and—shem—so lovely as yourself."

"Here Ebner broke down with an unmistakable look of relief, and she even made a little step toward her father's boat. "Good-day, Herr Ebner."

"Good-day, Herr Ebner," said Kester, pulling off his soft felt hat with a courtesy which Katchen never required by lifting so much as a stiff, shiny head-covering high in the air. "I've been staying behind to have a little chat with my old friend Nelbeck, and kept the young woman of mine waiting, you see."

Old Kester's pleasant way of his daughter as he spoke, and Katchen noticed that her father did not seem nearly so much surprised as she had been to see the host of the Black Eagle paying a gallant to her.

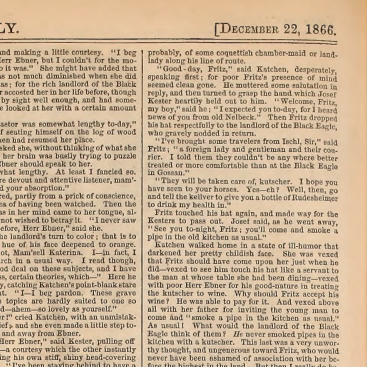
"I am—I mean—are you," stammered Ebner, with an awkward laugh.

"Are we going to row back to Gosenn now? Yes, we are," said Katchen, promptly.

"My boss is here, with three of the boatmen from St. Emmeran. Would you—that is, if Mam'zell Katerina—Ha—ha! Ebner's wonder of the day.

"Thank you, Herr Ebner," responded the rival landlord, with a courtly wave of his unoccupied hand, and then, before she understood the arrangement clearly, she was seated in Ebner's boat and was seated in state on a cushioned bench under an awning, instead of standing up with a heavy paddle in her unfriendly hand, and was being propelled by two hired, hirsuted strife craft fast to the stern of the larger boat, and away from the shadow of Katchen's father, down through the glassy water, and breaking into fragments the peaceful shadows of the great hills that lay deep in the lake below. Katchen looked backward but a second and still biner heaven than that which stretched overhead. She was bewildered. Very little should be in a boat at all, without aiding to protect that boon. Katchen's father, the Black Eagle, Ebner Eagle should have doffed his usual imperial fierceness, and—instead of sticking his long talons into the fleece of the Golden Lamb—should come with dovelike softness, and invite his rival even into his own nest—this was the extreme of it—and Fritz Rosenheim, Katchen's lover, was really very fierce in himself. But Katchen was fond to think that her father's high and lofty personage—one to whose successful rapacity was purely owing the decay and ill fortune that hung about the house of the Golden Lamb—Kester's ill success was, on his own showing, always "somebody else's" fault. In the present case, perhaps, Josef Kester was not entirely singular. And so the indefinite "somebody else," who wrought all the ills of Kester's life, began to be gradually taken shape in Katchen's mind, and Herr Caspar Ebner was its living embodiment.

Many an evening in the cheerful kitchen of the inn had Katchen listened to her father's long speeches, uttered concurrently from pipe and dense clouds of coarse tobacco-smoke, when the old man would descant on the Lamb's misfortunes in the midst of a numerous society of the Eagle, and lament the strange perversity of travelers who would frequent Herr Ebner's house, to the neglect of the hostelry of his own establishment. And now, behold here was her father sitting placidly in the stern of Ebner's boat, wrapped luxuriously by the enemy's boatmen, and chatting cheerfully with the enemy himself. The boat now scudded along lightly, bounding to the strong strokes of the rowers, and soon reached the landing-place at Gosenn, where Katchen was handed to the shore by Herr Ebner with politeness, though a little awkwardly. She and her father took their leave of the landlord him, and were about to draw their own little boat up high and dry on the beach, but Ebner desired his own boatmen to do that, and also to put Josef and Katchen to do like honor of dining with him, as the mid-day meal was now ready. Katchen looked at her father, who was only by way of what he considered good manners; for he found a decided objection for his daughter and himself, and they followed their host into his private sitting-room at the Black Eagle. It was a handsomely-furnished room ground-floor, with windows looking on to the lake. Here the cloth was laid for dinner, and a little table-cloth was spread for Josef Kestchen's hat from her, and to offer her any assistance she might need in the arrangement of her dress. She had, of course, taken the cue from her mistress's behavior, for Katchen knew well enough that at most public dinners at Gosenn, Josef quietly quite unconscious waiting on the daughter of old Josef Kester, of the Golden Lamb. Herr Ebner's dinner was good, the wine excellent, but somehow the little party did not seem to be quite at ease. Josef, it is true, ate and drank somewhat beyond his usual moderate, and full of wonder at the unexpected honor to feel much affected by it, and Ebner talked nervously though his spectacles, and hesitated and stammered in his speech in a manner unaccountable. Before the dinner was over, the guests rose to take their leave, Josef protesting that he must go, as he had "so many things to attend to," and Ebner accompanied them to the entrance-hall, and there bashfully offered a bunch of roses to Katchen, which had been gathered in the little garden during dinner-time, and now they were lying ready for departure in a basket on the hall-table basket. Katchen took the fragrant June roses with a smile and a bright blush of pleasure. It was certainly very good and civil of Herr Ebner to have paid such quite enough of a coquette to enjoy the consciousness of being admired. But all of a sudden she gave a start, and the color left her round cheeks for a moment, to rush back deeper than before; for there stood Fritz Rosenheim right in the doorway, looking at her in black astonishment. He had a long driving-whip in his hand and a great coat on, and his stout, well-built, tillion's jacket, studded with silver buttons, leathern breeches, and high boots somewhat become the man, and in his low-crowned hat, stuck on one side of his head, was fastened a bunch of rich red carnations, the gift, probably, of some coquettish chamber-maid or land-lady along his line of route.



"Good-day, Fritz," said Katchen, desperately, speaking first; for poor Fritz's presence of mind seemed clean gone. He muttered some salutation in reply, and then turned to grasp the hand that Josef Kester heartily held out to him. "Welcome, Fritz, my boy," said he; "I expected you to-day, for I heard news of you from old Nelbeck." Then Fritz dropped his hat respectfully to the landlord of the Black Eagle, who gravely nodded in return.

"I've brought some travelers from Ischl, Sir," said Fritz; "a family party and gentleman and their coachier. I told them they couldn't be any where better accommodated than at the inn of the Black Eagle in Gosenn."

"They will be taken care of, kutscher. I hope you have seen to your horses. Yes—eh? Well, then go and tell the waiter to give you a bottle of Rudelsheimer at my charge. Eh, Fritz?"

Fritz touched his hat again, and made way for the waiter to pass out. Josef shut the door, and went on, "See you to-night, Fritz; you'll come and smoke a pipe in the old kitchen as usual."

Katchen walked home in a state of ill-humor that darkened her pretty childish face. She was vexed that Fritz should have come upon her just when he did—vexed to see him touch his hat like a servant to the man at whose table she had been dining—vexed with poor Herr Ebner for his good-nature in treating the kutscher to wine. Why should Fritz accept his wine? He was able to pay for it. And would have all with her father for inviting the young man to come and "smoke a pipe in the old kitchen" as usual! What would the landlord of the Black Eagle think of Fritz if he were received even in the kitchen with a kutscher. This last was a very unworthy thought, and ungenerous toward Fritz, who would have been the most abashed person imaginable had he before the highest in the land. But then I really do believe old Josef had been right about Katchen's pride. Still, objecting as he did to any semblance of love-making between Rosenheim and his daughter, he should not have encouraged the young man to come to his house. But this was Josef's way—one of the many weaknesses in his easy-going nature. He had helped to smooth the down-hill path on which he had fallen by rapidly losing the comfort in himself. He liked Fritz. The young fellow's cheery talk and pleasant manner, and the news he brought from the busier world he traversed in his journeys, were very agreeable stimulants after the sluggish monotony of life in the Golden Lamb. And, like many poor men, Josef Kester loved nothing better than to witness and hear of a little of energy and activity in others than was expected to participate. As to the after-consequences of all this friendliness—why, that would come all right somehow. The folks would make love a little—why not?—but it would be all in solid and proper course—not of such a kind as hurt neither of them very deeply. He could be very angry when any one took it for granted that the commonplace mean something real, and spoke as old Nelbeck had spoken. Not the less angry, perhaps, from a secret self-reproach to his motive, for Josef was a kind-hearted man and he could not resist the temptation of his company, and, besides, the young man could do a little practically in earnest. In this he was thoroughly mistaken: but it was a comfortable theory, which lightened his own responsibility, and therefore Josef Kester clung to it.

CHAPTER I.

It was moonlight—when is it not moonlight when love-sweet the Alpine Lagoon, emerging from the window of an attic, eyes steadily shone upon the lake in the window at the extremity of his father's palatial residence. Thither tapped he gently at the window, which was stood closed before the completion of the signal. At the window appeared the loveliest face and form that ever graced mere mortal vision, and beautiful Maythorne was worthy to be an attendant maid on Miss Clara Jones.

"Oh, Hargreaves!" she said (Phillis was low born and ill-educated, but really beautiful). "Hargreaves I have got the key round out, and I shall have warning."

"Be let it be, love!" replied the enraptured youth. "I will marry you, despite all family opposition. I shall be the pet of my father."

"But if I was to be out of place all that time! what should I do? Father's dead, mother's a cripple, and I'm the only support of the house."

"I will work for you," cried Algernon. "Yes, like a day-laborer, if needful. But I have intellect—some say genius—and by the power of my pen I will fling my usage into the stars, and yours with it, my dear Phillis."

"Oh, how fine you talk!" said Phillis, with a deep sigh. "I could listen to you until it was time to call the cook, who's a heavy sleeper."

But it was not to be. Algernon was unmindful of the happiness of poor Phillis: for by her light old Jowler, the gardener, returning late from his club at the Lion saw what was going on in the gutter. There was a light burning in the library, and Jowler knew that the Governor was up, finishing his last cigar and imbibing his "night-cap."

CHAPTER II.

It is easy to guess the consequences of Jowler's discovery and revelation. Mr. Goldewg had amassed his many thousands, and Algernon was his heir.

"Marry a dust-pan! a house-broom! a mop-twirler! had he toiled for this?" Gog and Magog forbid.

Phillis was dismissed with a month's wages. Algernon was sent to the Continent, with a tutor, and a letter of credit on Lafitte.

CHAPTER III.

How differently the future developed itself to Phillis and Algernon! The one had climbed slowly and painfully to the memory of her first love, scouring all offers from swains in her own station of life, remembering only this, repeating only this: "She'd been sweet-hearted by a gentleman," and some day—yes, though long years unrevealed long years—he would prove faithful to his vows and marry her.

Algernon, also, was inconsolable for a time, but this dissipated tutor soon taught him the use of moneyletters on Lafitte, and in the whirlpool of Parisian vice and pleasure Phillis was soon forgotten, and her pure love laughed at and contemned!

Mr. Goldewg died, and his money so that fits heir was weaned from the folly of his first love.

CHAPTER IV.

Goldewg was the occupant of a hideous marble tomb in a country churchyard, and Algernon was lord of thousands. Phillis was the patient nurse of an irritable old woman, the widow of a Nabob!

Rich, but young-unable, because unscholars, made vast inroads on the inherited thousands, and at last—But let us not anticipate.

Phillis found her reward after twenty years of silent endurance— But again let us not anticipate.

CHAPTER V.

The village children were to have a holiday and a great feast at Mr. Arthorne's cottage. It was the owner's birthday. Yes, Phillis had come back to her native place two weeks before, and was now almost the housekeeper to her return. She was changed from the beauteous girl into the buxom woman, although Time had wrought no change in her fire-and-dark eyes. The morning was one of the loveliest the young spring had yet put forth. Phillis took her very topmost fit of old work-house. A feeble man, dressed in the parish garb, opened the door, but without making any response. Phillis gazed at him for a moment; the paper returned her look somewhat defiantly at first, but then a change came he exclaimed, in a low voice:

"No!"

Phillis almost fell to the ground at the sound of the man's voice, and it was with great effort that she could reply, "Yes."

In another moment her arms were about the neck of Algernon! Algernon the pauper! Algernon, who in the hour of prosperity had abandoned his lowly first love!

CHAPTER VI.

To Phillis's great joy Algernon proved to be nonexcelent; and as he much preferred liberty, a comfortable cottage, and a bucxom help-mate,—a more would be the husband—he has been very published to be seen on Sabbath morn, and before the new moon waned Phillis led her Algernon to the hymeneal altar, and in the work-house the records of revelry were heard at midnight. And, later still, Bunker the Beadle was coming home in a wheelbarrow!

Were we not right to call our story "The Happy Union!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The shops are beginning to put on their holiday attire. A Christmas lie pervades the City generally. The little folks return from their daily schools, with wonderfully large eyes, and chatter till bedtime about Santa Claus—some with a most profound belief in the hybridisality of St. Nicholas, while others—like a little Miss of very few years, whom we chanced to overhear the other day—whisper the suspicion, "I know who Santa Claus is! It is papa and mamma, and Uncle Dick!" The older folks are beginning to perfect their bonnets, and the puzzle becomes fearfully perplexing in a walk down Broadway. For every thing is so "nice," so "pretty," so "convenient," and "so charged"—polite clerks say—where shall the selection commence? It is a puzzle!

The decided change in the length of walking-dresses, etc., and in the circumference of crinoline, has quite startled many of the ladies. They scarcely know whether to follow the fashion or not. But, in the end, they will be obliged to do so. The time for dragging half a yard of silk through muddy or dusty streets has passed away. The luckless gentlemen who have often met with the unhappy experience of treading on the trail of a lady who was sailing along in front of them will hail the new era with satisfaction.

There is no end to the novel names given to ladies' hats nowadays. One of the very latest selects is called the "Butter Dish." They are described as being "a cross between a turtle-shell and a wash-pan;" and the fair wearers say they are "so nice!"

It is of no use to fancy that your cutest boy will be content without a new pair of skates this winter. You may as well put your pocket-book and pride by, cheerfully. Most likely, too, every one of your girls—always supposing you have a bevy of them—will imperatively demand skating hat, jacket, gloves, etc., in addition to a pair of first-class skates, just as soon as King Frost has duly commenced his reign.

And speaking of frosty weather reminds me of a nice point of law recently decided in Minnesota. It appears that a certain Mr. A——, living somewhere in that State, rented his house to Mr. B—— till "cold weather" should come, and they went to law about it. After a long and critical examination of a host of witnesses, the jury decided that "cold weather" does not, according to law, come until the 1st of December. This decision is binding authority throughout the State, and hereafter "cold weather" will not come in Minnesota until the first day of December.

Among the numerous and often strange legal reports which find their way into our newspapers there recently appeared a case with the following very curious title: "The United States ex. Rel. James W. Norris." It is a proceeding to forfeit an apparatus for distilling petroleum, on an allegation that the owner had not rendered proper returns and paid the proper tax to the collector of internal revenue.

An exchange says: "There was a great fall in pork at Chicago last week, but nobody was hurt." Such falls are sometimes fatal.

Somebody gives the following sensible advice to those who write for newspapers and magazines: "Say the most possible in the least space. Pitch right into your subject. Make the title and first sentence so that it can be read at the end of the second, no matter what has preceded or is to follow."

The New Haven Journal tells a nice little story about a couple of pet wolves, whose quarters were in a yard on a certain street of that city have lately excited the curiosity of passers-by. They are said to be very tame, and that they are the "choice" playthings to the world." The other day a gentleman went down to see them, and as he was in the act of opening the gate to the yard they were very tame. "Just see here," said she, and she fondled them as if they were innocent little babies. "Why, you pet your pets upon them, and see how tame they are," she invitingly said to the gent. Of course he would, but, as he approached, four rows of teeth reminded him to keep at a safe distance. At this the woman assured him that it was only a playful demonstration, and to show him how correctly gifted well tamed they were, she entered the house and returned with three little kittens which she placed before the wolves. They engaged in further conversation with the gent, and, soon after, both bearing a faint perfume, turned around just in time to see the tail of kitten number three going down the mouth of the tamest wolf. The visitor immediately took his departure, after expressing a preference for the wolves to take home for an infant child to play with in the absence of the parents.

They have spirited girls in Ohio, who evidently believe in certain phases of "Woman's Rights." Not long ago, a young lady in that State was asked to take a stroll by one of her acquaintance was "halting between two opinions," and not likely to vote at all without some coaxing. So she hied herself to the polls on day of election, went to the horse of the absentee, brought him to the polls, "voted him," and then carried him back again.

An exchange relates a story of cholera times, which reminds one of the decision mote in olden times by the court:

"A sugar refiner at Lille generously fitted up the hospital appropriated to cholera patients, and also allowed all persons in the town seized with cholera to go to his chateau. Only thirty-five persons have reposed in this steam-bath, died of that disease. One of these, a poor devil, who had been arrested in Lille—was so scalded during a bath as to be unable to move for three days, and, when perfectly cooked, she brought suit against her benefactor to recover the five francs' wages she lost. The judge, comprehending his gravity to his countenance, thus addressed her, 'Woman, your bed and her witnesse! Indeed, my good dame, I should not hesitate to sentence the defendant to pay you the wages of the days you have lost but could I at the same time force him to restore the cholera which you yourself confess you lost to him? I am unable to strain my power so far, I must dismiss your case.' The audience approved the great laughter the judge's decision, and the woman, covered with confusion and pursued by jeers, quitted the Tribunal."

Farinaceous food, although much recommended for invalids, is frequently very injurious to the stomach, unless a small quantity of animal food be taken with it. Many persons still retain the rather old-fashioned theory that a sick person must live on solely vegetable food, soups, and similar articles. But, in truth, a weak stomach is frequently rendered stiffmore feeble by the use and continuance of a farinaceous diet. Wherever no acute disease exists, which would render it improper, a small portion of meat, either in the solid form or as broth, should be taken occasionally.

WINGLETS

FROM OUR "CORRESPONDENT-ON-THE-WING."

Home of De Saute, Thirsty Bay, N. Y., Dec. 18.

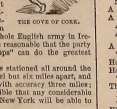
Dear Weekly:

Here I am, getting all of the first shots by the Ocean Telegraph of the shocking doings in Ireland by the Prime Minister, which are all set to "one Government," as De Saute says, "his star ping his horse."

The charges on the Judge of the Four Courts in Dublin were terrible, only equaled by the charges of the Governor of Kilkenny gaol over the within news.

It seems that about his past five o'clock yesterday morning a small fleet of boats was found moving in the bay, and it was supposed by the police to be intended for the raising of the Fenian army, then momentarily expected to land on the Quay. The policeman immediately concluded the turkey as being contraband of war, on account of the having "drumsticks" in the possession. The act was immediately telegraphed to the British Admiralty Office, when the Cockade-ites never even transports were dispatched across the Channel to prevent any further importations of that kind. The Admiral of the fleet told our correspondent that if he found the boy or the turkey he would

THE COVE OF COBH.

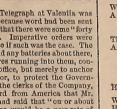


STAMP THEM OUT AS THEY DID THE DAVITT PLAGUE.

At a later hour in the day the office o. the Irish Feather was visited, and several copies of the paper were there found, addressed to the President of the United States and his "policy." This term—"his policy"—is not often referred to in that paper, except in the back numbers, but they never saw an explanation o it in the paper; and the authorities, who subsequently arrested, was unwilling to explain the "policy," and evaded doing so by saying that such a thing did not exist. It was the authorities considered it preposterous that an editor should write about and commend a thing he knew nothing about. He and the publisher were therefore accordingly committed for contempt by the magistrates, who made the remark, that "Pat they could find hout what the 'policy' hof the President o the United States was, they would stamp hit hout as they did the cattle plague." The Home Government, hearing of the articles in the Irish Feather, immediately sent out a dozen regiments of riflemen to take possession of the office. They also confiscated the "chromo-type" of the article, preparatory to the war. Four little boys who were looking in at the window and flattening their noses on the glass were arrested on the charge of lending their countenance to the affair.

In the lower counties, a boy with a pike that he had just caught in a brook was sent to the Castle, and the pike was taken possession of by the magistrate, who immediately ordered out the local military to watch for other boys with fish, as he had received orders to arrest any one in his section found with "pikes:" and he told the captain of the militia they must be stamped out.

By a dispatch sent by the Agent of the Associated Press from Liverpool we learn that the Cove of Cork himself was arrested, and that further particulars will be sent on.



Intelligent Penians here consider that during the visit of the Fenians as imposters, as Head Centre Stephens has more "stamps" in to fire upon the ships in case they receive any "stock" from either the officers or crews of the vessels.

MORTAR PRACTICE.

Last night the Judge of the Four Courts gave orders to all his specials that if they should discover any thing like Fenians on their beats they should stamp it out. This morning one of the native police found in the Court-room what he considered a specimen of Fenianism

ALREADY STAMPED OUT. The Judge explained more fully his meaning to the special, and discharged him with a slight reprimand.

THE VERY LATEST.—The Fenians are now besieging the Ocean Telegraph Office, telegraphing to their friends in America to send over to them the "stamps," as they want to be stamped out of the country as fast as possible.

P.S.—I do not indorse the matter here given, but give it as a subject of news, merely. The Bindergent does not affect your own

U. S.

THE DEATH-WALK.

The little-window, dimmed-paned,
Stood open at the twilight waned,
And scattered instre crimson-rayed
Upon the chamber floor;
As, half his dirk above the ground,
The angry, staking sun around
His shining lances placed,
In blood steeped o'er and o'er.

"He will not come, he will not come!"
A plaintive whisper uttered out,
As rose the shadows round about:
"The night is blind, the night is dumb:
The dew will change to frosty rime—
O, weary, weary, weary time!
He will not come, he will not come!"

The ruddy lustre of the sun
Grew copper-bronzed, then purply dun,
And all the clouds o piled-up cloud,
Like scarcely-motion ore,
Seemed quickly from gray to swart,
While here and there a flickering dart,
Like lightning-flame, shot in and out,
Lit up the glowing core.

O wistful eyes, O straining sight!
There is no sail upon the shining lake
Upon the distant, leafy walls,
Athwart the sinking purple light;
No youthful footfalle party pass
From ringing road to steaut grass,
And echo through the coming night.

"He will not come!" pale Lilly sighed,
Say rather whispered hoarsely low,
As in her hand she laid her brow,
O, better she aloud had cried,
With flood of tears and throbbing breast,
Than thus had watched the sun to rest,
And trst with light how hope outdied!

O, weary, weary, weary time!
The Summer's dew makes Winter's rime,
The flush of hope brings chilling fears,
And Joy is drowned in her own tears.

The sun is gone, the fires died out
Which warmed the hospect-up, cindery bank
Of rugged clouds, piled rank on rank;
And not a star all round shone,
Nor glimmer of the moon on high,
Was seen in all the dreary sky,
Save the fire-fever in her sight
Or that lone watcher of the night
Shone out into the window sill.
For surely there was life and light
And ghostly, wandering figures there.
Her soul looked forth into the gloom,
And in a misty glimmer traced
Now eyes, now lips, hands lifeless,
A breezy down, a sheltered room,
A waste with yawning crevasses
And every where with beauty graced
A form smiling, dauntless, fair.

A ringing brook came leaping down
'Tween broken banks; the summer rain
Had filled them to the very brim
Had changed the limpid drops to brown,
The purling note to loud refrain.
The low-arched bridge which spanned the stream
Lay half beneath the brawling rush
Of many waves, now low, now flush
With either shore, and white as cream.
A timid form—it was her own—
Stood bending near the narrow ridge,
Which now was all of that old bridge
The water had not overthrown.
And as she quivered on the shore,
A cheering voice spoke in her ear,
A handsome form stood by her side,
And in the tumult of her pain
With nervous arm and rapid stride,
Her safely o'er the torrent bore.

With deepening lids and bosom beat
Her more than thanks her voice confessed,
And love, full-armed in tender might,
Flashed on the stranger's eager sight
In quivring lip and flushing cheek—
In, let time pass on further reck,
Pale watcher by the lattice-pane
Since twilight trembled on the wane,
To trace the downward path of flowers,
Trod blissfully on summer eve
With him the lord of Lyndon towers,
Till leaves and blossoms seemed to weave
A deathless wreath for him to bind,
As one to joy and honor led.

Fair path, which ever so wild and steept
Bright rose, which deathless seemed, could
Till storm-drops round thee 'gan to weep,
And sullen winds to wail and moan,
And leaves and blossoms tempest-tossed,
All withered as by sudden frost,
Fell dead in whispering fits anew—
Thy name! So young, so weak—lost, lost!
O, lost to all but those who share
Thy pain!

"He will not come!" with listless hand,
And outward show of self-command,
She closed the lattice, left the bench
Of pain, that was not sigh nor sob,
Was cramped between her and her brain;
She never bent beneath the three,
But slowly whispered hoarse and low,
"He'll never come! I know!"

There was a merry rout on Lyndon Hill:
The amber light
Through all the mansion's many windows shone;
On stately trees it decked forestry sone,
And with its fan-like rays
Wrote on a glow the revelry cheek of night.
And from its low-browed hall, of wont so still,
The busy hum of revelry came;
The chant of blithesome lays,
Of boastful words the loud acclaim,
All hailing one proud name
And made the air
With joyous sound all radiant far
Exultant and aflame.
Thus rang the merry voice to voice:
"Fair Margaret, our Lyndon's choice!"

There came as echo on the wind,
A glimmer on the lattice-pane,
That murmured at the cottage-door,
That lit the lattice-pane,
To tell the world on Lyndon Hill,
Of Lyndon's choice, of Lyndon's will,
By Lilly watching, dauntless there,
Since twilight 'gan to wane.

She never moved, she never spoke,
Sang on her ear the hilltop brake,
But with a strangely vivid glance,
That flashed in one bold fiery ray,
Then settled in a steady stare,
She sat upon her lowly couch,
And heed neither hill nor chance
Of living death she lay.

O, weary, weary, weary time!
The Summer's dew makes Winter's rime,
The flush of hope brings chilling fears,
And Joy is drowned in her own tears.

On Lyndon Hill the summer Eve
Sat crowned with gold, her dewy robe
Of white and rosy-tinted cloud
But half concealed her sweet sleeve,
And girdle of the ruby proud;
And on her flushing cheek from each cot-fire
There hung a diamond star,
That glittered wide and far.

And as the Eve, so was the Morning fair,
As following night, who stole betimes away,
He come in vigor through the radiant air.
Forth shone the lovely day.
Not lovely only in its liquid light,
And breezes bore, lost in its flush of hope,
Which all encompassed in its living scope,
And made its very shadows bright,
Love's jubilee it was, and so it shone,
And made day's eyes as lovely as the sun.

The bride of Lyndon met the dawn
With eyes of light and flush of rose,
And heart that throbbed with joyous throes
In greeting of the love-lit morn.
But there was one with face forlorn,
Whose cheek was as the snow
Upon an icy stream below,
Pale Lyndon's love-bride sit forewarn.
From her deep sunken eyes a fire
Streamed forth with sullen flame,
While firmly closed its nostrils and
And bitterness of shame
Were her thin lips, once white, now red,
As if from sudden wounds they bled.

Two brides—but one false groom!
Fair Margaret and Lilly fair,
The one with living blossoms in her hair,
And brow of light and cheek of bloom;
The other with a sallow skin
All blanched without and seared within.

For bridal both arrayed
In fleecy robes of chastest white,
A coronal of orange-blossoms made
Decked Margaret's braids of night:
The virgin bridal-wreath
Which trembled with her breath:
In pallid Lilly's tresses brown
With silver leaves three gleamed a crown
Of roses blanch as death.

Fair bridesmaids deftly fitted round
The bride of hope with tender care,
And voices tuned unto the sound
Of fond solicitude were there;
And treasures rare
Of gifts on every side were found.
But ah, alone, alone!
With frozen cheek, but burning brain,
Pale Lilly like a bleach white stone
Stood by the lattice-pane.

Alone, alone, alone!
The merry bells were ringing out
With boastful clang and joyous tone
The joyful message round about;
But every clear and tuneful note
Her weary heart in discord smote,
For on her lonely ear they fell
The boom of death's low solemn knell.

Then as the hour nearer sped
When Lyndon false his bride should wed,
She drew from out a sombre niche
A flask of sallow green,
And drop by drop upon her lip
She let the draught unhallowed drip:
'Twas full of gouts as black as pitch,
With shining film between.

The poppy and the henbane juice
Were there, and herbal poisons fell,
To woe and shame of dreadful use,
Whose hellish names I dare not tell.
And as she drank the deadly brew
Her features sickened in the sight;
And not her robe of snowy hue,
Nor wreath of roses pure and bright,
As lip and cheek were half so white.

Then from her throbbing heart the rush
Of blood came mantling to her face,
And o'er her neck and cheek the flush
Of ruby life brought fire and grace.
Light filled her eyes, and forth she shone
With all the loveliness her own.
And so in beauty heavenly fair,
While not a cloud her face o'ercast,
Into the sunny air she passed;
And at a tranquil pace,
In bridal white and roses in her hair,
Within her heart despair,
And poison in her very breath,
Went forth upon her walk of death.

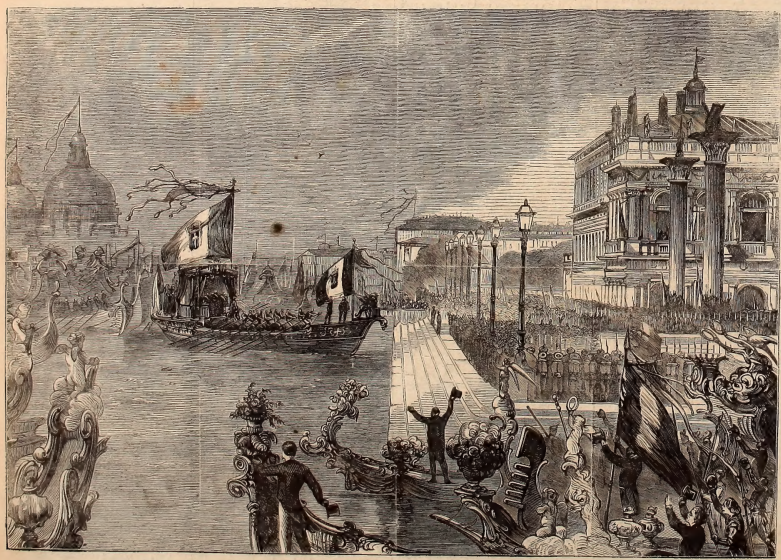
Across the garden, with its flowery host
Of bright-eyed petals, breathing odors sweet,
And through the orchard where the branches meet
Just overhead, all gnarled and weather-toned;
Along the pleasant lane, where green
The grass fringed all the way, and sunshine came
The wild-flowered hedge and pollard trees between,
Her snowy robe shone like a brighter flame.
The birds, which once would flutter to her feet,

THE DEATH-WALK—"I AM YOUR BRIDE!"

Flew scared away, and e'en the household cur,
Who brisk with joy would gambol up to her,
Slunk whining back: and none she chanced to meet
Of humble villagers, who used to greet
Her coming with a hand upraised,
And hearty speech, in tribute to her worth,
Beside the path stood silent and amazed,
As if she were some spirit upon earth.
So passed she on in loveliness supreme
And vestal white; now through the serried field,
By nodding ranks of wheat-ears half revealed,
Where trembling poppies shone with ruddy gleam,
And blue-eyed corn-flowers watched her half concealed.
There by the creaking gate, where lazy midge
Hung floating in the air, or tollcock hee
Swept buzzing by; then o'er the narrow bridge—
The very keystone of her memory!—
Where once had rolled the waves so white and hoarse,
Now gurgling gayly in their narrow course:
And so, by bleach-white road and deep green-sward,
She reached the border of the gray church-yard.

An instant by the open gate
Her silent footstep paused to wait
Forth rang the merry marriage-peal
Above the sacred roof,
When mid the clang there smote her ear
An echo rolling swiftly near;
The echo of a carriage-wheel,
And clamp of horses' hoof.

She glided with a spirit-tread
Among the living, o'er the dead,
Upon her face a hectic bloom,
A glitter in her eye,
Low whispers followed by her side
Of breathless awe: "Is this the bride?"
From clustered crowds on grass and tomb,
Who watched her flitting by.



Mid champ of bit and klirr of steel,
The jingling of the harness bright,
And whirr of many a carriage-wheel,
Fair Margaret, all love and light,
By Lyndon's side in beauty trod
The pathway to the house of God—
O bridegroom false! bride fair and frail!

But as they neared the open door,
There stood a phantom them before,
A second bride, in like array,
With lovely face unveiled,
Which flushed and bright an instant shone,
Then sickened to the hue of stone:
A rigid form, which barred the way,
As if twere armed and mailed.

How quailed false Lyndon at her gaze,
With feeble knee and parching tongue.
And craven hands that clutched and clung
About his bride, dumb with amaze!
"What brings you here?" he whining said—
Her white face looked so like the dead,
Her deep eyes set in deadly glaze.

"I am your bride!" No other word
Between her parted lips was heard:
Then with a shiver and a moan,
And hands that to her bosom clung,
Upon the earth a white form rolled.
False bells! ye should a dirge have tolled,
That, echoing through wood and stone,
The bride-peal had outsung!

O bridal bells! O jangling chords!
O discord far too deep for words!
O wedding morn, with hope so rife,
You brought two brides, but not one wife!

TAKING A WHALE.—SKETCHED BY R. WEIR.—[SEE PAGE 807.]

A MODEL PAPER.—The Watchman and Reflector of Boston has no serviable reputation for ability and enterprise. It has not been surpassed in merit by any religious journal in the country. But it aspires to higher excellence, and proposes to become, with the opening of the New Year, one of the most comprehensive family papers in the world. It will be greatly enlarged, and published on a double sheet: one sheet devoted, as hitherto, to religious matter; the other to literary, social, monetary, and agricultural articles. This latter department will be new and peculiar, with a rich variety of contents, embracing articles on current moral, social, and political questions; on the latest men of the age in thought and action; reviews of important books; tales for the family circle; agricultural and gardening matter for farmers; and monetary articles and reports of the markets for business men.

No Journal in the world certainly has a more comprehensive plan to meet the wants of all families, and of all the members in a family; and as the editorial staff will consist of nine men, all able and experienced in the several departments, who will be assisted by thirty contributors, many of them having a national reputation, the Watchman and Reflector must become a model family paper, unequaled in merit and in circulation. Its enterprising conductors deserve the largest success.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell Brown's Glass Cleaning Polish. Sells every where, at every house. Large profits to Agents. Particulars sent free. C. M. BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

The Great American Tea Company.

Always a Wholesale Establishment.

We have many inquiries (10 to 20 letters a day) asking what discount we make to the Trade from our prices as published in the Price List. These are our lowest wholesale prices. We consider ourselves only a Wholesale Corporation, and we have but one price.

The way in which we came to break packages at all was, that those who bought chests of Teas we furnished parties with packages as small as five pounds. Our fame spread so far and wide: and parties with small means thought it very hard to be compelled to pay, elsewhere, about a dollar per pound more than we were selling the same goods for, simply because they could not afford to buy five pounds of as to buy one. Therefore, in order to lighten these burdens, we consented to supply them such quantities as small as one pound at the wholesale prices.

Parties of small means wishing for goods to sell can have their orders put up in small packages to suit their trade, but we have made no further reduction in price, as our profits for the last six years have not averaged more than one cent per pound.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will state only the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

1st. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

3d. The Importer makes a profit of 10 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

4th. On the arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

5th. The Speculator sells to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in small lots for sale, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

8th. The Retail Dealer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these eight profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and sold the article at cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to the ladies of the way we can sell them Teas than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, now existing, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Buying together Teas from so many we confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the various choice stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are packed at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
December 1, 1866.

Gt. Am. Tea Co., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York:

Inclosed herewith I send you our regular list for December.

It is now twelve months since we began the use of your Teas and Coffees, and I am pleased in being able to say that the benefits we have derived from the use of said articles by the members of this Club, instead of being confined to individual instances, is universal, and I think I may safely say without exception.

Thanking you for the many favors received at your hands, I am, Sirs, very respectfully,

YOUR obedient Servant, L. CASS CARPENTER.

For manner of getting up Clubs, &c., see former Numbers of this Paper.

P.S.—All towns, villages, or manufactories, where a large consumer is interrupted, by choking together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to the

Great American Tea Company,

31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church.

Post-Office Box No. 5643, New York City.

☞ We would call your notice to the fact that Vesey Street Store is at No. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church Street—not on the double store.

Parties looking for our store will please bear in mind that ours is a double store, Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church Street. This is an important fact to be remembered, as there are many other Tea Stores in Vesey Street.

THE ANNUARY NUMBER OF DEMOREST'S YOUNG AMERICA sparkles with beautiful engravings and other extraordinary attractions. It is unquestionably the juvenile Magazine ever issued. Send for a copy: 15 cents, postpaid. W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, No. 473 Broadway, New York. New York Independent.

REMEMBER THE LITTLE ONES;

THE DESTITUTE and ORPHAN CHILDREN of OUR

COUNTRY'S DEFENDERS.

GRAND CHARITABLE FAIR

AND

PRESENTATION FESTIVAL

IN AID OF THE

HOME AND SCHOOL

FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF

The Destitute Children

OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

"THIS HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1863 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union: its sphere of usefulness is constantly increasing, the children now numbering over 100; and daily are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving little ones, solely for want of room to accommodate them. The old and unsuitable building (on Fifty-eighth Street, New York), now occupied, is entirely inadequate for the wants of such a Home as recently demanded; and the call is made upon the public with a firm belief that the Patriotism and Generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the Children, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this Fair and Festival, which shall stand in the canes of humanity as a fitting rebuke to the trite assertion that "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

Mrs. GENERAL GEORGE G. MEADE, President.
Mrs. CHAS. P. DALY, Acting President.
Mrs. MAJOR-GEN. J. G. FOSTER, Vice-President.
Mrs. ROBERT FORSTER, 2d Vice-President.
Mrs. JOHN S. VOORHIS, Treasurer.
Mrs. DAVID HOYT, Secretary.
Mrs. WM. S. HEALED, Corresponding Secretary.
Mrs. HENRY G. LAW, Manager.
Mrs. J. J. VAN DALSEM, Manager.
Mrs. W. GUNNING.
Mrs. JAMES GILLIES.
Mrs. C. P. HOYT.
Mrs. WM. MAILER.
Mrs. HENRY BAINES.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

The undersigned desiring to express our sympathy and unite our efforts with the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, located in the City of New York, do most cheerfully co-operate with the Ladies composing the Officers and Managers of that Institution as a Supreme Court of Appeals, and approaching "FAIR AND FESTIVAL" in their behalf.

Major-General VAN VLIET.
Major-General JOHN G. BARLOW.
Brigadier-General JOHN COCHRANE.
Brigadier-General CHARLES HAM.
Brigadier-General RUSH C. HAWKINS.
Brevet Brigadier-General JAMES F. HALL.
Judge Chas. P. Daly, Ch'n of Committee.
JNO. H. WHITE.
G. F. B. HOYT.
J. H. FULERTON.

The following card will be fully appreciated by the public, as it receives the thanks of the Institution:

"To the Managing Ladies of the Festival:—Sympathizing in your noble object, I take pleasure in tendering you gratuitously, my professional services on the occasion of your Festival. THEODORE THOMAS."

The Fair will open on the 10th of December, and continue two weeks, at the PUBLIC HALL, corner of Broadway and Twenty-third Street, New York. To be concluded by the

(From Rev. J. W. Foland's Autobiography.)

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was taken sick with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation having for its basis the inside bark of white pine might be of benefit, and as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in the disease alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine I had been using, and put it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, C. W., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, accompanied with bleeding from the throat and mouth of blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She has since taken ten ounces of it, and in November, 1858, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound is unrivalled."—Rural Gentleman.

The great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having received the highest praise for years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures all diseases of the kidneys, diabetes, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary complaints. It is a sure cure for bleeding at the lungs, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and dropsy it will be found invaluable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

THE SETTLER'S CHRISTMAS-EVE.

BY ALICE CARY.

Is a patch of clearing, scarcely more
Than his brawny double hands,
With woods behind and woods before,
The Settler's cabin stands;
A little, low, and lonesome shed,
With a roof of clap-boards overhead.

Ay, low, so low the wind-warped eave
Hangs close against the door—
You might almost stretch a bishop's sleeve
From the rafter to the floor;
And the window is not too large, a whit,
For a lady's veil to curtain it.

The roof-tree's bent and knotty knees
By the Settler's axe are hacked,
And the door-yard fence is three felled trees
With their bare arms interlaced;
And a grape-vine, shaggy and rough and red,
Swings from the well-sweep's high, sharp head.

And among the stubs, all charred and black,
Away to the distant hats,
Winds in and out the wagon-track,
Cut full of zigzag ruts;
And down and down to the sluggish pond,
And through and up to the swamps beyond.

And do you ask beneath such thatch
What heart or hope may be?
Just pull the string of the wooden latch,
And see what you shall see:
A hearth-stone broad and warm and wide,
With master and mistress either side.

And 'twixt them, in the radiant glow—
Prattling of Christmas joys—
With faces in a shining row,
Six children, girls and boys;
And in the cradle a head half-hid
By the shaggy wolf-skin coverlid.

For the baby sleeps in the shaded light
As gently as a lamb,
And two little stockings, scarlet bright,
Are hanging 'gainst the jamb;
And the yellow cat lies all of a curl
In the lap of a two-years-blue-eyed girl.

On the dresser, saved for weeks and weeks,
A hamper of apples stands,
And some are red as the children's cheeks,
And some are brown as their hands:
For cakes and apples must stead, you see,
The rich man's costlier Christmas-tree.

A clock that looks like a skeleton,
From the corner, ticks out bold,
And that never was such a clock to run
You would hardly need be told,
If you were to see the glances proud
Drawn toward it when it strikes so loud

The Settler's rifle, bright and brown,
Hangs high on the rafter-hooks,
And swinging a hand's-breadth lower down
Is a modest shelf of books;
Bible and Hymn-book, thumbed all through,
"Baxter's Call"—and a novel or two.

"Peter Wilkins," "The Bloody Hand,"
"The Sailor's Bride and Bark,"
"Jerusalem and the Holy Land,"
"The Travels of Lewis and Clarke;"
Some tracts—among them "The Milk-maid's Fall,"
"Pleasure Punished," and "Death at a Ball."

A branch of sumach, shining bright,
And a stag-horn deck the wall,
With a string of birds'-eggs, blue and white,
Beneath. But, after all,
You will say the six little heads in a row
By the hearth-stone make the prettiest show.

The boldest urchin dares not stir,
But each heart, be sure, rebels,
As the father taps on the newspaper
With his brass-bowed spectacles;
And knitting-needle with needle clicks,
As the mother waits for the politics.

He has rubbed the glass and rubbed the bow,
And now is a fearful pause:
"Come, Molly!" he says, "come Sue, come Joe,
And I'll tell you of Santa Claus!"
How the faces shine with the glad surprise,
As if the souls looked out of the eyes.

In a trice the dozen ruddy legs
Are bare; and speckled and brown
And blue and gray, from the wall-side pegs,
The stockings dangle down;
And the baby, with wondering eyes, looks out
To see what the clatter is all about.

"And what will Santa Claus bring?" they tease,
"And, say, is he tall and fair?"
While the younger climb the good man's knees,
And the elder scale his chair:
And the mother jogs the cradle, and tries
The charm of the dear old lullabies.

So happily the hours fly past,
'Tis pity to have them o'er,
But the rusty weights of the clock, at last,
Are dragging near the floor,
And the knitting-needles, one and all,
Are stuck in the round, red knitting-ball.

Now, all of a sudden the father twirls
The empty apple-plate—
"Old Santa Claus don't like his girls
And boys to be up so late!"
He says, "And I'll warrant our star-faced cow,
He's waiting astride o' the chimney now."

Down the back of his chair they slide,
They slide down, arm and knee—
"If Santa Claus is indeed outside,
He shan't be kept for me!"
Cry one and all, and away they go—
Hurrying, flurrying—six in a row.

In the mother's eyes are happy tears
As she sees them flutter away;
"My man," she says, "it is sixteen years
Since our blessed wedding-day,
And I wouldn't think it but just a year
If it wasn't for all these children here."

And then they talk of what they will do
As the years shall come and go;
Of schooling for little Molly and Sue,
And of land for John and Joe;
And Dick is so wise, and Dolly so fair,
"They," says the mother, "will have luck to spare!"

"Ay, ay, good wife, that's clear, that's clear!"
Then, with eyes on the cradle bent:
"And what if he in the wolf-skin here
Turned out to be President!
Just think! oh wouldn't it be fine—
Such fortune for your boy and mine!"

She stopped—her heart with hope elate—
And kissed the golden head;
Then, with the brawny hand of her mate
Folded in hers, she said:
"Walls as narrow, and roof as low,
Have sheltered a President, you know."

And then they said they would work and wait—
The good, sweet-hearted pair—
You must have pulled the latch-string straight,
Had you in truth been there.
Feeling that you were not to leave
At the Settler's hearth that Christmas-Eve.

Bound Volumes of Harper's Weekly.

THE NUMBER completes the Tenth Volume of Harper's Weekly. This has been a volume unusually replete with interest. The illustrations, both in number and variety, have surpassed those of any illustrated periodical. Our readers need not be reminded that the year now closing has been a period of great moment in the world's history. The European settlement has passed through the most significant revolution of the last fifty years, out of which a great Protestant Power has come which rivals even the Second French Empire. At home, to the period of bloody civil war there has succeeded a no less critical period of reconstruction. The events of this important year, both Domestic and Foreign, have been illustrated in the Weekly, and have been continually the subject of editorial comment. Every number of the Weekly is electrotyped, and the ten volumes now completed may be obtained at $7 per volume. The contents of these volumes comprise, besides the illustrations of all interesting current events and portraits of prominent personages, an amount of general literature—representing the best productions of the last decade—which is almost half the price of the whole series.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1866.

WHAT NEXT?

THE North Carolina Legislature, by a vote of 93 to 10 in the Lower House, and 44 to 1 in the Upper, has rejected the Amendment. Arkansas, Alabama, and Florida have done likewise. Governor HUMPHREYS recommends its rejection to the Mississippi Legislature, and Governor ORR to that of South Carolina. The Georgia Legislature would prefer a Territorial Government, according to the telegram, rather than the Amendment; and the President of its Senate, "standing erect as a pine," declared that "human forbearance has its limits, and the worm will turn if trodden on." Mr. RAPHAEL SEMMES, Moral Philosopher, announces, in a lecture at Delaware, that he has been and done endeavoring to restore his State to her place in the Union without tarnishing her honor. The Milledgeville Southern Recorder declares that "if this Union is to stand, the rights of the South must be respected." Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS is equally strenuous against the Amendment, and for the continuous rights of States." Every leader of opinion, every newspaper of influence, the Legislatures and the Governors in the unrestored States, are unanimous against the Amendment. Not a single powerful voice in those States has been raised for it.

Meanwhile the petition of the loyal Louisianians, signed by Governor WELLES and others—the inauguration of Ex-Governor PARSONS the President's Provisional Governor of North Carolina, and of a Committee from that State —and the statements of the Southern Loyalists' Association in Washington, all agree that the governments of the unrestored States are in the hands of men hostile to the National Government—that the Union men in those States are consequently oppressed and in constant danger —that the liberty and property of the Freedmen are overridden at the mercy of the disloyal—that justice for loyal men in the civil courts is uncertain, and military protection inadequate. To these statements must be added the reports of great destruction in certain districts, of general apathy or sense of insecurity which springs from the consciousness of a radical derangement of the most public affairs; the unwillingness of capital or labor to move toward disturbed States, and the necessary paralysis of industry. Looking at these facts, with a due knowledge of history and experience of human nature, is it not very difficult to understand the situation with which the country is now called to deal.

The Amendment we must consider virtually rejected as a condition of restoration. The President's policy, or experiment, has also failed. The unrestored States must therefore be considered as substantially in the condition in which they were when the Presidential experiment began—with this advantage, however, that their real spirit has been fully exposed. Yet we would not be unjust to those who have honestly acquiesced; who took up arms and fought, suffered, and won it, and now ask only that the conditions of restoration shall be just in themselves, consonant with the spirit of the Constitution and with the national safety. But such are the men not for the sentiment but which control the action of the unrestored States.

In this situation, then, the first question is, whether Congress should hope for a reaction of opinion, and for the adoption of the Amendment by the unrestored States, and postpone further action of its own toward restoration? But upon what ground can a change of feeling be reasonably expected? The first response to the offer of the Amendment was the New Orleans massacre, when the controlling opinion of the late rebel States relied upon the Executive to sweep out Congress with a bayonet. Then came the Philadelphia August Convention, stimulating the unrestored States to refuse the Amendment, and claiming to represent the true sentiment of the country upon the subject. It was not surprising that those States then refused to act. Americans knew that when a question was formally submitted to the people, and they universally and overwhelmingly approved the Amendment as the condition of restoration; and after the action of the Philadelphia address, which incited the States to oppose the Amendment, told them distinctly that they must accept it or prepare for more stringent measures, they in general were haughty refusal. Undoubtedly the country believed that conditions so just and generous would be, if not heartily, at least silently accepted. Their imperious rejection reveals a state of mind which indicates the wisdom and necessity of other measures. The refusal of the Amendment meant a great deal of the doubt which many loyal men had of the actual national necessity of more stringent and radical measures. Many believed [illegible] kind and reasonable feeling in the unre[illegible] States, which it is now evident does not exist, or does not control State action.

It would appear, then, that Congress must forthwith provide adequate authority, must begin exercise of the President did. The people of United States rejected, and set up new governments, which were overthrown by military forces. They were left without any government in their States, not fully accepting any except those approved by Congress. Congress now proposes by whom the first [illegible] a Government shall be formed. The Constitution is finished it may be [illegible] ment of Congress, of such [illegible] the guarantee of the Union [illegible]. This leaves in the [illegible] physics, where they belong [illegible] torial condition or State [illegible] abstractions which Mr. LINCOLN [illegible] scribed as pernicious. Equally so is the [illegible] dent's assertion, and that of the Democrats [illegible] support him, that the States having been [illegible] vested from seceding and their rights [illegible] impaired. Why, then, did he appoint Provisional Governors, and define the qualifications of the suffrage?

There is no need of entangling ourselves with theories and definitions. The one imperative necessity is, that the measures which Congress takes to restore the governments of the States shall be just, generous, and in the spirit of the Constitution. And we reserve to another day comments upon the various propositions already made.

THE SENATE AND THE VOTING OF WOMEN.

SENATOR COWAN'S proposed amendment to the District Suffrage bill provoked a lively discussion upon the subject of the voting of women. He well understood that the amendment was offered merely to perplex the action of the Senate. The Senator from Pennsylvania, who may be said to have gone to the bottom in the late political storm, evidently supposed that many of his associates would either vote for it upon general principles, in which case they would seem to be pandering to extravagant; or would vote against it, in which case they would displease the radical tendency of the time. But, as usual in his political calculations, he was disappointed. The proposition of the voting of women was felt not to be seriously before the Senate. It is a subject upon which the public mind has not been sufficiently interested to declare itself, and the Senate could not know what the country wanted.

As low is the strong only when it is the expression of public opinion, and the universal work of the true friends of the amendment proposed by Senator COWAN is the awakening of the public mind. The vigorous discussion of the subject will soon reveal the truth that there is no adverse argument. If women have the same natural rights as men, and the same civil rights and duties, including the taxation of property and taxation, the whole question is settled: they have a right to the same protection of their rights that all others enjoy. Senator REVERDY JOHNSON, always first in a poor cause, could only say that if they voted they must also do military duty. But there must be sharper arguments than that, or the proposition will go by default. For women, as citizens, have always done and always will do that work in the public defense for which their sex peculiarly fits them. The care of the young mothers, the nameless and innumerable duties of the hospital and home, are just as essential to national safety as fighting in the field. A nation of men alone could not long maintain a contest.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN spoke well of "the high and holy mission of women." But however excellent her "mission," that does not bear upon the point, for it is only proposed to derive some more practical advantage to society from that mission. Let us all be reasonable. Why is it that the incessant frivolities and absurdities in which women are engaged does not suggest to us to enlarge upon their "high and holy mission?" If people with a high and holy mission may innocently sit bare-necked in hot theatres to be studied through pocket-telescopes until midnight by any body who chooses, why should the high and holy mission be disgraced if they go and quietly drop a ballot in a box to help secure good laws for their children? And as for "the mire of politics" upon which orators wax eloquent, the truth is that they are miry because good men and women will have nothing to do with them. Yet their presence would purify them. And is the commonwealth necessarily safer because intelligence and refinement so often refrain from politics? The most pitiful scene in the conduct of which men and women associate are far from miry for that very reason.

But there is no use in getting hot and arguing the question with a red face. The difficulty with those who urge the suffrage of women is that they repel sympathy by overstatement. They say that the oppression of the female sex as if it were an oppression like that of slavery. But it is nothing like it. There is no oppression, however ignorant and imbruted, who would not deeply have received his freedom. But there are very few of the most cultivated and intelligent women who seem seriously to wish for it. That, however, is merely matter of habit. They have exactly the same interest in good government that men have, and there is no more reason for vesting political power in a man than in a class or in a [illegible]. A State that refuses to treat them in such a matter as it does men ought logically to have no power to hold property or to be taxed. It ought to treat them as incompetent and perpetual minors. But happily the tendency of society is not backward to Oriental notions. Good sense has set aside most of the old laws in regard to women; and when Mr. JOHN STUART MILL proposes in Parliament that they shall be enfranchised, and that the United States, upon whatever deliberately discusses the subject, the possible as when the blossom begins to

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS AND THE EXECUTIVE POWER.

A timely and valuable article by the Hon. JOHN M. READ of Philadelphia has lately been published, reviewing the true constitutional position of the Executive in regard to amendments of the Constitution, and the conduct of the present Executive in relation to the Amendment now pending. The article shows conclusively that the Executive is forbidden to interfere with an amendment in any way whether in Congress or in a State Legislature, and any use of the Executive authority against an amendment is a violation of the Constitution. Judge READ shows, by reference to the record, that none of the first twelve amendments were ever submitted to the President. The thirteenth, that of emancipation, was by an error presented to the President; but the Senate on the 7th February, 1865, declared that the presentation was an inadvertence and should not constitute a precedent.

The present Amendment, the fourteenth, passed the Senate on the 8th of June, 1866, and the House on the 13th. On the 18th a concurrent resolution requested the President to transmit it to the Executives of the several States. On the 22d he complied that it was not submitted for his approval, and proceeded to argue against the expediency and constitutionality of the action of Congress—and this upon a subject of which he had no more official right to speak than the Queen of England. But not content with arguing, he arrayed the force of the Executive patronage against the Amendment. The Captains of the Executive party, SENATORS DIXON, DOOLITTLE, and COWAN, denounced the amendment as unjust and insulting; and, finally, the Philadelphia Convention of the 15th of August declared that the late rebels were degenerate sons of heroes if they could accept it. "The Southern States were sought to be imposed upon them." Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON called for the second reading of this passage, and it was read, while the Convention rose and cheered. When the proceedings were reported to the President he stigmatized a co-ordinate branch of the Government as calling itself "the Congress, and hanging on the verge of the Government." All this was part of the action of the Executive to defeat a constitutional amendment.

Judge READ then proceeds to show that two-thirds of a quorum only are necessary to pass a bill over the veto or to propose an amendment, and that the word "House" as used in the Constitution as synonymous with quorum. Thus there has always been a constitutional quorum in Congress whether the late rebel States were represented or not. The consequences of this position are evident and of the utmost importance. If this Congress be competent to propose amendments, why are not three-quarters of the States which compose it competent to ratify amendments? But if the Congress be not competent, then all national legislation from the year 1861 is treason, and the President, Chief Justice, General, and all Foreign Ministers are equally so. Apply the theory of the incompetency of Congress to the army and navy, and to all our financial obligations and relations, and what would be the result?

Judge READ'S conclusion is, that the ratification of three-fourths of the States now represented in Congress is sufficient for the Amendment; and, secondly, that the ratifications should be received at the President of the Senate instead of the Secretary of State as at present. This view is presented with admirable clearness, ample learning, and discretion, and the brief paper is worthy the most careful consideration of every well-meaning citizen.

COLLEGE BUILDINGS.

IT was a long time after the whole country was traveling by railroad before the cars were even tolerably ventilated; and the most useful improvement of the last result was raising the roof of the car. It was a great relief and very simple, but it was very long before we reached it. There is exactly the same slowness and difficulty in improving existing structures and convenient buildings for colleges. The old brick barrack rides us like a nightmare. We do not even believe in a University that does not assert its existence in huge piles of building like cotton mills, as if there were some similarity in the necessary appliances to produce cotton cloth and scholarship.

The whole subject, of which this is but a detail, is considered carefully and sagaciously in a little pamphlet by Mr. FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED, and submitted as a report to the Trustees of the Agricultural College at Amherst in Massachusetts. He calls it "A few things to be thought of before proceeding to plan buildings for the National Agricultural College." And it is a truly valuable series of suggestions upon the general topic. The huge monumental buildings for accessible purposes in cities differ from want of ground room. Yet in cases where compactness of space would seem most desirable and convenient, as in certain reformatory and penal institutions, the large building has not been found necessary. Mr. OLMSTED refers in illustration to the agricultural colony of Mettray, the Irish Island penal colony when under Captain MACNOCHTON, the Irish penal establishment near Dublin, and the Children's Aid Society in New York. In arranging the buildings for an Agricultural College, however, it is not only essential to determine in what way the necessary College lecture and reading rooms, the laboratory and gymnasium, the museum and armory shall be distributed, but the spirit and character of the farmer's life, with his taste and circumstances, must be borne constantly in mind. These points are well treated by Mr. OLMSTED with great insight and good sense.

As for the dormitory system, the old college barracks and commons are satisfactory to no one. Hitherto they have been erected from motives of supposed convenience, and are part of the tradition of the past. But the great Continental universities they are unknown; and in this country the Michigan University, which has the largest number of students of any college in the country, and which is the social center of the Harvard Alumni last summer declared to be, upon the whole, the truest University in the land, has the buildings necessary for the college purpose, but not the vast dormitories. Mr. OLMSTED says that one of the faculty of one of the oldest American colleges is of opinion that special dormitories are necessary now generally be dispensed with; but he thinks they will take the form of club-houses, or houses for the exclusive use of as many students as can be domesticated under the care of a family. We hope so. It will be another proof of our advancing civilization.

PAYING THE STATE DEBTS.

CONTROLLER HILLHOUSE, of this State, has addressed a letter to Senator MORGAN upon a subject of the most material interest to all the States. He proposes that the National Government shall provide for the war debt of the States in some fair and advisable manner. Had the Government drafted from the beginning, the payment of large bounties, and consequently the great debts, would have been avoided. In paying the bounties the States did only what the National Government would have done if able to do; for the war would not otherwise have been carried on successfully, and as the payment was for the common benefit of the Union the States may justly expect some reimbursement.

General HILLHOUSE refers to the action of the first Congress which assumed for the Union the revolutionary war-debt of the States, and he reasons that to relieve property from the weight of State debt it is unable it to respond to the claims of the United States. The State Governments have the same right with the Union to provide for their own preservation. But if the taxing power of the Government should ever be extended to reach every source of revenue in the State, the State must fall. Therefore national taxation must stop at a point which leaves sufficient revenue to the State or the whole system crumbles. The Controller then shows, from the actual and prudently estimated future financial condition of the country, that the Government will be able to provide for the payment which he recommends; and he proposes that the Government relinquish for that purpose to the States the tax on incomes. The receipts from this source for the year ending June 30, 1866, were $60,000,000—a sum adequate to the proposed object, yet which would still leave the National Government amply provided for its own wants. But if it were not so, the loss of this tax would readily be supplied by the natural increase of other revenues. Thus the States which had made no debt during the war, or which have paid it, could discontinue the tax altogether. Other States would continue it, but might properly reduce it to three per cent.

This plan, as General HALBERSTADT remarks, is not an exemption by the United States of the debts of the States, nor of their payment in any form. Each State would pay its own debts from the property of its own citizens, while the National Government would simply relinquish a single source of revenue. The letter of the Controller is very lucid and concise, and his suggestion, in view of the rapid increase of the revenues, is well worthy the most thoughtful attention.

WEST POINT.

THE Report of the last Board of Visitors to West Point speaks in general terms of satisfaction with the discipline and management of the Academy, but states that many changes may be advantageously made. It proposes that the number of students be increased from 292 to 400. Such a change is plainly desirable, and we see no reason for limiting the number to less than 500. The suggestion that the Academy should be the scientific military school of the nation, and not undertake to teach the lower and higher general branches, is also excellent. It certainly should not be a primary or grammar school. But the great necessity is that the admission should be determined by competitive examinations. If there are to be 200 or 300 students, let them be the 300 or 500 best prepared, and those whom influence or personal partiality favors. Above all, let West Point be a school of chivalric fidelity to the American principle. Let every youth educated by his country or her service be taught that he is a son of Liberty, and that the glory of the flag which he is to bear is that it is the flag of equal human rights.

HOW MUCH SHALL WE SLEEP?

WE know that there are some sluggards in the world, but we demand that their fault is not so much in wasting time in sleep as in a wakeful idleness. They have their activity, and we would have no objection to their having a long night of sleep, provided they would do diligently when awake. Most of those who are the victims of the sluggard, according to SOLOMON'S description, are probably idlers who seek after pleasure at hours when they ought to be asleep; and he, in the morning, when the men who do the world's work, either mental or bodily, are busy, fresh from nature's sound and healthy sleep, they toss about in bed wearily dozing, continually saying, as they rouse from this state, "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep."

Some of these idlers do really sleep much more than they ought to do, simply because they eat so much that they are dull with sleep. Eating is one of their enjoyments. They make a god of their belly, and so stupefy the brain by the consequent engorgement that they must sleep more than other men.

Men who make a business of life—who love activity—in their abhorrence of idlers and sleepy men are apt to give themselves too little time for sleep. They forget that there is in the old couplet, so often quoted, an "early to bed" as well as an "early to rise." They are encouraged to their excessive deeds on the proper hours for sleep by the stories that are often told of the little time given to sleep by some of the great men of the world. If the stories be true, which we much doubt in regard to some of them, we are very clear that more work might have been accomplished in the long run if more time had been daily given to "tired nature's sweet restorer."

That we may have a suitable appreciation of this matter let us consider what sleep is, and what it is for.

Sleep is a singular condition. How opposite to the wakeful state! It has been often likened to death, and called its sister; but it is like death in only a few of its phenomena—its stillness, its insensibility to outward things; but even when profound the blood courses as usual in its channels, the respiration goes on, and nutrition is probably even more active than in the wakeful state; and when not profound the senses respond to impressions and the mind revels in a jumble of thoughts, or even sometimes rouses with all its accustomed regularity.

Sleep is a mysterious condition. Many have been the speculations about it by philosophers and physiologists, but no one has as yet settled, satisfactorily, upon its nature, though we know much in regard to the phenomena and the circumstances that influence it.

The object for which this condition was ordained by the Creator is obvious enough. It is for the restoration and reinvigoration of the system after exhaustion by labor. But it is not needed for this purpose by the whole system. The normal muscles need no sleep; nerely rest is all that is necessary for them. It is the brain and nerves that require sleep, for their action is something besides motion, and therefore something besides the cessation of motion is required by them. The mind must cease to use brain and nerves, both in making impressions upon the world around, and in receiving impressions from it through the senses. And the more perfect this cessation the more perfect is the sleep.

It has been very generally said that sleep is required especially for the repair of the system—that the machinery of the body needs to lie by for repair just like any other machinery. But this has been disputed, on the ground that nutrition and repair are going on all the time. And yet we think that it must be admitted that sleep is necessary for the perfection of this repair, at least in any natural way in its widest sense. During the rest which sleep gives to brain and nerves certain changes undoubtedly occur in the arrangement of the particles, which make a completion of those changes of repair that are going on during the wakeful state. And beyond this there may be some changes which can not be effected at all while the machinery is going.

It is essential, then, to health that sufficient time be given to sleep; for if it be not done there will be imperfect restoration or repair after exhaustion. The result here is cumulative. If there be each night only a small deficiency to repair there will be a gradual but certain undermining of the health. It may be mentioned as a significant fact in this connection that even a severe and long-continued abstraction of sanity and labor for sleep to produce insanity so long as the sleep is not broken in upon materially.

It is better to have too much than too little sleep for, let it ever be remembered, that the amount accomplished in labor either of body or mind is far from being proportioned to the time that was employed.

Some need more time for sleep than others. How much is required in each individual case must be ascertained by observation. From six to eight hours sleep is ordinarily needed. NAPOLEON, JOHN HUNTER and FREDERICK THE GREAT, it is said, got along with five hours; but we think that they would have accomplished more if they had slept more. NAPOLEON is said to have had even less sleep than this; but the contrary has been asserted by distinguished men as a parental discomfiture of knowing his habits. Besides, he was a good sleeper. He slept soundly, and took little time to get to sleep. Whenever most frightfully cut off his regular rest he made up for the loss by naps, into which he could drop so readily that it is said that he could take a nap on horseback.

Children need more sleep than adults, partly at least because there is not merely repair to be provided for but growth. Some parents discommode the daily nap of the child too soon. It should be continued through the third year, and in some cases even longer.

LITERARY.

LABOULLAYE'S "Fairy Book," just published in beautiful form by the HARPERS, is truly delightful. It will take its place at once as a standard fairy book upon the little shelves and in the sweet hearts of children. The author, whose name is so kindly known to us as one of the most intelligent and forceful French friends during the war, dedicates the volume in a charming preface to his grand-daughter, and he adds a sentiment which will be very timely in America. Miss MARY L. BOOTH, the translator of HENRI MARTIN'S "History of France," and of LABOULLAYE'S "Paris in America," has translated the stories with remarkable grace and skill, and the profuse illustrations are of the most fascinating kind for the young eye. Many of the delightful stories of the young reader, but we confess that we have read every word of the book with eagerness and delight. And nothing like stories and fairy tales! Any Tales of Many Nations, yet they are all of one land, the dear and familiar fairy land of Cinderella and Puss in Boots, and All Baba and the Arabian Nights.

Miss MULOCK'S new novel, "The Two Marriages," is published by TICKNOR & LAURIAT. The name is the passport for her charming books to every heart and hearth. The tender, touching story of "A Noble Life" is not more delightful than the famous novel of "John Halifax," and the new volume will have the same wide circulation and welcome.

In "Sir Brook Fossbrooke," by CHARLES LEVER, the "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood," by GEORGE MACDONALD, "Ralph Wilton's Weird," by Mrs. LYNN LINTON, "Rachel's Secret," by the author of "The Master of Morton," "Bertha," from the German of L. MÜHLBACH, and "Lucy Arlyn," by Mrs. OLIPHANT, the author of "Miss Marjoribanks," the HARPERS have reprinted the most notable novels of the late English novels, and provided for every taste

THE MATAMOROS AFFAIR.

The following are the facts in regard to the recent occupation of Matamoros by General Sedgwick:

Up to November 24 Canales continued to hold the city with a force of 1200 men. Escobedo threatened it with about the same number from the outside. On the 24th General Sedgwick arrived. It was officially that he could not control his troops for want of money by any means, and requested him to occupy the city. General Sedgwick, through Colonel Perkins, requested Canales to state his city officially, which he did; whereupon it was agreed that the United States forces should occupy the plaza and street to the south of the town, while Canales occupied the northern portion as heretofore. Canales was to receive the collections, the story that Canales could not control his troops, and the mistake that it was a move to get the American forces into the city for its better defense against the threatened attack of Escobedo.

Early on the morning of the 24th a pontoon bridge was thrown across the river at Matamoros, from Brownsville to Matamoros, and a detachment of United States troops, under Colonel Hoffman, crossed and took command of Matamoros. These forces belonged to the Twenty-fourth Infantry and Colored Infantry. A small force of the Fourth Cavalry had preceded them. At noon the remaining troops had also been passed over the ferry the night previous, and had taken possession of the points leading to the city, which is about a mile distant.

The same evening General Sedgwick arranged a pontoon bridge between the river, between Canales and Escobedo. Escobedo announced his intention of attacking Canales that night, but by noon on the morning of the 25th, in response to which General Sedgwick replied that he would not let that the American flag was flying over the plaza.

On the 26th the Elizabeth Ann arrived from Galveston with dispatches to the Sherman-Campbell expedition from Washington, immediately after which the United States forces were withdrawn to this side of the Rio Grande, and it is said that Escobedo and Canales have become reconciled.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Charleston Courier of December 18 contains the report of the Legislative Committee appointed to take into consideration the action of the Legislature or rejection of the Constitutional Amendment. The Committee declare that they have given the important question a careful consideration, and have come to the conclusion to recommend the ratification that the Amendment be not adopted. This recommendation was adopted by the House at once, and the Amendment may, therefore, so far as the Palmetto State is concerned, be considered as rejected. The Amendment, it is known, fully agrees with the decision which was arrived at by the Reconstruction Committee. The Courier also contains the report of the Committee appointed by the Legislature to prepare a memorial to the Congress of the United States, which report is directly antagonistic to the position just assumed by Ex-Governor Perry.

ALABAMA.

The reading of Governor Patton's Message in favor of the Amendment caused considerable excitement in South Florence, Alabama. In the Senate, after some discussion for and against the Amendment, a motion was made to refer the Message to the Committee on Federal Relations was carried by a vote of Yeas 24, Nays 9. Messrs. Bell, Bynum, Hundley, and Wood declined voting in the negative. In the House there was no much excitement as to the body adjourned. On the following day the Committee on Federal Relations, to whom the Governor's Message was referred, reported that they "had duly and maturely considered the same, and that the Legislature was not prepared to enter into an argument for their Report, the Committee are of the opinion that the Legislature should not ratify the proposed amendments." They therefore offered the following resolution that "the State of Alabama refuses to ratify" the Amendment. This resolution was carried by a vote of 27 to 2 in the Senate, and 69 to 8 in the House.

GEORGIA.

The Legislature adjourned sine die. The feeling manifested was most unfavorable to any reconsideration of the Amendment. In the Speaker of the House, in his closing address, bade the country to hope that the Act of Congress submitting the Reconstruction Committee principles yet prevail. The President of the Senate spoke of the Civil Rights laws and clause to the Constitution; but human forbearance had its limits, and the Legislature, in a sensible, dignified and firm manner was manifested in both Houses at these sentiments. The Act of Ratification of the Homestead Act was sustained. Five vetoes were sent in, and only that of the Bill was passed.

RAILROAD STATISTICS.

Mr. R. D. Baxter lately presented to the Royal Statistical Society of London a paper on the railroads of the world, the most interesting part of which is that in the United States the number of miles of railway in operation and under construction, is far ahead of the whole of Europe, Great Britain and Ireland included, having but about 42,000 miles, while we in the United States have 49,000 miles of railroad, of which near 25,000 more are in active operation. Our railroads would, in a single line, girdle or surround the globe.

HAULING HOME THE CHRISTMAS BOUGHS.—[DRAWN BY H. W. HERRICK.]

BETHLEHEM—SCENE OF THE HOLY NATIVITY.

BETHLEHEM.

AMONG OUR Christmas illustrations we give on this page two, touching more nearly the sacred nature of this joyful season: a View of Bethlehem—the scene of the Nativity; and a beautiful representation of the Wise Men of the East following the Star to Bethlehem. The two pictures are intimately related to each other, the centre of interest in either case being the manger-cradle, "where the young child lay." No place has associations so sacred as Bethlehem. About here dwelt the shepherds to whom the angels sang that everlasting Gospel carol of "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men." This story of the angels with their message and song still glorifies Bethlehem in the thought of the Christian. For him the sky above the little village is still the scene of that angelic pomp, and the hills still resound with that first Christmas song of Glory and Peace and Good-Will. And he ever follows the Wise Men to pay his adoration to the new-born King and Redeemer.

MIMI'S CHRIST-CHILD.

THE great kitchen had been swept and scoured and dusted to the last point of cleanliness; the hearth had been newly redded, and the iron dogs high piled with oak and hickory logs.

Directly in front of the roaring fire sat Mimi, in her little blue chair, her elbows upon her knees, her chin within her palms, and her great brown eyes fixed upon the fantastic flames whirling and dancing up the chimney.

At the other side of the room, with her back to Mimi and the fire, stood a tall, bony woman, of middle age, laboriously kneading a mass of wheaten dough, and solacing her labor by humming a psalm-tune.

The only other occupant of the room was a great tortoise-shell cat, who lay at Mimi's feet, her legs stretched out toward the fire, her head crouched upon the bricks, and her yellow eyes sleepily blinking as they too watched the blaze, which made of them two great topazes.

The parting of the cat, the grave melody of the hymn, and the crackling of the fire, mingled pleasantly with each other and with Mimi's reverie, until at last she said, softly:

"Eunice!"

"'Up, Israel! to the Temple haste,
And keep your festal day!'" sang the woman, plunging vigorously at the dough.

"Eunice!" called Mimi again.

"What say?" and, still anchored by the fists in the clinging mass of dough, Eunice turned her head over her shoulder, and looked in some surprise at the motionless little figure in the blue arm-chair.

"Do you know how to make plum-pudding, Eunice?" asked Mimi, after a little pause.

"Of course I do! I can make a first-rate plum-pudding, only your pa don't like 'em, so we never have 'em."

Mimi made no reply, and after a moment Eunice went on with her work and her tune.

"'How pleased and blest was I!'" sang she, when again she was interrupted.

"Eunice, what are we going to have for dinner to-morrow? It is Christmas-day."

"I know that. We're agoing to have baked beans and brown bread and Injun pudding. We've had that dinner every Christmas-day this ten year."

The dough was now so thoroughly kneaded as to

"eleave" from the hands that had worked it; and Eunice, making it into a shapely mass, placed the wooden cover on the bread-trough, and over this laid a thick white cloth. Then she went to the stub to wash her hands; and finally came toward the fire nothing down her sleeves.

Lily Richardson says they are going to have a roasted goose and plum-pudding for dinner to-morrow, and games in the evening; and to-night they will all hang up their stockings, and Santa Claus will put something in every one," said Mimi, without changing her position.

"Like enough! The Doctor's folks hold to these sort of things," replied Eunice, rather contemptuously.

"Well, I think they are real nice sorts of things, and I wish we did them too," said Mimi, somewhat huskily, as the changed her position so as to look up at the brown, thin face of the housekeeper, who, still mechanically pulling at her sleeves, said, softly:

"You sorry to—been years ago-to-night?"

"Since what, Eunice?" asked Mimi, eagerly.

"Since we left Christmas," replied Eunice, dryly, adding directly: "Now I'm going up to de me, and you had as well get along with your pa. But he's kind of lonesome-to-night, I reckon."

Mimi looked down for a moment, and then pushing back her chair a little impatiently, went toward a door at the further end of the kitchen.

"I'll ask papa," murmured she, softly turning the latch and entering the room as quietly as possible, for Mr. Beverly was a man whom most persons feared as much as they liked, and even his bright and patient little daughter had to restrain her step and her voice in his presence to much quieter demonstration than usual.

Especially to-night, for the Squire, as Eunice liked to call him, had upon his face a look which Mimi had learned to know, but did not love. A look of gloom, and sorrow, and stern endurance, a reader of expression would have said; but to Mimi it was only the look which meant papa did not wish to speak or to be spoken to, and that she was to make no noise, or even look at him too keenly. So, just glancing at him, sitting far back in his study-chair, in the shadow of the head slightly thrown back, she hardly visible under the gray and frowning brows—fixed upon the dying fire, she set quietly to work behind him, and with her small hands clasped upon her knee began again to wonder, for the hundredth, dreadful time before, why Christmas-eve was so uncomfortable a time in her ordinarily cheerful home, and what Eunice could have meant by her words about Christmas.

But at ten years old one does not wonder long at any thing, and Mimi presently began to study, as she had often done before, the figures in a large painting hanging over the mantel.

The scene was a stable—the rough beams cobwebbed, dirty, and festooning scattered around. In the fore-ground was a group consisting of a lovely woman holding an infant in her arms—an infant upon whose tiny forehead a painter had tried to impress the tenderness, the holiness, the conscious sacrifice which, from his birth, made the Holy Child so one distinct from the sons of men. Behind the mother and infant stood the venerable form of Joseph; and at the right hand of the woman, the figure of the Wise Man, who, coming to do homage to the baby Christ. At the left-hand side of the nursing mother and child were seated their great brown eyes fixed in dumb adoration upon the scene before them.

Mimi knew what the picture meant, for she had often talked of it with Eunice, and had once sat blinking of the eyes and saying that it told, until, half-unconsciously, she said:

"I wonder if the cattle really do kneel in their stalls on Christmas-eve? Eunice says some people believe it. Do you, papa?"

"What, child!" asked her father, never raising the grey head from its drooping posture.

"Do you believe the cattle kneel in their stalls on Christmas-eve, because that is the time the Lord was born?" repeated Mimi, nervously.

"I know nothing about it. Why do you ask me? I have nothing to do with Christmas-eve or its legends. Go away, child, and play with your doll, or talk to Eunice."

He leaned forward as he spoke, and laid his face bend in his clasped hands. Mimi stood for an instant looking at him, and longing with all her loving little heart to soothe and comfort this mysterious grief, but the habitual submission to her father's commands was stronger than the tender impulse, and she crept silently to the door, opened and shut it as softly as she could, and went again alone in the kitchen.

Eunice told me to go to papa, and papa tells me to go to Eunice," thought the poor child, sadly. "Doesn't any body want me or love me when it is Christmas-eve? I wish there was a little Christ-child now, and I would go and stay with him. Are the cows—I wonder if our cows know it is Christmas-eve, and will kneel down in their stalls? I mean to go and see."

So Mimi took from the peg behind the door her little Rob Roy cloak, threw it across her shoulders, and drew the hood over her head, looking, with her round smooth face and brown curls, more like the Red Riding Hood in a picture than like a little New England country girl. Then quietly letting herself out at the back-door, she stood for a moment upon the step looking about her. It was just after sunset, and every glow still lingered in the west, melting imperceptibly into the cold, hard blue of the sky overhead, where already some stars were glittering as bright and near as bayonet points. A north wind was sweeping over the white fields, catching the edges of the snow-wreaths, whirled them off in feathery clouds to fall presently in some more sheltered corner or ravine. Far away upon the hill-side stood the solitary house in view; and as Mimi noticed the ruddy light streaming from all the windows she knew that Lady Richardson's "good time" was in progress.

A little wind blew through the child's frame. Partly it was the north wind, that just then flung a shower of fine snow into her face; partly it was the chill at her heart, which she had brought from her father's study.

She made a backward step and laid her hand upon the latch; but just then a cow lowed from the barn, and Mimi paused.

"I will just run and see if they are kneeling," said she, aloud, and jumping off the step, she hurried along the path dug through the deep snow to the barn, and, with fingers already numb with cold, raised the wooden latch of the little door, and hearing it, wide open.

The five cows and the pair of oxen were all in their places, but the cows were busily eating their hay, standing the while so sturdily upright that Mimi was quite disgusted.

"Well, they were oxen, I guess, in the real stable. Maybe cows don't know," murmured she, as she closed the door behind her. "Eunice certainly not in a standing position, but whether they could be said to kneel, or whether they were merely lying down, Mimi could not at first determine; and she was still bending over them, while they, looking up at her with great, luminous eyes, seemed to wonder what she could want, when she was startled by a sound which behind the round hay in the barn-door—a sound of a little child cooing and talking to itself in sweet, baby-like accents.

"Oh, if it should be another little baby Christ!" thought Mimi, breathlessly, as she crept on tip-toe in the direction of the sound, and peeped around a corner.

A baby, indeed, sitting high up in a manger, holding up a little mottled fat to catch a ray of light which, streaming through a knot-hole in the outer wall of the barn, fell directly across her, and which he, poor little dear! mistook for the "cloud of the Lord's glory" he had "trailed" from Paradise.

But the baby was not alone. Just beyond him lay a woman, young and fair, in the attitude of the picture, except that her sweet face was whiter than any face Mimi had ever seen. She was perfectly motionless. She was asleep, but in such a strange position, with her head thrown back, her arms lying at her sides, and her hands tightly clenched. It was so strange and awful a sleep that Mimi, standing and peeping at it around the jut of her sheltering corner, was for the time done at the kiss of the north wind, and was creeping a little back from the dreadful sight of her, to go to one again, holding up his arms and stirring his feet impatiently as he cooed and talked.

"I'm glad to see you, you dear little girl. Come and take me up, won't you?"

Mimi turned at the appeal as well as if it had been spoken; and with a sudden impulse she rushed forward, snatched the baby from his perch, and turned toward the house without glancing again at the pale woman still lying motionless upon the straw.

"Askee Alice, Mimi, what have you got there?" exclaimed Eunice, as the breathless little figure flew into the kitchen, and closing the door, stood, back against with her back against it as if fearful of pursuit.

"Oh, Eunice, there is a baby Christ in the barn, and its mother is asleep in the barn, and oh, she's so dreadful white and still—"

"The barn—in our barn?" asked Eunice, incredulously, as she came forward and looked closely at the child in Mimi's arms. And then, with a long, lingering exclamation, took it in her own and carried it into the full light of the fire.

"Yes, she's on the hay-pile in the hay, and she's just as sound asleep as she can be," panted Mimi.

"Well, you're a fool, Miss Mimi," said she, and this very night of all the nights in the year," murmured Eunice, and then, with a look of fear, she glanced back at Mimi's arms and hastened toward the door. With her hand upon the latch she paused, and as if she could not bear that all the ruddy color had gone out of her face, leaving it almost as ghastly, though not half so white as that of the woman in the barn.

"Where's David, do you know?" asked she, sharply, of Mimi standing by her mother's chair.

"No; I suppose he's at his own house."

"I'll run there, then," said she, "and you keep the baby quiet, Mimi, and don't let it cry for your life."

She was gone and the door closed, and Mimi, almost frightened at the new excitement in the old kitchen, seated herself in the little blue arm-chair with the baby upon her knee, and began to coo and talk to it, and great brown eyes which looked up at her with a strangely familiar glance.

"Why, you're not dressed when heavy steps were heard without; and Eunice, opening the door, held it for David, who, entering, stood looking down upon his arms the lifeless form of the woman Mimi had left in the barn.

"Right in here, Dave, and don't make noise enough to start a weasel, whispered Eunice, wringing down her cheeks and dropping off her pointed chin, began to undress the cold, still figure upon her bed, whispering all the time.

"Poor dear critter! Poor gal! To think of her coming to this! Poor lamb!"

Then suddenly she beckoned to Mimi, who went to her, and pointing to the baby, said, in a sharp whisper, ing if all the mysteries that had perplexed her so long were about to be made clear, Mimi trembled, but the sooner was she within reach than Eunice, grasping her arm with unconscious force, led her to the bed, and, pointing to the face, said, in a hoarse whisper:

"It's your own sister, Mimi Beverly. It's your father's daughter, and his wife. Look upon his sin in with cold and starving and hard work. What do you think of doing now?"

"My sister! I haven't any sister!" stammered Mimi, half-frightened at the housekeeper's earnest tone.

"Now you have, and you'll keep her. Because since the night ten year ago this Christmas-eve, that she left your father's house, he's never heard her name nor speak to or think of again, and the next day she was gone. It killed her mother, for she took that hard-hard, and those days after she died, and when the poor critter cursed her, and the curse clung to her, and she never got forgiven, and she died. I'm to tell it her mother forgive her before she died. The poor critter wanted to see your father, but was I don't know, but then as knows him can guess; and from that day her name has never been heard in this house no more, nor her self neither, for she's been dead; but year by year I've seen that water was a-flowing down the window-pane, and I've known after another has come round they've laid heavier and heavier on the sod, till there's been a big mound over the grave. Whether it's the dead mother or the cursed daughter he's mourning for I can't say, but now's the time to find out, and you're the one to do it, Mimi. Thank the Lord there's a little warmth at last in this poor critter's cheek, and a bright color burning on her lips, and you to tell to you. I love you, Katerina, better than I believe you will ever be loved again."

"But I don't love you," sobbed Katchen.

"I don't expect you should, all at once. Indeed no. I am twenty years older than you, my child, and staid and dull in your eyes. But I will be kind to you—oh, Katchen, if you will let me, I will be so kind to you! and shall be the source of every thing I possess, and your father shall have a home with us while he will. I have plenty."

"But I am quite, quite poor. I have not a krentzer of dowry. Perhaps you didn't know?" And the blue eyes looked up into Herr Ebner's spectacles with a naive expression of wonder. The spectacles flashed all over their penetrating surface as he shook his head, but the eyes behind them were very soft and tender when he answered—

"I did know, I do know; but, my child, no riches could make you more dear to me."

Katchen had a heart in spite of her frivolity, and it was touched by the generosity and disinterested affection of the middle-aged suitor. But to accept it! Ah, that was another thing! And then there was Fritz. No, it couldn't be. But Ebner refused to take her answer so soon. He would give her a week to consider of his proposal, and meanwhile would not obtrude himself on her in any way. "Only," said he, as he went away, "do try to be good to me, my child—try to be good to me."

When old Josef Kester heard of the proposal he was clean with joy and pride.

"Ain't you astonished, father?" said Katchen.

"Astonished? Not a bit of it. I saw, long ago, that the man was desperately in love with one of us two, and I naturally supposed it to be you."

But Katchen was suddenly overpowered when his daughter protested that, though she felt deeply grateful to Herr Caspar Ebner, and proud of his good opinion, she could never consent to be his wife. Then old Josef treated this as mere childish folly that meant nothing. But as the hope he argued, and the anger he grew, the more obstinate became Katchen's opposition, till she had to take refuge in the only system of letting her take her own way—for the present.

Two or three days of the week went by, and Katchen had by no means made up her mind as to the course she should give Caspar Ebner. Her father's tactics of non-opposition were beginning to tell, and the image of the grandeur that lay at her feet, ready to be picked up. The coal-fields, the servants, the carriages—the chance of travel, perhaps even of seeing Vienna —all these temptations crowded through her mind pell-mell. And then, duty to her father! Could she act that to weigh with her? In the midst of her indecision came a letter from Fritz. That to say, a letter written to by some friend at Fritz's dictation, for his own calligraphic powers extended only to the mere signing of his name. A letter from Fritz! She had never received one from him before.

"My own Katchen,—I am right glad that I can send you this letter. A trusted friend here at Salzburg writes it down, but he writes all as I tell him. You seemed somewhat cold when I saw you last; but I feel sure it is blame. To confess truth, I was too jealous of the landlord of the Black Eagle. Yes indeed. We are friends now. Just as if you were not of him! But true love is always kin with jealousy, they say. I hope your worth, my darling, and feel sure of your fidelity. But only I would advise, go not too often to Herr Ebner's house. Folks will talk, and I shall see you, please Heaven, early in the year. Meanwhile, forget me not.

"Thine, ever loving,
FRITZ ROSENHEIM."

"Greet thy father heartily for me."

Katchen was as uncertain as the sea in her moods, and this unlucky letter sent her into a most heartsick and contemptuous frame of mind. "He is sure of me, is he! Could he say more if we had been betrothed since the whole village? And why should he be jealous, indeed? As if it were impossible to love any one better than him! Advises me not to go to the Black Eagle! It's downright insolent. I know very well what 'kin doing.'" And so she worked herself into a boiling-point. On a sudden she crushed the offending letter in her hand, and ran down to the water's brink, where her father was gathering in the old boat, trying to mend it in an awkward, unhandy manner. He looked round as she neared, and conscious of waning strength and failure in his attempt. His clothes were very threadbare and shabby. His broad placid forehead was puckered up into lgenole cross lines. The down-fall path was getting steeper and steeper; the downward pace quicker and quicker. Tears came into Katchen's eyes as she looked at him, and with an impulse born of many conflicting emotions, she ran to him, and putting her hands on his shoulders, cried, "Father, would you really like to marry Herr Ebner? Would it make you happy?"

"Child! it is as if you had dropped from heaven. I was just looking over a tangled web of troubles, and thinking that there was but one way to unravel them, and that you wouldn't take that way. And behold, you come with the welcomest words on your lips that have passed them for many a long year."

"Would it really and truly make you happy, father?"

"Happy! More happy than I thought ever to be again, child."

"Then I will," said Katchen, in a low voice.

Josef kissed his daughter, and blessed her, but repressed any exuberant demonstrations of joy, although he could have leaped and shouted aloud. "Remember, he" If I say too much, she'll begin to argue on the other side, and change her mind altogether." Josef was growing cunning.

CHAPTER V.

Not to be tempted to break his word to Katchen, Herr Ebner had gone away from Gosau, than leaving her quite free and unmolested for her week of consideration. Had Ebner been on the spot, Josef Kester would have come up to the Black Eagle to tell him the good tidings secretly. As it was, he had no choice but to wait until the end of the week. The days passed slowly with him, but to Katchen they seemed to fly past with unwonted rapidity. She sat idly dreaming from morning to night, scarcely making a pretence of turning the great spinning-wheel, before which she sat nearly all day. The servant girl grew impatient, and complained that all the work fell on her shoulders; but old Josef bade her hold her tongue, and gave hints of some grandeur that was shortly to fall on the family, to which Liese listened open-mouthed. At length dawned Saturday morning. The year was well advanced now. Cold winds, chilled by the mountain snows, passed across the lake and whistled by the cottage, shaking strippings the boughs barer and barer at every gust. The early morning hours were raw and comfortless, although toward mid-day the sun gained power and brightness. When Katchen arose that Saturday morning she felt as though a tight hand were pressing on her heart. "I must decide—I must decide!" These words rang in her ears as if some one had spoken them aloud, but they were only uttered by her own anxious thoughts. She came down to prepare breakfast—so pale and heavy-eyed that the slow-witted Liese perceived there was something wrong, and hastily asked her young mistress what was the matter with her, for which attention Liese received a sharp snubbing. Her manner noticed Katchen's wan looks, but said nothing. In truth, he was a little anxious himself. She had promised to marry Herr Ebner, and that was well; but he did not wish his child to be unhappy.

"It is cold," said Katchen, turning from the table to cower over the great cooking-stove in the kitchen. "I'm so cold, I can't eat. There are sad ill-boding sighing, lilly clicking her knitting-needles now and again, during the day were on. Dinner-time came, but Katchen was still too cold to eat, she said, though the sun was high in the heavens. She heard the distant rumble of soup, and then wrapped a warm cloak around her and went out. It was impossible, she said to herself, to sit there any longer, freezing and shivering by the fire, and expecting to see him each time the latch clicked. Katchen wandered down to the lake's brink, where a pile of fuel was stacked, and sat down on some logs, just as she had seen Caspar Ebner at Hallstadt. She thought of that day, and of the many subsequent days when he had shown such kindness from Caspar Ebner, and she remembered the last time he had come, and how his reputation for honor and honesty. She summed up his good qualities, and how he loved her by, and asked her heart—so she phrased it mentally—could she ever love him as he deserved? Could she ever be too most call her heart for want of a better word, another?" No!

"He is far better than I—far, far better. He is true, and gentle, and generous. Can't I marry him?" "No!"

"He is a learned man compared to ignorant little me, and rich and great. Can't I marry him?" "No!"

"He offers a home to father, and will smooth that past, and will be a son to him. Can't I marry him?" "No!"

Katchen was aghast. She had fancied there was nothing to be done but for her to say unconcernedly, "Yes, I will have him," and there was the end. But herself to this point might be difficult, but the point once reached, all was plain sailing. And now, behold, when she said "I will," some voice in her heart answered "I won't!" All this time, too, the image of Fritz was haunting her. She had been most to blame of him, and even thought she was not thinking of him, but only of Herr Ebner, and the duty she owed at her, if she but closed her eyes an instant in her efforts to meditate. Truly that "will" of hers was a most incomprehensible and unmanageable autocrat, and Katchen at last resolved to give up the struggle and abide by it. Then, as if to help her out with this philosophical decision a footstep crushed the pebbles on the beach, and Herr Ebner stood before her. He advanced with outstretched arms, but Katchen stepped up with a start and made quite a leap backward.

"Did I frighten you, Katerina?" said Ebner, a little crestfallen.

"No, only you come sudden like."

"Are you not glad to see me, child?" The air blows chill from the lake. Will you walk a little way with me?"

Katchen's knees trembled as she complied with his request. She was in a nervous fever of apprehension, but Herr Ebner did not at present broach the subject. This was a respite; but then she almost wished he would, and have done with it. Suspense, however, was so dreadful. She had not to wait long, however.

"Katchen," said Ebner, when they had walked a few yards side by side, "have you thought of what I said to you?"

"Yes," said Katchen, in a faint little voice.

"I kept my word, did I not? I went away and left you quite free." Katchen bowed.

"Katchen, may I hope you have a kind word to say to me? It will be easy for you, but oh, how precious to me!"

"It—it isn't easy," said Katchen, with a childlike candor of her breast.

"Well, no; perhaps not quite easy for a young maiden to say; but pray will you say it, Katchen? Let me tell me that you will be my wife, my treasure, my darling, the mistress of my home?" And he caught her two cold little hands in his, bending down his tall form so as to look into her face. The action roused the spirit of wilfulness in the young girl's heart, though he held them in a strong grasp, and clasped them before her startled eyes.

"No, no, no, I can't. Indeed—Indeed I can't. Don't be angry with me; I am grateful—Indeed. You are very kind and very generous, but I can't marry you." And she sobbed as though she would choke. Ebner stood for a moment as if in a dream. Then he raised them with his mind, but he could find only one word.

"Why?" he said, in a low, terrible dryly out of his throat.

"Because I—I can't," sobbed Katchen.

That did sound logical, but it was true.

"You can. If you choose to say yes, you can, unless there is some one else you love." Katchen's head seemed to get dryer and dryer, and the words came hastily. Katchen looked at them. They seemed to offer a tangible reason.

"There is some one who loves me very much—she began, and then checked herself. Ebner's brow darkened into a frown, and he looked sternly at the frightened girl.

"You have deceived me, then," said he at last. "I trusted to you. I was very childish, but I did not think you dishonorable."

"Dishonorable! Oh dear, oh dear, what makes you say such things, and speak so cruelly?"

"Yes, dishonorable. I repeat it. Cruel and heartless. You have been playing with me for your own ends; and all the while you were the promised wife of another man. Why did you not tell me so at once, honestly?"

"But I'm not," retorted Katchen, roused to anger in her turn. "I never was. I never knew that till to make her the less angry. "I can not his promised wife, for I never loved him. I never will love him. I don't love him, nor you, nor any body. I wish I had died rather than I had seen you, or known you, and I hate you, every one!" Katchen wrapped her cloak over her head, and ran off sobbing, with her face hidden in its folds. Herr Ebner was utterly astonished. Was this his sweet, bright, good-humored Katchen? This petish, passionate, unreasonable girl? Caspar Ebner was in love, it was true, but then he had been refused by her, and had learned how to make him clear-sighted. At all events he did not perceive that Katchen had been strangely wayward, and, to speak the truth, unfeminine. When a man seriously means to ask a girl to be his wife it is difficult to suppose that she will not be aware of his intention. He could not but believe that Katchen had understood his feelings from the first day on which he came and told him of some one else who loved her. His amour propre was deeply hurt. In truth, Ebner had not been at all unconscious of the advantages which Katchen would have derived from his silence. He had counted on securing not only a daughter, but a father, and in a humble rank of life; but if she had consented to marry, would she have taken up a chair, and dressed in plaid, with short sleeves, bare arms and neck. About her neck is a gold chain, which hangs down by her side as if attached to a locket.

Her hands are clasped, and from her arm is suspended an ornamental leather satchel. From appearances her hair was of light auburn color, and, as the ladies term it, "frizzed" in front and braided on the sides; the open braids hang gracefully over her cheeks. Her face is round and expressive, with a small dimple in her chin. The likeness was found on an unknown body.

A recent English work—containing many pretty verses—has the following, which mothers will enjoy reading:

ONLY A BABY SMALL.

Only a baby small,
Dropt from the skies;
Only a laughing face,
Two sunny eyes;
Only the dimpled hands,
One chubby form;
Only two little feet,
Two arms to warm.
Ten little toes;
Only a golden head,
Curly and soft;
Only a tongue that says,
Loudly and oft;
Only a little heart
Empty of thought;
Only a little brain
Troubled with naught;
Only a baby slumber,
Sent us to rear;
Only to love,
While we are here.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"You want nothing, do you?" said Pat. "Bedad, no! if it's anything you want, you'll find it in the jug where the whisky was."

Bascompierre, French ambassador to Spain, was riding Henri Quatre's horse one day, when the latter was mounted on the very smallest mule in the world. "Ah," said Henri, "what a very amusing sight, to see the biggest ass mounted on the smallest mule!" "I was your majesty's representative," was the rejoinder.

"I say, John, where did you get that rogue's hat?" "Please, sir, I found it," said John, "and would one o' your's that the Missis gave me yesterday."

Dr. Franklin's celebrated receipt for cheap sleighriding runs as follows: "Get a big ball in your sitchclothes, with both doors open, so that you can get a good draft; put your self in a pair of ice boots; drop the front-door key down your back; hold an icicle in one hand and rip the tech with the other. He says you can't tell the difference with your eyes shut, and it's a great deal cheaper.

"Bridget," said a mistress to her Irish servant, "where's the gridiron?" "An' sure, ma'am, I'm just after giving it back to my own cousin Bridget O'Flaherty; the thing's so full of holes it's no good at all."

"Are those bells ringing for fire?" inquired Simon of Tiberias. "No, indeed," answered Tibe, "they were got plenty of fire: the bells are ringing for wa ter."

There was an old Dutchman at Delft,
Loved pipe, and his pipe, beer, and himself,
So a clumsy sea daughter,
Of the ocean was he,
Changed him into a mermaniah elf.

Some mischievous wags one night pulled down a farmer's sign and put over the door instead, "Entrance to round." All sorts of turning and twisting were heard.

Said a wag to a friend: "Miss — though a rather broad-featured young lady, has a very benign countenance." "Yes," said the friend, "and a very large mouth."

WITHOUT THE MEANS.—When an Irish priest rebuked his parishioner for drunkenness, and told him that "whenever he entered an alehouse to drink his guardian angel stood weeping at the door." "And if he had stopped to cry he is himself," was the reply.

THE CONJUGAL BANQUET.

Twelve sorts of meat my wife provides,
Nor fails one of a dish;
Four are of flesh, of fruit are four,
The other four are fish.

For the first course she stores my board
With birds that dainties are;
And first a quail, with tooth so frail,
A bittern, and a jar.

With these my spouse provides, when cloy'd,
For fish she orders sharp;
And serves me up a lamp, a pout,
A pudgeon, and a carp.

Then the dessert with fruit abounds,
All tilting well the sweet—
A medlar and an artichoke,
A crab, and a small reason.

Now can a man have such a wife
And not upon her dote?
Who every day provides him fare
Which costs him not a groat?

A VISIT FROM SAINT NICHOLAS.

By CLEMENT C. MOORE.

'Twas the night before Christmas, when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse;
The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that St. Nicholas soon would be there;
The children were nestled all snug in their beds,
While visions of sugar-plums danced in their heads;
And Mamma in her 'kerchief, and I in my cap,
Had just settled our brains for a long winter's nap;
When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I sprang from the bed to see what was the matter.
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tore open the shutters and threw up the sash.
The moon on the breast of the new-fallen snow,
Gave the luster of mid-day to objects below,
When, what to my wondering eyes should appear,
But a miniature sleigh, and eight tiny rein-deer,
With a little old driver, so lively and quick,
I knew in a moment it must be St. Nick.
More rapid than eagles his coursers they came,
And he whistled, and shouted, and called them by name:
"Now, Dasher! now, Dancer! now, Prancer! and Vixen!
On, Comet! on, Cupid! on, Donder and Blitzen!
To the top of the porch! to the top of the wall!
Now dash away! dash away! dash away all!"
As dry leaves that before the wild hurricane fly,
When they meet with an obstacle, mount to the sky;
So up to the house-top the coursers they flew,
With the sleigh full of toys, and St. Nicholas too.
And then, in a twinkling, I heard on the roof
The prancing and pawing of each little hoof—
As I drew in my head, and was turning around,
Down the chimney St. Nicholas came with a bound.
He was dressed all in fur from his head to his foot;
And his clothes were all tarnished with ashes and soot;
A bundle of toys he had flung on his back,
And he looked like a peddler just opening his pack.
His eyes—how they twinkled! his dimples how merry!
His cheeks were like roses, his nose like a cherry!
His droll little mouth was drawn up like a bow,
And the beard of his chin was as white as the snow;
The stump of a pipe he held tight in his teeth,
And the smoke it encircled his head like a wreath;
He had a broad face and a little round belly,
That shook, when he laughed, like a bowl of jelly.
He was chubby and plump, a right jolly old elf,
And I laughed when I saw him, in spite of myself;
A wink of his eye and a twist of his head,
Soon gave me to know I had nothing to dread;
He spoke not a word, but went straight to his work,
And filled all the stockings; then turned with a jerk,
And laying a finger aside of his nose,
And giving a nod, up the chimney he rose;
He sprang to his sleigh, to his team gave a whistle,
And away they all flew like the down of a thistle.
But I heard him exclaim, ere he drove out of sight,
"Happy Christmas to all, and to all a gobd-night!"

CHAPTER I.

A GOLDEN TEMPLE.

Is the very midst of the Belgian iron country, under the shadow of tall sheltering ridges of pine-clad mountain-land, nestles the fashionable little watering-place called Forêtdechêne. Two or three handsome hotels; a handful of little new pile of building, with vast windows of shining plate-glass, and a stately quadrangular courtyard; a tiny street which looks as if a fragment of English Brighton had been dropped into this Belgian valley; a stunted semi-classic temple, which is at once a post-office and a table-d'hôte; and invalids perform their worship of Hygeia by the consumption of unspeakably disagreeable mineral-waters; a few tall, white villas dotted about here and there upon the slopes of pine-clad hills; and a very uncomfortable railway-station—constitute the chief features of Forêtdechêne. But right and left of that little cluster of shops and hotels there stretch deep, sombre avenues of oak, that look like sheltered ways to Paradise; and the sleep, deep blue of the August sky, and the pure breath of the warm, soft air, and the tender green of the young pine-woods that clothe the sandy hills, and the delicious tranquillity that pervades the sleepy little town and bathes the whole landscape in a languorous mist, are charms that render Forêtdechêne a pleasant oasis amidst the lurid woods and mountains of the iron country.

Only at stated intervals the quiet of this sleepy hollow is broken by the rolling of wheels, the jingling of bells, the cracking of whips, and the ejaculations of drivers and supplications of tourists: only when the railroad carries away departing visitors, or brings fresh ones, is there any thing like riot or confusion in the little town under the pine-clad hills—and even then the riot and confusion are of a very quiet order, and create but a transient discord among the harmonies of nature.

And yet, despite the Arcadian tranquillity of the landscape, the drowsy quiet of the pine-groves, the deep and solemn shade of those dark avenues, where one might fancifully hope to find some Druidess lingering beneath the shelter of the oaks, there is excitement of no common order to be found in the mountain watering-place of Forêtdechêne; and the reflective and observant traveler, on a modern sentimental journey, has only to enter the stately white building with the glittering plate-glass windows in order to behold the master-passions of the human breast unveiled for his pleasure and edification.

The ignorant traveler, impelled by curiosity, finds no bar to his entrance. The doors are as wide open as if the mansion were a hotel; and yet it is not a hotel, though a placard which he passes informs the traveler that he may have tea and sorbets, if he will; nor is the bright, fresh-looking building a theatre; for another placard informs the visitor that there are dramatic performances to be witnessed every evening in a building on one side of the quadrangle, which is a mere subsidiary attachment to the vast white mansion. The traveler, passing on his way unhindered, save by a man in livery, who deprives him of his cane, ascends a splendid staircase and finds himself in a luxurious anteroom, her, from which a pair of plate-glass doors open into a spacious saloon, where, in the warm August sunlight, a brilliant company of persons are gathered round a great green table, gambling.

The ignorant traveler, unaccustomed to the amusements of a Continental watering-place, may perhaps feel a little sense of surprise—a something almost akin to shame—as he contemplates that strange crowd. Its contemptible seems so much the more strange from the season of their silence. There is no lively bustle, none of that animation which generally attends every kind of amusement, none of the clamor of the betting-ring or the exchange. The gamblers at Forêtdechêne are terribly earnest; and this ignorant visitor unconsciously adapts himself to the solemn hush of the place, and steps softly as he approaches the table round which they are cloistered—as many sitting as can find room round the green-cloth-covered board; while behind the sitters there is a second row, two or three rows deeps, the hindermost watching the table over the shoulders of their neighbors. A placard upon the wall informs the visitor that only constant players are permitted to remain seated at that sacred table. Perhaps a third of the players and a third of the lookers-on are women. And if there are lips more tightly contracted than other lips, and eyes with a harder, speculer light in them than other eyes, those lips and those eyes belong to the women. The unaccustomed feminine hands have a clawlike aspect as they scrape the glittering piles of silver over the green cloth; the feminine throats look weird and scraggy as they crane themselves over masculine shoulders; the feminine voices utter something desoniaic in their steely glare as they keep watch upon the rapid progress of the game.

Half a dozen comfortable little pattimores seem to have changed hands while the traveler has been looking on; but he has not yet reached the table for about ten minutes; and this splendid salon is but an outer chamber, where one may stake as shabby a sum as one pleases, if one is shabby enough to wish to do so, and where playing for half an hour or so on a pleasant summer morning or evening could scarcely lose more than fifty or sixty pounds. Another pair of plate-glass doors open into an inner chamber where the silence is still more impressive, and where around a larger table sit one row of players; while one or two more of little group of outsiders stand behind their chairs. Here, more gilding on the walls and ceiling of this chamber; the frescoes are more elaborate; the crystal chandeliers are adorned with richer clusters of sparkling drops that twinkle like diamonds in the sunlight. In the temple of gold; and in this splendid chamber only two hundred no smaller stake than half a napoleon. There are women here; but not so many women as in the outer saloon; and the women here are younger and prettier and more carefully dressed than those who stand in the outer room.

The prettiest and the youngest woman in this golden chamber on one particular August afternoon, nine years after the fall of Tom Hall, day, was a girl who stood behind the chair of a military-looking Englishman, an old man whose handsome face has a little disfigured by those traces which late hours and dissipated habits are supposed to leave behind them.

The girl had a hand upon each hand and a pin in the other, and was occupied in some mysterious process, by which she kept note of the Englishman's play. The young woman was a delicate face, in whose softer lines there was a refined likeness to the features of the man whose play she watched. But while the features were hard and cold and gray, hers were of that dense black which there seems such an unfathomable and mysterious depth. She was a handsome woman, so she was also the worst-dressed woman in the room. Her flimsy silk mantle had faded from black to rusty brown, and the cheap lace shade at her face was sunburnt; the ribbons had lost their brightness; but there was an air of attempted fashion in the poverty-stricken costume of an Ispacea skirt; and there was evidence of a struggle with poverty in the tight-fitting lavender gloves, whose streaky lines bore witness to the imperfection of the cleaner's art. Elegant Parisians and the select of Brussels glanced at the military Englishman and his handsome daughter with some slight touch of supercilious surprise—as has no right to find shabbily-dressed young women in the gambling-saloons; but the glance arrows shot from feminine eyes had little power to wound their object just now. The girl looked up from her perforated card very seldom; and when she raised her eyes, it was always to look in one direction—toward the great glass-doors opening from the outer saloon. Those doors came and went; the doors swung open and closed again as noiselessly as it is possible for well-regulated doors to open and shut; footsteps sounded on the polished floors; and sometimes, when the young person in alpaca lifted her eyes, a passing shadow of disappointment darkened her face. A modern Lawrence Sterne, on a new Sentimental Journey, might have derived some interest from the study of the girl's countenance; but the reflective and observant traveler is not to be encountered very often in this age of excursionists; and Maria and her goat may roam the highways and byways for a long time before she will find any dreamy loiterer with a mind attuned to sympathy.

The shabby-dressed girl was looking for some one. She watched her father's play carefully—she marked her card with unfailing precision; but she performed these duties with a mechanical air; and it was only when she lifted her eyes to the great shining plate-glass doors which opened into the outer saloon that any trace of interest or feeling animated her countenance. She was looking for some one, and the person watched for was not coming. Ah, how difficult for her the arithmetician to number the crushing disappointments, the bitter agonies that one woman can endure in the single life of a girl! This girl was so young—so young; and already she had learned to suffer.

The man played with the concentrated attention and the impassible countenance of an experienced gamester, rarely lifting his eyes from the green cloth, or looking back at the girl who stood behind him. He was winning to-day, and he accepted his good fortune as quietly as he had endured his ill-luck during the last week at table. He seemed to be playing on some system of his own; and the neighboring players looked at him with a kind of awe-struck envy at the heap of gold grow larger under his thin, nervous hands. Ignorant gamesters, who stood aloof after having lost their last napoleon, contemplated the lucky Englishman and wondered about him, while some touch of pity leavened the envy excited by his success. He looked like the ruin of a decayed gentleman—a man who had been a military dandy in the days that were gone, and who had still the military stiffness, without the power to support them—a Brummel languishing at Caen; a Nash wasting slowly at Bath.

At last the girl's face brightened suddenly as she glanced upward; and it would have been very easy for the observant traveler—if any such person had been present—to have divined the cause of the change in her countenance. The some-one she had been watching for had arrived.

The door-way was filled by no stunted a man of about five-and-twenty, whose darkly-handsome face and careless costume had something of that air which was once known as the Byronic. Both the costume and the poetry of George Gordon Lord Byron. The new-comer was just one of those men whom very young women are apt to admire, and whom worldly-minded people are prone to distrust. There was a perfume of Bohemianism, a flavor of the Quartier Latin in the loose frock-coat, the velvet, the wide trousers, and black-velvet morning-coat, with which the young man outraged the conventional and commonplace visitors at Forêtdechêne. There was a semi-poetic vagabondism in the half-indifferent, half-contemptuous expression of his face; there was a fierce mustache, and strongly-marked eyebrows overshadowing sleepy gray eyes—eyes that were half hidden by their long, drooping lids, and which, when they let lie sometimes hidden among the rushes that flourish round them.

He was handsome, and he knew that he was handsome; but he affected to despise the beauty of his proud dark face, as he affected to despise all the brilliant and beautiful things in this world earth; and yet there was a vagabondish kind of foppery in his costume that contrasted sharply with the habitual slovenliness of the other gamester sitting at the table. There was a distance of nearly half a century between the style of the Regency dandy and the Quartier Latin lion.

The girl watched this new-comer with cold, earnest eyes as he walked slowly toward the table, and a faint blush kindled in her cheeks as he came nearer to the spot where she stood. He went by her without speaking an atmosphere of stale tobacco with him as he went; and he gave her a friendly nod as he passed, and "Good morning, Miss Dove," but that was all. The faint blush faded and left her very pale: but she resumed her weary task with the card and the pin, as he who had endured and yet disappointment within those few moments, it seemed to be a kind of disappointment that she was accustomed to suffer.

The young man walked round the table till he came to the only vacant chair, in which he seated himself, watching the game for a minute or a few minutes began to play. From the moment in which he dropped into that vacant seat to the moment in which he quitted it more than three hours afterward, he never lifted his eyes from the green cloth, or seemed to be conscious of any little thing on around or about him. The girl watched him furtively for some little time after he had taken his place at the table; but the stony mask of the professed gambler is a profitless object for a woman's earnest scrutiny.

She sighed presently and laid her hand heavily on the chair behind which she was standing. The action aroused the man who sat in it, and he turned his head to look at her for the first time.

"You are tired, Diana?"

"Yes, papa, I am very tired."

"Give me your purse, then, and go away," the gamester answered, peevishly; "girls are always tired."

She gave him the mysteriously-perforated card and left her post behind his chair; and then, after rooming about the peace-saloon with a listless air for a few minutes, and wandering once or twice to the window to another to look into the sunny quadrangle, where well-dressed people were sitting at little tables eating ices or drinking lemonade, she went away altogether, and roamed into another chamber where some children were dancing to the sound of a feeble violin. She sat upon a velvet-covered bench and watched the children's lesson for some minutes, and then rose and wandered to another open window that overlooked the same quadrangle, where the well-dressed people were enjoying themselves in the hot August sunshine.

"How exceedingly every body dresses!" she thought, "and what a shabby, poverty-stricken creature one feels among them! And yet if I took pains to be as smart as any of them out of the money he won to-day he will only look at me from head to foot and tell me that I have a gown and a cloak and a bonnet, and ask me what more I can want, in the name of all that is unreasonable? And I see girls here whose fathers are no richer than mine are proud of them—ugly girls, decked out in silks and muslins and ribbons that have cost a small fortune—clumsy, awkward girls, who look at me as if I were some new kind of wild animal."

The saloons at Forêtdechêne were rich in monster sheets of looking-glass; and in wandering discontentedly about the room Diana Paget saw herself reflected many times in all her shabbiness. It was only then that she had discovered that she had some pretension to good looks; for her father, who could not or would not educate her decently for other things, would, truly, a very high tone of morality in his paternal teaching, and in the fact that she might one day grow tired of her husband, he had taught her to impress upon her at an early age that she was the very incarnation of all that is lean and sallow and awkward.

CHAPTER II.

THE EASY DESCENT.

Among the many impedimenta of which Horatio Paget—who had once been in the cavalry regiment, always a captain in his intercourse with the world—had been guilty during the course of a long career, there was none for which he so bitterly reproached him-self as for a certain foolish marriage which he had made late in life. It was only in the first brief military career; so nearly gliding into life's swift-flowing river into eternity's trackless ocean, that the keenest thrill of gratitude which ever stirred the slow pulses of his cold heart quickened in beating as he clasped the hand that had held him back from the sharp edge of destruction; yet breath had chilled him with an awful fear. Such men as Horatio Paget are apt to feel a strange terror when the black cards appear suddenly down upon them, and the "Gray Boatman's" voice sounds hollow and mysterious in the darkness, pronouncing that the ocean is fierce tempest. The hand that held the ruined spendthrift back when the current swept so swiftly oncanward was a woman's tender hand; and the woman who knew what patient watchfulness, what careful administration of medicines and unwearying preparation of broths and jellies and eggs and grogs, what untiring and devoted slavery, had been necessary to save the fadel rake; who looked out upon the world once more from the very shadow of his former self, a penniless, helpless burden for any one who might choose to support him.

"Don't thank me, Horatio," she said when his feeble patient whimpered flourishing protestations of his gratitude, unabashed by the consciousness that his grateful expressions were the sole coin with which the medical man would be paid for his services—"thank that young woman, if you want to thank any body. For if I had not been for her you wouldn't be here to talk about gratitude. And if ever you get such another attack of inflammation of the lungs, you had better pray for such another nurse, though I don't think you're likely to find one."

And with this excellent piece of common-sendy surgeon took his departure, leaving Horatio Paget alone with the woman who had saved his life.

She was only his landlady's daughter; and his landlady was no properous householder in Mayfair, thriving on the exorbitant rents of wealthy bachelors, but an honest widow, living in an obscure little street leading out of the Old Kent Road, and letting a single apartment—a little parlor and a still more mengerly-furnished little bedroom to any single gentleman whom reverse of fortune might drive in the pursuit of cheap lodgings. Captain Paget had sunk very low in the world when he took possession of that wretched parlor and had himself down to rest on the widow's flock-bed.

There is apt to be a dreary interval in the life of such a man—a blank, dismal interregnum, which divides the day in which he spends his last shilling, from the hour in which he begins to prey deliberately upon the purse of his friends. It was in that hopeless interval that Horatio Paget established himself in the widow's parlor. But though he slept in the Old Kent Road, he had not yet brought himself to endure existence on the Surrey side of the water. He emerged from his lodging every morning to hasten westward, resplendent in clean linen and exquisitely-fitting gloves, an unquestionable over-coat, and varnished boots.

The wardrobe has its Indian summer; and the glory of a favorite valet's coat is like the splendor of a tropical sun—it is glorious to the last, and sinks in a moment. Captain Paget's wardrobe was in its Indian summer in these days; and when he felt how fatally near the Bond Street mansion was to the scene of his first, he could not refrain from a fond admiration of the booth that were so beautiful in decay.

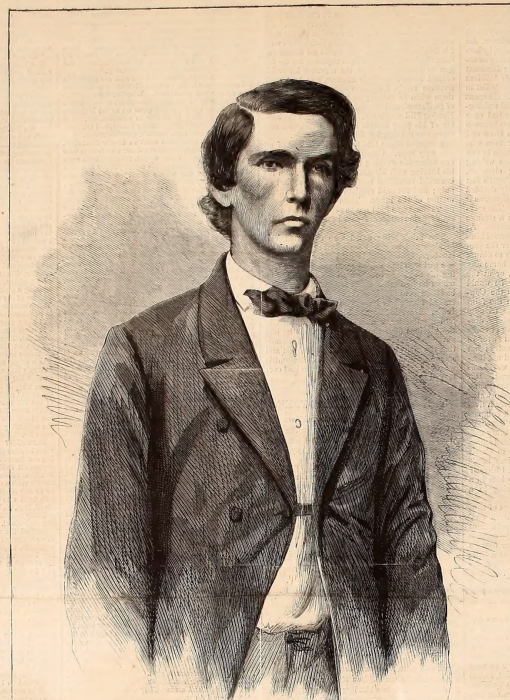
He walked the West End for many weary hours every day during this period of his decadence. He tried to live in an honest, gentlemanly way, by borrowing money of his friends, or discounting an accommodation-bill obtained from some innocent acquaintance who was deluded by his brilliant appearance and specious promises, into a belief in the transient nature of his difficulties. He spent his days in hanging about the halls and waitingrooms of clubs—if some of which he had once been a member; he walked many miles between the Haymarket, Regent Street, Kensington Gore and Notting Hill no longer. He knew that the bobbin of his trousers was in full flight, and that there was nothing left for him but to die.

It seemed about this time as if the end of all was very near. Captain Paget's mother, in a child one miserable evening on which he returned to his lodging with his garments dripping, and his beautiful moustache in a state of droop, to a kind of pulp; and the child resulted in a violent inflammation of the lungs. Then it was that a sweet man's hand was held out to Captain Paget, and a woman's divine tenderness cared for him in his dire extremity.

The ministering angel who comforted this helpless and broken-down wayfarer was only a nurse, ignorant girl called Mary Anne Kepp —a girl who, however, was not without



JOHN H. SURRATT.

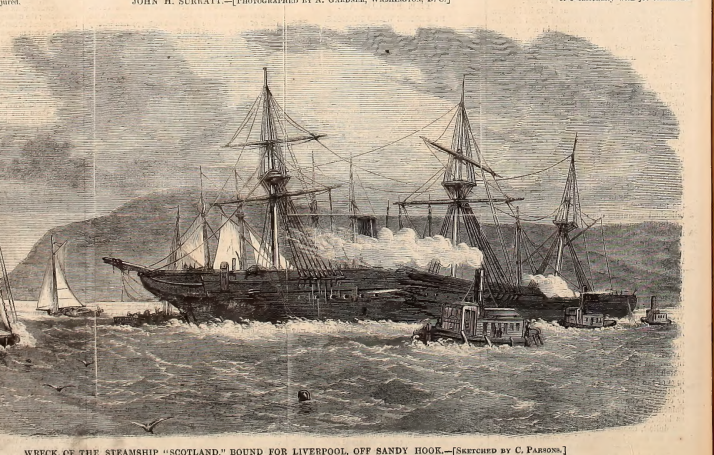
AFTER twenty months of successful evasion, JOHN H. SURRATT, the chief accomplice of BOOTH in the assassination of President LINCOLN, has been captured. The history of his movements since his escape to Canada, and also of his capture, were given in our last Number.

SURRATT is a man chiefly noticeable for his criminality. So obscure as to easily hide himself, by the aid of a few friends, from the eyes of the world; so ignorant that we almost wonder at the shrewdness of some of his devices, it is his capture alone, and the means thus furnished of reaching the secret history of LINCOLN'S murder, that make him once more a prominent object of interest.

SURRATT, though so great a coward that he deserted his mother in the hour of her most pressing need, yet showed himself capable of the most desperate actions when these were necessary to his own safety. He had boasted frequently of his crime, and appeared to think that the world not only forgave, but admired his atrocity. He was therefore greatly surprised when he was arrested at Feroli, in Italy. He was cast into prison, from which he managed to effect his escape by plunging down a ravine, making a leap of 29 feet. Had he leaped a little further he would have fallen into an abyss, and by a sudden death have escaped a more ignominious fate. Wounded by his fall, he succeeded in reaching a hospital, where he lay for a few days; but again took up his flight and sailed for Egypt, where he was again captured by Mr. HALE.

Probably the trial of SURRATT will go far toward revealing the whole secret of the conspiracy in which he was so prominent. In his conversations he has hinted at the connection of JEFF DAVIS with the assassination, and of other persons in New York and London who gave him pecuniary assistance. Our portrait, we believe, is from the photograph which was used by the Government in identifying SURRATT.

JOHN H. SURRATT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]



WRECK OF THE "SCOTLAND."

THE wreck of the Scotland lies on the middle bar, about a mile distant from Sandy Hook. She was a splendid ship of 3700 tons register, and belonged to the National Steamship Company of Liverpool. On the evening of December 1 she ran into the steamer Kate Dyer, about ten miles from Fire Island. The Dyer, instead of porting her helm, as she should have done, and as the pilot of the Scotland did, attempted to run across the bows of the latter vessel. In fifteen or twenty minutes the Dyer went down. The Scotland, though badly injured, made every effort to rescue the crew of the sinking vessel, but thirteen men were, after all, drowned, and only seven saved. The surviving steamer was compelled by her own injuries to look out for her own safety. She put back for Sandy Hook, and barely succeeded in reaching the middle bar, where she still remains, a peril to other navigators. The Government has been petitioned to secure her removal.

The accident was evidently not the fault of the officers of the Scotland, and the efforts made by Captain HALL, of the latter vessel, to rescue the men of the Dyer, when his own vessel was in danger, as also his able conduct of the Scotland, saving her from immediate and imminent shipwreck, are worthy of the highest commendation.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

THE Winter Fashions are now fully developed. For walking and visiting dresses the robe en fourreau, worn, however, entirely without crinoline, or with a very moderate quantity of that material, still maintains its place. For evening dress the robe à queue is rapidly coming into favor. Morning and walking dresses are also made in this style; still the inconvenience of the train for outdoor wear is certain to limit its adoption to the very select. Velvet dresses, black or colored, and trimmed with fur, are worn made en fourreau over pipes of plain silk or cashmere, with a deep ruche at the bottom. Black cashmere or silk robes, the latter either of moire or foulard, are worn trimmed up the seams and round the skirt, which is still shaped at the edge into some more or less fantastic form, with jet beads and ornaments; the under pipe in this case being either of silk or cashmere, and still with a broad ruche at the base. Robes à queue for evening wear are of colored foulards, striped and spotted with small patches of flowers or leaves, a pattern of dried autumn leaves being much in favor, or of white or some delicate-tinted moiré antique sprinkled over with broken flowers and falling leaves. These dresses are usually trimmed with ruchenaux of ribbon of the particular color which predominates in the pattern of the robe.—Paletots are almost exclusively of black velvet, or black or rich brown cashmere, the former being trimmed with sable or marten, or with an elegant embroidery of jet ornaments; the latter chiefly with jet or black glass beads, with a fringe of the same, and occasionally with jet and gimp intermixed. Paletots of black silk are usually lined with fur and trimmed to correspond, with perhaps an intermixture of jet, or occasionally with jet ornaments exclusively. They are worn any length, closed in or loose at the waist, perfectly straight or in points at the bottom, and with loose or tight sleeves indiscriminately. Bonnets are chiefly of velvet—black, scarlet, blue, green, or rich brown, and an attempt is now being made to introduce the chapeau of the first Empire, with its narrow rim and low crown. The chapeaux Dagmar and Czarine are trimmed with chinchilla or swan-down; other chapeaux are trimmed with pheasants' and various kinds of small feathers. The trimming of the ordinary chapeau, however, is generally of jet—jet ornaments at the top, jet ornaments round the rim, jet cords suspended round the front, and occasionally a jet chain under the chin or round the chignon. At times a feather, or bow, or single flower is worn on the left

The Great American Tea Company.

Always a Wholesale Establishment.

We have many inquiries (10 to 20 letters a day) asking what discount we make to the Trade from our prices as published in the Price List. These are our lowest wholesale prices. We consider ourselves only a Wholesale Corporation, and we have but one price.

The way in which we came to break packages at all was, that during the high prices of Tea we furnished parties with packages as small as five pounds. Our lane spread far and wide; and parties with small means thought it very hard to be compelled to pay, elsewhere, about a dollar per pound more than we were selling the same goods for, simply because they could not afford to buy five pounds of us at one time. Therefore, in order to lighten these burdens, we consented to supply Retail Dealers in quantities as small as one pound at the wholesale prices.

Further to accommodate persons wishing for goods to sell can have their orders put up in small packages to suit their trade, but we shall not allow any reduction in price, as our profits for the last six years have not averaged more than one cent per pound.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea trade, we will start with the American houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profit of the Chinese factors.

1st. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

2d. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

3d. The Importer makes a profit of 10 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

4th. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

5th. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

6th. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade, at a profit of about 10 per cent.

7th. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 25 to 35 per cent.

8th. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these eight profits as many brokerages, commissions, drayages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what a large sum you have to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than other dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, wastes, storages, cooperage, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

From the Methodist, N. Y. City.

We call special attention to THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY. They offer extraordinary inducements to the consumers of the beverage which "cheers but not inebriates." We have tested the quality of their Teas, and, so far as our experience goes, we are prepared to say that they are all that is claimed for them.

From the Evangelist, N. Y. City.

The attention of persons is directed to THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street. This Company have made arrangements to supply families with the choicest new crop of Black, Green, and Japan Teas at wholesale prices. The Company guarantee all the goods they sell to give entire satisfaction.

From the Christian Intelligencer, N. Y. City.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.—This Company are doing an immense wholesale and retail business, and are thus enabled to offer their Teas and Coffees at very low prices, and of a quality which can not fail to give entire satisfaction.

From the American Agriculturist.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.—To parties!—Before admitting the advertisement, we learned that a large number of readers and others had for several months been buying their Tea and Coffee from this Company, without the knowledge who they were, and that they had been highly pleased with their purchases, both as to quality and price, and we will recommend our friends to the same course. As we have received no complaints, we conclude "there is no humbug about the establishment."

From the N. Y. Day Book.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.—A suggestion in reading to getting Tea at cheap rates. We know the articles it sells to be of superior quality. The clubs are now all at the rage, as they get Tea into the consumer's hands for about one-third of the usual price.

For manner of getting up Clubs, &c., see former Numbers of this Paper.

P.S.—All towns, villages, or manufactories, where a large number of men are engaged, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third, by sending directly to the

Great American Tea Company,

31 and 33 VESEY STREET, CORNER OF CHURCH.
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

☞ We call especial notice to the fact that our Vesey Street Store is in Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, and not Church Street—large double store.

Parties calling for our store will please bear in mind that ours is a large double store, Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church Street. This is an important fact to be remembered, as there are many other Tea Stores in Vesey Street.

THE DESTITUTE AND ORPHAN CHILDREN OF OUR COUNTRY'S DEFENDERS.

GRAND CHARITABLE FAIR
AND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL
IN AID OF THE
HOME AND SCHOOL
FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION OF
The Destitute Children
OF OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THIS HOME AND SCHOOL was chartered in the year 1860 for the objects above set forth. Applicants are received from all the States in the Union: its sphere of usefulness is constantly increasing, the children now numbering over 120; and daily are the requests for the shelter and care of equally deserving ones denied, solely for want of room to accommodate them. We have now leased and made building (on Fifty-eighth Street, New York) more occupied, and will soon be ready for the choice of such a Home as necessity demands; and this call is made upon the public with a firm belief that the Patriotism and Generosity of the American People will nobly respond to the wants of the Little Ones, and that a suitable edifice will be erected, through the means of this "Republics are Ungrateful," and which shall, in affording an asylum for our Country's Children, also be an ornament among her institutions.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1866.

We, the Officers and Managers of the "Home and School" for the Education and Maintenance of the Destitute Children of our Soldiers and Sailors, earnestly solicit the sympathy and co-operation in our FAIR AND GRAND PRESENTATION FESTIVAL, of all who desire with us to see the "Home and School" enabled to receive and care for all needy ones who seek its shelter and protection.

DRY UP CATARRH CURE

Dr. Wadsworth's Dry-Up is a perfect and speedy cure for the Catarrh in its worst form. In every case, severe or light, the disease should be removed as soon as possible; for it gives rise to hoarseness, sore-ness in the wind-pipe, dry cough, chronic inflamation of the throat, dizziness, dull pain in the head, with a sensation of a weight over the eyes, loss of the senses of smelling and tasting, and various painful neuralgic affections.

We recommend to every one who has this loathsome disease to try the remedy at once, and we feel confident it will be a success. Price $1 per bottle. Send by stamp for pamphlet, all about Catarrh. For sale by the proprietors, H. H. BURRINGTON & Co., Providence, Rhode Island. Also, by SMITH & DWYER, Wholesale Agents, Chicago; Ohio; and by DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York City.
